NOTES OF THE WEEK.

A HAPPY NEW YEAR to all friends, near and distant! In this week's INQUIRER will be found a number of New Year's greetings and messages, which it has been a great pleasure to receive, and to be able to offer to our readers. We have just received also a letter from the Rev. C. W. Wendle, of Boston, secretary of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers, with his New Year's greetings, and an interesting forecast of the September meeting of the Council in Boston, and other news. This we shall publish next week.

THE result of the Christmas appeal for the Martineau Memorial at Norwich is advertised in another column. We simply call attention to it here, and ask friends to realise what it means.

THE last days of the old year were overshadowed by more than one terrible catastrophe, due to the stormy winter weather; and to our last week's notice of the year's obituary there are to be added the names of the Baroness Burdett-Coutts; Mrs. Josephine Butler; Mr. Samuel Smith, formerly member for Liverpool and afterwards for Flintshire, who died in Calcutta last Saturday; Mr. A. W. Black, M.P., one of the victims of the Elliot Junction railway disaster; and the Rev. T. W. Chignell, of Exeter, of whom a memorial notice appears in another column.

THE Baroness Burdett-Coutts, who was born in 1814 and was made a peeress in her own right by Queen Victoria in 1871, and next year received the freedom of the City of London, used her immense wealth with a wise beneficence. She was a great benefactress to the Church, and to the poor in numberless ways. The shoe-blacks and costers of London had been among her special interests, as were the Societies for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals and to Children. She worked hard in personal investigation of social conditions which she desired to improve, and in small matters as in great was true to the highest law of charity.

ANOTHER very noble life was brought to a close on Sunday last by the death of Mrs. Josephine Butler, at Wooler in her native County of Northumberland. She married in 1852 the Rev. George Butler, Fellow of Exeter College, Oxford, and while he had his work as a teacher, first at Oxford and later at Cheltenham and Liverpool, they were both completely devoted to the work of moral reform to which her life was given. In the crusade against the State regulation of vice she was a leader of rare purity and singleness of purpose. It came to her as a Divine call, from which she shrank with agony, and yet gave herself to it with complete surrender; and she lived to see the triumph of her cause. Harriet Martineau, Florence Nightingale, Mary Carpenter, and noble men like the late James Stansfeld, stood by her in the conflict, and such men of other nations as Garrison and Mazzini. She has left a memory which must remain an inspiration to all workers for purity and righteousness on earth.

LAST Christmas we had a little book of prayers, this year "A Christmas Sermon," by R. L. Stevenson, a timely publication by Messrs. Chatto & Windus (1s. net). Not exuberant in idle sentiment, but brave with a stoic faith and wise humanity; searching, too, in its treatment of uncheerful virtue. We should like to quote long passages, but must be content with a few lines:—"To be honest, to be kind—to earn a little and to spend a little less, to make, upon the whole, a family happier for his presence, to renounce when that shall be necessary and not be embittered, to keep a few friends, but these without capitulation—above all, in the same grim condition, to keep friends with himself—here is a task for all that a man has of fortitude and delicacy."

"In order that [a man] may be kind and honest, it may be needful he should become a total abstainer; let him become so then, and the next day let him forget the circumstance. Trying to be kind and honest will require all his thoughts; a mortified appetite is never a wise companion; in so far as he has had to mortify an appetite, he will still be the worse man; and of such a one a great deal of cheerfulness will be required in judging life, and a great deal of humility in judging others."

"SEEING the New Year in" is one of the occasions which appears at first sight to reduce the differences which separate groups of modern Englishmen into such discrepant sections, and anything which really does this is of value so far as it lends emphasis to our underlying community of life, aim, and ideal. But if we look a little more closely we shall be forced to reflect on this occasion as but another illustration of the multiple interests which still hold us in several distinct social classes. Perhaps the most notable method of seeing the New Year in is the Watch-night service. But there is another instance of the gregarious tendency which probably reckons still more numerous adherents. As typical of this sociable and not always wise form of celebration reference may be made to a notice in the daily press. The London restaurants are keen rivals in attracting guests for the last midnight supper of the dying year. At one of these the year 1906 was represented by a miniature four-wheel cab and "1907" by an aeroplane (flying machine and motor car combined) bearing gifts and flowers. Surely a mediocre ideal and a mean optimism if the future is to the past only as the more to the less perfect mechanical contrivance. Yet a luxurious meal and a novelty does express, more's the pity, the life-ambition of numerous classes.

As compared with this, the Watch-night service stands for a more serious conception of life. We are certainly disposed to agree with that clergyman of the English Church who has been criticising these services, skilfully worked up to silence on the eve of midnight, as morbid and dangerous. They are open to the complaint which Robert Louis Stevenson brought against the melody of "Home, Sweet Home." They are "brutal assaults on the feelings." Well, let that be. The emotional life, even the religious emotions, are often only to be evoked by violent stimulations. We are not bold enough to assert that the violent can never take heaven by force. These services need not be hysterical, but may be, and often are, quite sober and true. They express a temper of serious responsibility towards the frequent mischances and the ultimate problems of life. In some minds they evoke the deeper mood of reverence, and although to other temperaments they are uncongenial, it is not necessary to stigmatise them with any harsh judgment. In fact we prefer to muse on the reality of "soul-life," which is one in those who choose the noisy hymn singing and the emphatic silence and in those whose requirements are of a subtler kind.

BUT there is something of finer appeal to us in the spectacle which might have been witnessed at many a fishing town and village round our coasts. As the last day of the old year wore on the fishing boats were launched, the two or three sea-faring men who composed their crew scrambled aboard through the surf and then pushed out into the vast spaces of the sea. These men, too, were on the watch. Their craft claimed them, muscle and blood and brain. For them was no set hour of worship or thought of revelry. What unbidden thoughts stirred in the sub-conscious mind is hard to say. Through one year's work accomplished they pass to another year's toil to do. Such is the lot of man. Many of our fishermen are men of definite religious convictions. They preach, or sing or lead the praise with their violin. But mainly they are common people, not above the temptations that buffet the "average sensual man." Faulty in morals and in temper. Not without thought of the eternal things, though often lacking in any clear dogma. Yet these are the men who do. They trust themselves as true men must to the chances of the world. They accept its risks cavalierly, because in some mood or other accept them they must. They are without fear because of the inbred divine skill of eye and brain and hand. Their boats are specks lost in the darkness, but the master of the tiny, tossing craft is a man. The mood of the strong, careless men who go down to the deep is not the least worthy temper in which to front the future. Theirs is life, to borrow a phrase of Wordsworth's, of "hope and hazard." Wordsworth wrote thus of the shepherd on the lonely fell, but it holds good, or should do so, for all earth's children. Hazard is never absent. Hope should be near, for as he who knows the winds and tides trusts himself to the deep and the darkness, so he who knows the currents of life trusts himself. This mood compact equally of recklessness and faith is perhaps more frequent with those who do than with those who think or preach. Was it not an Elizabethan sailor who remarked as the storm burst on his ship, "We are as near God by sea as by land"?

THE plea for self-government for India, made with so much earnestness by Mr. Naoroji at the Indian National Conference, was met last week by the Spectator with a direct negative. The Prime Minister's declaration, which Mr. Naoroji quoted, that "good government could never be a substitute for government by the people themselves," the Spectator fully admits as valid for the Anglo-Saxon race and the majority of European nations, but then adds:—

"If, however, the proposition is applied to the Asiatic races, or to races professing the Mohammedan faith or any of the native religions of India, then we must meet it with the most absolute and complete denial. In the case of the Oriental peoples good government and government by the people themselves are wholly antagonistic; or, to take our formula as a model, good government can never be obtained through government by the people themselves. Whether the Asiatic races are inferior intellectually or morally to the Anglo-Saxon or European races we do not propose to discuss. It is quite enough for us to know that they are politically inferior to, or, if you will, different from, the Anglo-Saxon races, and that this inferiority or difference, whichever it is, makes them incapable of obtaining good government, or anything which we Westerners mean by good government, if they are left to govern themselves. The proof of this proposition is written large in their records."

THE experience of two thousand years has shown, says the Spectator, that Oriental peoples are best governed, and know they are best governed, by a power just, intelligent, and sympathetic, but at the same time absolute, and that democratic institutions are alien to their genius. In spite of the insistent voice of the National Congress, our contemporary holds that "the peoples of India" would by no means accept the gift of self-government, if it were offered, and that if it should be given, it would prove a futile gift. England ought not to accept any joint responsibility in the matter, and self-government, if it came, must be absolute, and involve our withdrawal from India.

"That such a withdrawal would constitute a very grave injury to India would, we believe, be admitted by almost all intelligent natives—at any rate, by all Bengalees and members of the non-warlike races. It must mean within a very few years the paramountcy of the warrior peoples of the North. But can anyone pretend that a ruler chosen from one of those races would exercise a milder, juster, and more equal sway than does the British Government at this moment? If once the natives of India are brought to realise that we cannot share the government with them without risks which we have no right to ask our people or their people to run, we believe that they will soon cease to ask for self-government. For they know in their hearts that it is the British overlordship which alone guarantees them the liberty and justice which they now enjoy. As often happens in the East those who demand self-government in addition to British rule are asking for two contradictory and mutually destructive things."

MEANWHILE, however, this is the Spectator's judgment on the present situation:—

"As long as the British people are determined that they will govern India in the interests of the governed, and that they will not share that government in its final and supreme form with those who are by race and religion unfit for the task of self-government, our rule in India will flourish, and we shall perform a great duty. If, however, through what Bacon calls niceness and satiety, or out of any sophistical obedience to half-understood abstractions, we insist upon endowing India with the gift of representative institutions—a form of government necessarily fatal to Asiatic communities—we shall have done, no matter what our intentions, a great and grievous wrong to our Asiatic subjects. If we act moderately and wisely, and on common-sense lines, we shall rightly employ native instruments in the government of India; but they must always be employed as our nominees, and not as representatives with any inherent right to control our decisions as to what will be most beneficial to the numerous complex and conflicting communities which make up the world of India."

Would that we could have the judgment of our late honoured friend, Mr. A. M. Bose, on this decided opinion! The loss to India of so wise and earnest a patriot was deplored by Mr. Naoroji in his presidential address.

WE see it stated in one of the Methodist newspapers that the average yearly contributions of the United Free Methodists for missionary purposes amounts to 3s. 3½d. per member throughout the Connexion. Ten years ago the average contribution was 2s. 9½d. per member. The word member is probably used in the strict sense, and therefore does not include the whole number of the congregations that have contributed the money. But in any case the sum represents a certain substantial amount of self-denial, which does at least as much good to the Christians who contribute as to the "heathen" who are missionised.

THE Rev. Peter Thompson (Wesleyan), visiting Rotherham recently, said:—"No one knew East London except those who lived there. It was the most fascinating place in the world to live in. It was not the dreary, dismal, unhealthy place some imagined. He had had a hand in the Daily News sweating exhibition. There was no bitterness towards employers on the part of the sweated. They were too anxious to keep their work. One of the problems in this matter was to find the right man to smite. Men who earned a 'quid' a week would not stay in East London. Of nearly 3,000 members he did not know one, except himself, who kept a servant."

It is refreshing to meet with a man in these days who is interested in education for its own sake, and not for the sake of some sectarian church or imaginary aggrieved parent. The Lord Mayor of Sheffield, in delivering the prizes at a Sheffield school the other day, went straight to the mark, and his speech showed clearly enough how far and wide many of us have been apt to stray, "Parents would, he believed, find it a great advantage if their boys, instead of running the streets and cultivating idle habits were compelled to improve their education, and it would certainly be better for the city. England did not go far enough in teaching her boys and girls trades. In Switzerland the children were not only taught to read and write at school, but they were kept on there to learn their trades. Giving examples of sturdy youths who were to be seen hanging about the streets and competing with old men in selling newspapers at suburban tram stations, he pointed out the danger of such youths growing up wastrels in society as a consequence, and emphasised that the teaching of trades, on Swiss lines, would place such youths in a position to earn a living in a better way."

THE "Wesleyan Methodist Kalendar" gives the number of Wesleyan ministers in Great Britain as 2,399, lay preachers 19,519, church members and probationers 536,612, Sunday scholars something over a million. The total number of church members and probationers of all branches of Methodism in all parts of the world is given as 8,278,043, with over 6,876,000 Sunday scholars.

In the new number of the "Wesleyan Methodist Magazine," we notice the Rev. J. A. Clapperton, M.A., expounds "St. Paul's Trinity Hymn." Some readers may be excused for wondering where this hymn is to be found, and may be likely to guess 1 Cor. xiii. 13, devoted to the praise of faith, hope, and love. Nothing like it. It is contained in Ephesians i. 3-14. Most of us have read it as an utterance of thankfulness to God the Father. If it is indeed Paul's Trinity Hymn, the makers of modern hymns to the Trinity have departed very widely from their model. St. Paul's sentences (if he wrote them) are indeed complex in structure, and his words are not always free from ambiguity; but he involves us in no arithmetical puzzles, and would probably have been astonished at Charles Wesley's "Supreme essential One, adored in co-eternal three." Truth to say, the perplexity of irreconcilable numbers is about the most unlikely subject to waken the genius of the poet, or the gratitude of the Christian. Heaven be thanked that our New Testaments (R.V.), if not all our hymn books, are free from these gratuitous difficulties.

WITH reference to the account of Newport Chapel, I.W., by the Rev. H. M. Livens, which we published last week, Mr. J. B. Price, of Horsham, and formerly of Newport, sends us some interesting reminiscences. He recalls the names of Mr. Abraham Clarke and his eldest son John, both of whom were highly respected and active members; the Kirkpatricks and the brothers Mortimore, and Joseph Sayer; also the second daughter of the last-named gentleman, who became the wife of Professor Henry Morley. "Then we should not forget," he adds, "Rev. J. M. Davison, who in my Newport time was tutor to Mr. A. Clarke's boys, and very often took Mr. Kell's place when absent. I well remember Mr. Kell being much excited over the Dissenters' Chapels Bill. With great warmth he told us that 'there was not a Trinitarian brick in our chapel.' When I was only a child of eight years I remember one Good Friday meeting of the Southern Unitarian Book and Tract Society, held at Portsmouth, where the Isle of Wight members came in fairly large force; Mr.

Kell, of course, and a venerable silver-haired gentleman, Mr. Hughes, and two or three ladies. The Rev. R. Aspland was the preacher in the morning at the little chapel in St. Thomas'-street, and again in the evening at High-street."

THE Essex Hall Year Book for 1907 will be ready in a few days. Its list of ministers in Great Britain and Ireland numbers 365, and there are 372 places of worship, 291 in England, 39 in Ireland, 35 in Wales, and 7 in Scotland. The Year Book of the American Unitarian Association for 1906 contains the names of 471 societies in the United States and Canada; and there are 549 ministers. The Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, who edits the Essex Hall Year Book, concludes his preface with the following note:—

"It is perhaps well to explain that the Year Book simply gives information, and makes no claim to 'ecclesiastical authority.' When there is any doubt or difficulty about the insertion or omission of congregations, ministers, or lay-workers, the Editor receives instructions from the Publications Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. The present Editor has had charge of the Year Book from the beginning, now eighteen years ago, and it is gratifying to report that very few complaints have been received during the whole of that period."

THE following notes are from the preface of the new issue of the Essex Hall Year Book:—The Essex Hall Hymnal, in its older or Revised edition, is used by 194 congregations; "Hymns of Praise and Prayer" by 49; "Hymns for the Christian Church and Home" by 18. In Ireland 25 congregations use "Hymns for Christian Worship"; in Wales 23 use "Pearls of Praise." The Berwick Hymnal is used by 15 congregations, the New Hymnal published by Novello by 13; upwards of 30 congregations use selections more or less peculiar to themselves. Liturgies are used by 109 congregations.

The following ministers are open to accept engagements, permanent or temporary:—Revs. Frederic Allen, Samuel Burrows, William Griffiths, E. Rattenbury Hodges, William Lindsay, Edward Parry, Clement E. Pike, Philip E. Richards, Thomas Robinson, W. Rodger Smyth, Francis Wood. Ill-health prevents a few others from seeking engagements at present.

DR. BLAKE ODGERS, President of the Sunday School Association, has addressed a New Year's letter to the teachers in the schools connected with the Association, who number 3,624 in all. The letter contains the following good advice:—

"Will you let your President give you a few hints as to the way in which he thinks the work can best be done:—

You must be yourself interested in what you teach, or you cannot interest others.

You should always insist on good order and attention in your class.

Don't do all the talking yourself, but make the class answer your questions.

Draw your illustrations from any books which your scholars are likely to have read, from English Poetry, from English History, from current events, but most of all from the Bible; do not forget the place which the Bible will always hold in all literature and art.

Advise them what books to read at home.

Remember that they will soon grow up into men and women; teach them their social duties, their duties to the State.

Above all, teach them religion; by precept and still more by example. Do not hesitate to give expression to your own beliefs.

Make friends of your scholars; show them that you take an interest in them; visit them in their homes. Keep up intercourse with them after they have left the school; they may need friendly advice at many a crisis of their life.

Do not be discouraged if your efforts appear unavailing; they will bear fruit by and by. In this world no good work is ever wholly lost, so DO YOUR BEST."

"THE Forward Journey: Courage and Obedience" is the subject of the first of the Sunday Bible readings for 1907 in the list printed on the back of the annual motto card issued by the Sunday School Association. The card has a picture of a lighthouse, and the motto is: "Even so let your light shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven"; with the verses added:—

"Whose high endeavours are an inward light

That makes the path before him always bright."

Wordsworth.

God make my life a little light,

Within the world to glow;

A little flame that burneth bright

Wherever I may go."

M. Betham-Edwards:

The motto is also the subject of the New Year's address by Dr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C., President of the Sunday School Association, with which the January number of the Monthly Notes for Sunday Classes opens. The notes this month are by the Rev. W. G. Price. The Editor, the Rev. Charles Roper, wishes all the teachers a Happy New Year.

A THOUGHT FROM CARLYLE:

OUT of wild chaos and disordered night
From shapeless masses which through space were hurled,

Slowly God shaped this fair and wondrous world,

Filled now with forms of beauty and delight,
Each perfect far beyond our human sight:
Infinite Art the crested wave has curled,
And tiny floweret from its sheath unfurled,
While sun and moon on all shed glorious light:

Yet no hap-hazard beauty finds a place
Where all is ordered by unchanging law;
God's Thought works ceaselessly through time and space

To make all perfect without speck or flaw:
He works with God, who in the slightest thing

Order from chaos by his toil would bring:

NEW YEAR IN THE CROW'S NEST.

IN summer we have wealth of birds, but they cannot stand the winter here. The owl, with all his feathers, is a-cold. Besides us crows I have only seen one feathered brother—a brave, ruffled little fellow, with white in his wings, that picks a hard living along the sledge tracks. Instead of the pipe of half-awakened birds it is the fresh laughter of little children that rouses us, long before the light. We see Venus in her frosty glory above the white knoll of Muottas Muraigl. She lingers with lessening ray, while bells begin to tinkle along the post road. Then a sudden splendour springs out of the Bernina Tal, and the new day comes, bringing the new year.

Every day is New Year's Day, as every day is Christmas, the day of Incarnation, and Ascension Day, and Judgment Day. But, since human institutions are also a part of nature, there is a real, special significance about that sunrise which changes the number of the year. Here comes our master and our servant, an utterly fresh piece of time, unlike all that have been, all that shall be: It brings us, God knows what; confirms our hopes or our fears, arms us with new usefulness, or whispers an "Away!"; lays on us much that we can surmise, perhaps more that is outside all expectation. It wears the face of Fate, a lieutenant of Omnipotence. Yet, in a sense quite as true, it comes to do our will. It is ours to work with or play with, use, abuse, waste. On New Year's Day, therefore, we call the muster-roll of our principles, and how strange are some of the voices that reply! It is a great day of self-censure, and self-forgiveness, and self-direction, and I dare say we are none the worse for it. Above all it is a day of intention and hope, and these are the awakeners of all comatose virtue.

•We Unitarians have also our hopes and intentions, most of which are of a quiet, modest character. Quite a number of poor, faithful ministers are taking it for granted that they will go on in 1907 as in 1906, preaching good sermons to their congregations, and bearing the contemptuous ostracism or self-conscious patronage of their orthodox colleagues with as much simple dignity as they bear their poverty. Hundreds of devoted laymen and lay women have their time allotted already to the various ministries of helpfulness which have claimed them. Still, we hope as a body to make some little progress this coming year in certain larger movements; and especially in two. We hope to gain wisdom, and apply it, in social work, and to improve our relations with other religious communities.

Social work has now a Union to promote its interests. We have been stung, at once by the noble stimulus of human sympathy and by the shame of seeing creed-bound churches ahead of us in these labours of kindness, into beginning to organise our will and effort to hasten the Kingdom. The blessing of God be on thought and act! I have my own little patch to dig, and the labour promises to be long and hard, yet I doubt not, in the end, by me or by another, it will be done. I am surprised and disappointed that there has been no response to my appeal, made in the INQUIRER of October 13, for organised Health Work in connection with our churches: "Our children, our young men and women, our parents and workers, do not know how to live, so as to keep well and promote the health of others. I want a Band of Health attached to every church. I want the method and duty of health, with all solemn sanctions, inculcated, impressed, exemplified." I sketched a plan, suggested minor ways and aims, and begged for suggestive criticism. Not a word, pro or con, has been evoked.

In the name of humanity, why? Do you think the work is being efficiently done already, or that it is not our affair? The work is not being done, cannot be done, until the leaven of a holy purpose has been diffused through the careless, selfish mass of men. It must needs be that Elias first come. I quite understand that, in the end, we shall require civic and national power to compel those whom we cannot induce. But we cannot get Acts of Parliament until we have awakened public feeling, to demand and welcome them: I know well that there are labourers outside our ranks—John Burns is one—hard at work to arouse the public conscience. But, compared with the harvest, the labourers are few. And I say that because ours is a spiritual work, and because health of soul, and health of mind, and health of body, are intimately connected and inter-dependent, this work is our work too. I recognise a direct responsibility to the members, young and old, of our churches and schools, and to the population surrounding our chapels. Have we not sins of our own to repent and amend. An ill-ventilated Sunday-school is a crime. I appeal once more to ministers and laymen, and hope this time to win a response.

A propos, the Bazaar for the Queen Alexandra Sanatorium at Davos begins on January 23. Our Editor has promised to forward contributions in cash or kind.

Our relations with other religious communities have not sensibly improved, in spite of the New Theology. But there is hope that they may improve. It is, of course, with Congregationalists that we naturally look for more cordial amity than in the past. In order to secure it, however, we must perceive quite clearly what are the obstacles to be removed. Be it conceded that the Congregationalist churches have merits which we lack, powers for good which we have missed. We are very willing to associate and to learn. There is, on the other hand, one principle, a cardinal principle with us, which our Congregationalist friends do not value, or perhaps even recognise, as we do. It is the principle which justifies our separate existence, and it is derived, as we believe, from the supreme duty of veracity. We will not—save involuntarily, in human weakness—compromise with truth, and manage it diplomatically as an instrument. We will not put the maintenance of certain cherished opinions first, and recognition of the truth second. We will not say or sign the thing that is not true, in order to buy opportunities for religious work. If, then, the Congregationalists are to draw into closer communion with us it must be by learning to share our view of the duty of veracity.

"While the average Unitarian minister is alert to the findings of science, of historical and biblical criticism, and to new light from whatever quarter it breaks, he is little more so than the average Congregationalist minister." But the average Congregationalist minister is a party to the arrangement which banishes the average Unitarian minister from the brotherhood of the Churches.

"Mr. R. J. Campbell is the best, straightest, and strongest representative of 'The New Theology' men, and he stands bravely and resolutely for the universal Divine Immanence, and for the essential Divinity of Man." But Mr. R. J. Campbell holds his pulpit by virtue of subscription to the Westminster Confession:

Comment on these facts is hardly needed. If A. says, "I quite agree with you that in matters of belief truth is paramount, that we must be most scrupulously veracious in all religious matters, and must not bind ourselves to maintain any dogma, practice or institution to the prejudice of truth; but I sincerely believe that Jesus was Incarnate God, born of a virgin, and that he purchased God's mercy from God's justice by his blood, and that eternal Hell awaits all who think otherwise"; and B. says, "I quite agree with your chief theological beliefs, but, for reasons, I sign a document in the clear contrary sense, and tolerate the intolerance which represents you as unworthy of association with other Christians"—it seems to me that A., and not B., is the man who is more in sympathy with our cardinal principle. But the words recently quoted in the INQUIRER from Dr. Horton encourage us to think that our view of the claims of veracity is gaining ground among our brethren. May this year see fellow-workers joining hands in the name of God and man!

SILANUS THE CHRISTIAN.*

It is now nearly thirty years since Dr. Abbott, in 1878, published "Philochristus: Memoirs of a Disciple of the Lord," followed four years later by "Onesimus: Memoirs of a Disciple of St. Paul." They were works of historical imagination, based on sound scholarship, which, through the supposed records of the disciple, succeeded in vividly picturing the life of Jesus, as a modern student of the Gospels had conceived it, and afterwards the commanding personality of the great Apostle of the Gentiles. In his new book Dr. Abbott uses once more with great skill the same vehicle of historical imagination, but this time not so much to tell a life-story as to picture the influence of Christ in a later generation, among those who, early in the second century, first became familiar with the Fourth Gospel.

Quintus Junius Silanus is a Roman citizen, who, about the year 118 A.D., as a young man, goes to Nicopolis, in Epirus, to attend the lectures of Epictetus, the Stoic philosopher. His experience there, and the experience of friends of his, what they found in the teaching of Epictetus and what they failed to find, how Silanus was led to study the Epistles of St. Paul and the Old Testament writings, and then the Synoptic Gospels, and afterwards, through his acquaintance with the Athenian Clemens, the Fourth Gospel also, and finally became a Christian, he himself relates as an old man forty-five years after, and this record constitutes the book. It is dedicated "To the memory of Epictetus, not a Christian, but an awakener of aspirations that could not be satisfied except in Christ," and through the vehicle of this fiction Dr. Abbott expounds his own view of the Christian revelation, as one who long since discarded the "miraculous" element of the Bible, but holds more firmly than ever to his belief "in the eternal unity of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, in the supernatural but non-miraculous incarnation of the Son as Jesus Christ, and in Christ's supernatural but non-miraculous resurrection after he had offered himself up as a sacrifice for the sins of the world."

The object of the present work is to picture what Dr. Abbott conceives to be the reality of the influence of this supreme personality over the hearts of men. It endeavours to show "in a general and popular way, on psychological, historical, and critical grounds, how the rejection of the claim made by most Christians, that their Lord is miraculous, may be compatible with a frank and full acceptance of the conclusion that he is, in the highest sense, Divine." The proofs of the position here taken up Dr. Abbott reserves for a further volume of "Notes," which is shortly to be published.

The record of Silanus is of the greatest interest. One sees the lecture-room of Epictetus, and the students gathered about him; and his teaching, as Arrian preserved it in his notes, is skillfully presented. One is made to feel the noble side of the Stoic doctrine, but also its weakness, and by contrast the greater force of the Christian ideal. The study of St. Paul and the Gospels and the grappling with various critical problems occupy a large part of the book, but the human interest is also well maintained, and the close bearing of the Gospel study upon it. Arrian is called away from Nicopolis by the illness and death of his father, and subsequently in a letter to Silanus gives his impressions of the Christians, with whom, as a magistrate, he afterwards came into contact:—

"I have been more impressed than I can easily explain to you on paper by the behaviour of this strangely superstitious sect. There is a strenuous fervour in their goodness—I mean in the Christians; I am not now speaking of the Jews—which I don't find in my own attempts at goodness. I am, at best, only a second-class Cynic, devoid of fervour. You may say, like an orthodox scholar of Epictetus, 'Let them keep the fervour and leave me calmness.' But these men have both. They can be seasonably fervid and seasonably calm. I have heard many true stories of their behaviour in the last persecution. Go into one of their synagogues, and you may hear their priest—or rather their prophet, for priests they have none—thundering and lightning as though he held the thunderbolts of Zeus. Order the fellow off for scourging or execution, and he straightway becomes serenity itself. Not Epictetus could be more serene. Indeed, where an Epictetian would 'make himself a stone' under stripes, and say, 'They are nothing to me,' a Christian would rejoice to bear them 'for the sake of Christus.' And even Epictetus,

I think, could not reach the warmth, the glow of their affection for each other. I am devoutly thankful that I did not occupy my present office under Pliny. It has never been my fate to scourge, rack, torture, or kill one of these honest, simple, excellent creatures, whose only fault is what Epictetus would call their 'dogma' or conviction—surely such a 'dogma' as an emperor might almost think it well to encourage among the uneducated classes, in view of its excellent results. Farewell, and be ever my friend" (p. 270).

That is a good example of the manner of this book, and the human interest of it deepens towards the close. The picture of Clemens, the Athenian Christian, is very attractive, and his influence upon Silanus in his inward struggles. From his hands Silanus receives a copy of the Fourth Gospel, the book "that is neither a true poem nor a true history, a biography that hardly professes to draw the life of Jesus as he was, but only to make us feel that it must be felt, if at all, through 'a disciple whom Jesus loved.'"

The final conversion of Silanus takes place as he is sailing back to Rome, having heard of the fatal illness of his father's old friend Scaurus, through whose influence he had been led to seek out Epictetus, and who had also been a critical student of the Christian literature. The experience of Silanus in his conversion is related in a moving manner, his miserable sense of the baser side of human nature, and his revolt from it, as in Sartor's "Everlasting No," and then the longing for fellowship with the suffering Man, who yet triumphed, of whom the Gospel told, and the final overwhelming conviction of the Divine love, which carried him "as a little child into the joy of the family of God." The passage must be studied as a whole, and it is too long to quote here. The only point at which it does not carry spiritual conviction to us is in the confession that it is the Man, the Forsaken Son of God, who is yet not destroyed, who alone is to be worshipped (p. 365). Dr. Abbott finds it true in some mystical sense, we must suppose, because he has inherited the belief "in the eternal unity of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit"; but we cannot believe that it was so the constraining love of Christ led those early Christians to the Father. There is, indeed, moving power in the cross; it signifies the supreme spiritual victory of the suffering Man, and the self-surrender of perfect love, which carries with it conviction of the Love Eternal. But it is not the Man who is to be worshipped, but only the Eternal, with whom the Man is as a child with his Father.

WE shall publish next week an article under the heading "Towards Social Reform," by Mr. Richard Robinson, on "Collective Ownership: Its Ethical Significance," and in the following week Mr. Richard Simon will take up the discussion, to be followed, as we hope, by others on the same subject.

OBITUARY.

MISS WAKEFIELD.

THE congregation of the Old Meeting, Mansfield, has to mourn the loss of one of its oldest and most valued members in the person of Miss Alicia Wakefield, who passed away on December 26 in her 81st year, and was buried on Saturday last in the Cemetery, which looked lovely in the snow, illuminated by the sun. The Rev. F. H. Vaughan alluded to the sad event on Sunday, and the congregation sang the beautiful hymn, "Behold, the western evening light."

For a generation and more Miss Wakefield's sprightly form has been a well-known figure in the streets of Mansfield, and her cheerful and kindly presence was welcome in the homes of her intimate acquaintances, and in the cottages of her poorer friends, where her sympathy, counsel, and help were always welcome. She was born in Mansfield, but left the town, and after her parents' death, about 50 years ago, returned with her two unmarried sisters to live there: Miss Wakefield spent an active, bright, and blameless life. Her familiar presence and her kindly greeting will be greatly missed by everyone who knew her, and especially by the members of the Old Meeting, of which she was a steadfast member and regular worshipper.

Miss Wakefield belonged to a family of some local distinction. An ancestor of hers was Vicar of St. Mary's Church at Nottingham. His son was the well-known Rev. Gilbert Wakefield, who embraced Unitarianism and was imprisoned on account of his opinions. He was a distinguished classical scholar and was one of the professors at the Warrington Academy. Though Miss Alicia Wakefield was the last of her family at Mansfield, the name is not likely to be forgotten. Her brother, Mr. Frank Wakefield, leaves a son, the Rev. Russell Wakefield, who is distinguished as an active and liberal clergyman in London. Miss Wakefield's character, though simple, was almost unique in its special worth, and her memory will long be cherished in the hearts of all who knew her.

THOMAS KNOTT:

THE congregation at Blackley and the denominational life and work in the Manchester district have suffered a serious loss by the death of Mr. Knott, on December 28, at the age of fifty-seven years. During a long period he took a very deep interest in the Blackley Unitarian Chapel, and always gave gladly and freely of his service and his substance. As a member of the Manchester District Association he made his mark as an ardent worker, as a man who cared much more for deeds than for words. His whole business life of forty-five years was spent with the Birkacre Calico Printing Company, and he had risen by means of his great business capacity and strict integrity from office boy to manager. In his family life Mr. Knott displayed a singularly thoughtful and affectionate spirit, and he had his reward in the devoted attachment of his wife and daughter, whilst his fine humanity had raised up about him a host of friends. He will be painfully missed at home, in the city, in the chapel which he loved and served so well, and to which he was a tower of strength. His death has come as a real calamity to all who lived and worked with him. The funeral took place at Blackley, on December 31, and was conducted in the chapel by the Rev. W. Holmshaw, and at the grave by the Rev. John Ellis.

ROBY WATERALL.

THE Croydon Free Christian Church has lost one of its oldest friends and supporters. On the last Sunday of the year, in his home at Waddon Lodge, Mr. Roby Waterall passed peacefully to his rest, at the age of 74. He was for many years associated with the Stamford-street Chapel, but since coming to live near Croydon had been closely identified with the life and work of the congregation there. His quiet, unassuming disposition, his gentleness and kindness of heart, his liberal sympathies and generous impulses endeared him to all. He will be greatly missed and long remembered. He had suffered much during the last three or four years, and suffered patiently, with more of cheer than of depression, as one who felt no reason for complaint and much for gratitude. In the waning light of a wintry day his spirit passed into the silence of the greater peace of God.

THE REV. T. W. CHIGNELL.

On Sunday morning last, the Rev. Thomas William Chignell, of Exeter, passed peacefully away in his sleep, being eighty-two years of age. For the last forty-four years he had been minister of George's Meeting, and had just arranged with his congregation for a partial retirement, which was to have taken effect with the New Year. He suffered from a heart attack on Christmas Day, and when he rallied had thought of preaching on Sunday, but received instead this gentle release.

Mr. Chignell was born at Colchester in December, 1824, and was educated at Homerton College for the Congregational ministry. In 1849 he entered on his first charge at the Highbury Congregational Chapel, Portsmouth, but five years later took up an independent position, and for seven years conducted undenominational services in St. George's Hall, Portsea. Then in 1862 he received a call to Exeter, and for the rest of his life was minister of George's Meeting. Writing to the congregation on February 7 of that year, accepting the invitation, Mr. Chignell said:—"I would rather do the commonest manual work than be a preacher where preacher and hearers moulder and decay as in a grave; but to be a living mind set among living minds as their religious teacher, this is to me the very ideal of life; and if I can increase intelligence, happiness, friendship, affection, Christian charity, and self-devotion, piety towards man and towards God amongst you, I shall be infinitely rewarded."

That ideal, during his long ministry, Mr. Chignell amply fulfilled. He was a man of remarkable gifts, but of delicate health, and of shy, almost reclusive temper; but his heart opened readily to those whom he felt to be congenial spirits. He would talk with enthusiasm of his favourite authors, among whom Spinoza and Goethe, Wordsworth and Kant held a chief place. A man of much reading and thought, he exercised a remarkable power over minds able to appreciate high discourse. The last idea with him would have been the effort to be "popular," though his sympathies were broad and deep, and he always stood for the most catholic ideals. He yearned, as he expressed it in one of his own hymns, for—

Nobler thought becoming freer,
Uttered whole in word and deed;
Bigotry and thralldom dying,
Of the State, and of the Creed;
Till of man a nobler pattern
Sun and earth at length behold,
Broader-minded, broader-hearted,
Tender, manly, reverent, bold.

Mr. Chignell brought out two editions of the Exeter hymn-book, in 1863 and 1884, which contain several of his own hymns and translations from foreign authors. The following verses are from one of the best known of his hymns:—

Morning breaketh on thee,
Fresh life's pulses beat,
Earth and sky new kindled
Once again to greet:
With a thousand voices
Woods and valleys sound,
Leaf and flower with dew drops
Sparkle all around.

Day is all before thee,
Vanished is the night;
Would'st thou aught accomplish—
Look toward the light:
Let a mighty purpose
In thee stir and live,
After highest being Ever more to strive.

As through mist and vapour
Breaks the morning sun, Shine and work, thou spirit,
Till thy task is done:
When from farthest hill-top
Fades the fire of day,
Blest in blessing others
Shalt thou pass away.

It was in the pulpit and in the study that Mr. Chignell lived his intensest life. In public affairs he took little part, but it was a profound personal influence that he exerted. He counted Sir John and Lady Bowring among his friends, and among the wreaths placed upon his grave was one from Mr. Henry Arthur Jones, the dramatist, with a warm tribute of respect and affection.

The funeral service on New Year's Day was conducted by the Rev. Ernest Betham, who has been acting latterly as assistant to Mr. Chignell. The Rev. Rudolf Davis, of Bridgwater, was present, representing the Western Union, and there was a large gathering of friends.

In various districts and circuits of Primitive Methodists, resolutions have recently been passed promising support of the scheme for the celebration of the Centenary. The first Primitive Methodist class meeting was held in 1810.

THE LATE EDWIN CLEPHAN, J.P.

THE funeral service for Mr. Edwin Clephan, of Leicester, was held, after cremation, in the Great Meeting, on Friday, December 28. There was a very large congregation present, which included the Mayor and many leading citizens. The service, the first part of which was conducted by the Rev. A. H. Thomas, minister of the chapel, included Mr. Clephan's favourite hymn, "Lead, Kindly Light." The Rev. Henry Gow, who also conducted the committal service at the Welford-road cemetery, gave the address in the chapel, and in the course of it said:—

As we gather here in this place, where he had worshipped for more than seventy years, it is not so much with sorrow as with gratitude to God that we would say for a little time, farewell. Many grateful memories, many tender thoughts of days that are dead, come up in our minds to-day as we take farewell of our friend. We think of him with the many varied activities and services of so long, so benevolent, and so honourable a life. Many of us remember him as a devoted member of the congregation meeting in this chapel, a most generous supporter in all its needs, a wise and trusted counsellor and leader in all its difficulties. He was a true friend and helper of every succeeding minister in this place. We remember his kindly greeting in the vestry before morning service; we remember his deep interest in the work of this church and his constant kindness. He was ever loyal to his principles and to his friends. In many wider ways he helped the liberal religious movement of which this congregation is proud to form a part. His religious convictions were clear and strong and definite, and he never feared at any moment of his life to confess them when occasion called; and just because of his strength of conviction and his deep sympathies with liberal religion, he was able to be broad and tolerant towards other types of thought. He recognised good work everywhere, and was a friend towards all religious effort in which he perceived the spirit of Christ. Many of you remember to-day, as you think of him, how leading a part he took in the political life of this town for many years. He was not afraid to express his opinions strongly, and to take sides on what appealed to him as true and right. But while thus ranging himself in religion and in politics, and having always the courage of his convictions, no one could think of him as narrow and unsympathetic. He had deeply attached friends in all schools of thought and of all political opinions. He was acquainted with many types of men and many books. He had gained for himself much culture and knowledge, and he loved art and beauty with an ever-growing, ever-deepening understanding and affection. He had much to do, as we all know, with the encouragement of art in Leicester. Masters and students of the School of Art will remember him ever as a most generous friend, a most wise counsellor. It is hardly possible to realise how much his enthusiasm, his guidance, his generosity have done for the promotion of the love of beauty in this town. Many of you remember him as a business man of high character, of integrity and diligence, who supported the high traditions of one of the great financial centres in this city, one who rose by character and ability from a comparatively humble post to be the friend and partner of the head: There was much also in him of what Wordsworth calls

"That best portion of a good man's life,
His little, nameless, unremembered acts
Of kindness and of love."

I remember acts of his which came to my knowledge when minister here, kind things done which he never meant that the public should know, anonymous gifts, help given quietly and silently, generous deeds for which he desired no praise, but which he rather sought to hide. There must be very many who remember him to-day with gratitude, for help, for counsel, for kind encouragement, for friendship. It is the record of a long, honourable, useful, benevolent, hard-working, and courageous life, of which we think affectionately and gratefully to-day. He has done far more than we can refer to or recall. In large and little ways he has done much for the good of this city of Leicester, which he loved, and which he made his home for more than seventy years. He has done much for this chapel, in which he worshipped, and for the principles of freedom and spiritual religion for which it stands. He has been a strength and happiness to his many friends. And now, after so long and strenuous a life, there has come the final peace and rest. At this Christmas season of reunion and family happiness, the loss of our loved ones seems doubly hard to bear: We miss the old-accustomed faces, we see with tender grief and longing the vacant place in our church and in our home. But at this season also, through this love, this unselfishness, this thought for others, through the spirit of Christ which seems abroad in men's hearts, there is a feeling of the reality and nearness of this unseen world, a feeling of reunion with our dead, a feeling of the presence of angels in our midst: There is no time when the mystery of death is felt to be filled with love so evidently as at this season of the year. May this feeling of the love of God, of this reality and permanence of love, may this deep consciousness of the unseen be in our hearts to-day: May it be with no hopeless sorrow, but with a deep and solemn trust that we say, for a little time, farewell. Thank God for all that he has done of good, for all that he has been to them who loved him, and were loved by him. May God comfort them in their loneliness and grief, and may He give them the peace which passeth understanding, which neither life nor death can take away.

MR. LUMMIS, in his letter from Celerina, reminds us of the needs of the Queen Alexandra Sanatorium, to be built at Davos, for English-speaking people. The site is bought, and the work of road-making and water supply is completed. Plans for a sanatorium with sixty beds are ready, and over £20,000 is required to complete the building. The purpose is to help those who could not otherwise go to Davos to benefit from that wonderful life-giving resort. The Hon. G. F. McGarel Hogg is to be addressed at the Kulm Hotel, St. Moritz, on the subject of the Bazaar at Davos, of which Mr. Lummis speaks.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

THE Editor wishes all the children who read this column or have it read to them A HAPPY NEW YEAR! And remember, we have got to help—everyone of us—to make it happy. Do you know the secret? What Miss Emily Smith is telling you this week will help to remind you of it. And I advise you to get a copy of the Motto Card for 1907 from the Sunday-school Association, to be a reminder to you all through the year. You will find a note about it in another place.

A CHRISTMAS SURPRISE.

WELL, Christmas is over! There seems to have been "real Christmas weather" everywhere in these Islands on Christmas Day, with sunny, frosty walks to church or chapel, or to visit relations or friends, with much happy carol singing, with more berries than usual on the holly, and more present-giving and receiving, I do believe, than ever. In the homes of poor, or sick, or sorrowful people there has been a Christmas blessing too, for tender human friends have been messengers of Peace and Goodwill, while in keeping Christ's birthday the sad have surely been reminded of Him who said, "Come unto me, all ye who labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest."

You, children, are all looking back, I hope, on a very happy Christmas time. I wonder if any of you had a present like one that came to our house about a week before Christmas Day. A girl friend sent it to me for as all. She heard that we should be a party of "only grown-ups," and thought that would be very dull. So she set her brains to work on a plan to give us some pleasure and fun, and certainly succeeded in her object. It was a great pleasure to me to stow the "secret" away, and look forward to surprising my brothers and sisters, and when you hear that it was a Christmas pie to be put on our Christmas dinner-table, and what sort of a pie it was, you will easily picture both the pleasure and fun we all had in the opening of it.

It was in a round tin dish with a lid, and looked very pretty with a pink pie-frill round it, and six different coloured ribbons hanging out from under the lid. At the end of each ribbon one of our names was pinned. I lifted the lid a wee bit amidst excited expectation, and each in turn drew his or her ribbon. Out tumbled most jolly little parcels, with a Christmas-card tied to each of them. When the tissue paper wrappings were unfolded, we found six dainty presents; and we think that some of my child friend's merry spirit also ran out of the pie-dish, for we felt really gleeful at our pretty gifts, and laughed like children over them and the funny cards. We drank the health of our little friend, and next day sent her a rhymed "round robin" of thanks, with a mock-pathetic picture of the empty pie to show how successful her kindly plan had been in cheering "only grown-ups."

Now, I tell you about this Christmas surprise, because some of you may care to make one like it, or, better still, one with improvements, or it may start you some day on quite a new "surprise" of your own!

and that is best of all, when we can do something for the good of other people which no one has ever thought of doing before.

Then I want you to think over several good things that helped to make the pie besides ingenuity, tin and tissue paper, or even the spirit of fun. You will guess what I mean. There was, of course, the loving heart of the little maker, and the kindly thinking of another family not her own, some of whom she only knew by hearsay.

There was, moreover, the practical doing of her loving thought, and after several failures, I hear. You remember what good Canon Kingsley wrote in a little girl's album:

"Do noble deeds, not dream them all day long,

And so make Life, Death, and that vast Forever,

One grand, sweet song."

If we have not as much gift for doing as for feeling and thinking, we must all try the harder to overcome difficulties in working out what we feel or know to be a right or kind thing to do.

Self-denial, also, went into the making of the "surprise," even though a 3½d. stall in the market-place proved a blessing to a young person of generous desires but slender means. I know that my little friend had spent nothing on herself for months in view of Christmas-present making, and that the pie was an extra drain on her pocket-money.

Lastly, the choosing of the cards and gifts showed a happy power of putting oneself in another's place. Each suited the receiver exactly. Now, this power of putting oneself in another's place, this feeling for and understanding others, are needed by all, both grown-ups and children, if people at home, and school, or in the great world at large, are to live more and more lovingly, peaceably, and happily together. It is one of the ways in which we can carry out the law of love to God and love to our neighbours which God sent Christ into the world to show as it had never been shown before.

Yes, Christmas-time is over—a time of merry-making, let us hope, for children, and for all, young folks and elders, rich and poor, happy and sad, a season of real blessing. It will have been, if ingenuity, loving thought, persevering doing, self-denial, and feeling for other people have helped our various celebrations.

The New Year has followed close. And now with Christmas remembrances fresh within and around us, we should pray to follow in the steps of him whose birthday we have just been keeping, and carry the Christmas spirit with us throughout the coming year.

EMILY H. SMITH.

THE strong, sweet voice that made pain possible

Without its sorrow, the illumined eyes
That bent above the dying with the light
Of victory, the unshrinking, tender hand,
Were as the soul of all the suffering days,
And peace and patience came, and courage too,

Living or dying; and the gates of heaven
Were terrible, but glorious; for this side,
Also, the angels stood, and held the posts:

THE NEW YEAR.

UPON this New Year we enter with good heart, strengthened and encouraged by the greetings and good counsel of the friends whose words are here gathered together. At every stage in the journey of our life, bearing in mind the trust placed in the hands of THE INQUIRER, to be a true organ of the religious life of a community of Free Churches, the impulse returns to speak some word of renewed pleading for more earnest purpose, and more complete consecration to the service of spiritual truth, and a deeper inward life. There is always that need to realise anew that our strength must be in the inward life with GOD, both for the service of a more complete individual faithfulness and for the perfecting of our communion and fellowship in the Church. Both the President of the National Conference and Dr. CARPENTER lay stress on the need of this inward movement, as the essential thing, before there can be any real progress in our religious life, and we may well take it as our first impulse of reconsecration in this New Year to seek for a greater quietness of faith, a deeper sense of the Divine Presence, in the gladness of knowing that we are called to this high service, and that in our faithfulness God holds us upon the true way, and will make more and more clear to us the glory of life, and give us of His strength to do the true work of the world.

In secret communion with the UNSEEN, we have each to find our own peace, and then in the fellowship of the house of prayer the great gladness of being together in that one spirit, for mutual encouragement and confession, for the testimony of truth, and the ministry of sympathy and brotherhood. The Church remains now as ever, a great organ of power, for the spiritual cleansing and uplifting of our common life, and the direction of the forces of our manhood for the highest service; if only we will use it to that end, and first of all, in the true spirit of fellowship and communion with the UNSEEN, make it such an instrument of the Divine Will.

We do not know what the year may have in store for us. We do know what is the instant claim of the SPIRIT upon our obedience, our joyful self-surrender, to be guided and used for service of the Highest. There is no joy like that of knowing that the FATHER'S will is done. If that is our first care, the whole intention of our life, we need have no fear, nor any other care as to how things may go with us in the world, either individually or as a people gathered into the communion of a living Church.

THE MAKING OF RELIGION.

It was a strong and helpful word that Dr. CROTHERS spoke to us in his Essex Hall Lecture last Whitsuntide—a word which it is well to call to mind at the beginning of another year. The little book of the published lecture* would serve as a pleasant and most welcome New Year's greeting to send to friends.

Religion, we are bidden to remember, is always in the making, and must always be so, because it is of the very essence of life. We cannot be satisfied with far-off origins, or suppose that if we have traced a mighty river to its source in one tiny stream, that explains it, or gives to us any true conception of what it really is in all the fulness of its being. We must see the whole great order of its progressive life, and, above all, must realise the unity of those spiritual forces which compass it about, and all contribute to the making of what it now is. Thus religion, in the dim past, may have had crude, unmoral beginnings, in the first stirrings of spiritual life, among the things of an earlier animal existence; but that is a very small part of what has gone to the making of religion, and mature experience becomes aware of far loftier relations. We have to judge of the whole by what is most profound and of highest worth in that experience, and see that we do not neglect the living appeal of the present. "The great significance of the Old Testament," says Dr. CROTHERS, "lies in the fact that it is the record of the way in which this primitive religion [religion before it was thoroughly moralised] met another stream of ethical energy. There was first conflict and finally fusion. The passion of the great prophets was primarily a moral passion. To the priests of the older cults they must have seemed to be mere iconoclasts, despisers of the old sanctities. In the end they succeeded in uniting what before had been separated. So in the formative period of Christianity we are conscious of the meeting of many forces. Christian historians with an apologetic bias have done their best to belittle the spiritual energy which was characteristic of the period in which the new church grew into power. But we cannot fail to see the signs of promise, the austere morality of the Stoics, the spiritual aspiration in the new forms taken by the Greek philosophies, the revival of oriental mysticism, the cosmopolitan sympathy which widened with the Empire itself. The whole story cannot be written, for these diverse elements unconsciously blended with the new faith. Multitudes were seeking a higher kind of life. The Christian Church represented the aspirations not merely of a little band of Galileans, but the spiritual struggles of the world. We cannot understand Christianity if we belittle the age in which it arose, any more than we do honour to Jesus by underrating the race to which he belongs."

And in the present day we have to realise what are the essential things of our best life, for there we shall find the true meaning of religion as it now is in the making, rich in hope for the future, and there we shall find that we are nearest to the living GOD. That is the direct appeal which Dr. CROTHERS makes to us, with a faith that is full of the vigour and gladness of a life facing the rising dawn.

One chief demand of the Spirit in our time is for absolute veracity, springing from an austere, disinterested worship of truth, demanding purity of mind and heart. There are such men, said Dr. CROTHERS, in our Universities to-day; "and these men, when they look upon conventional religion, are shocked at—what shall I say?—they are shocked at the profanity of it. I say the profanity, because as a part of these men's religion, their deepest impulse, the thing they would die for, is the disinterested worship of truth." Thus are they alienated from the churches, because of that stirring of a purer religious impulse in their own hearts. "Yet there are forces which are slowly building the new Church in which the Truth-lover can worship, without mental reservation or apology. The very forces which are destroying ecclesiastical pretentiousness are making for a more sincere and vital faith." And with that passion for truth must be reckoned the democratic enthusiasm of those who are working for a society based on brotherliness, and in such efforts are stirred by deep religious impulse. Dr. CROTHERS finds that in America "one of the most promising signs is the establishing in our large cities of Schools of Philanthropy for young men and women who are going from our Universities for courses of patient study of social conditions—not any more with the idea of mere giving, but with the desire, first of all, of knowing the truth—then with their brother men engaging in the great Divine work of uplifting humanity."

We have in our churches an open way for better service, and the opportunity freely to respond to such an appeal as this.

* "The Making of Religion." The Essex Hall Lecture, 1906. By Samuel M. Crothers, D.D., Cambridge, U.S.A. (Philip Green, 5, Essex-street, Strand, W.C. 1s. net.)

We shall do well, on the threshold of another year, to renew our dedication to the pure service of truth and a sincere and earnest spirit of brotherhood. So shall we surely find a new power moving in our hearts towards the making of religion, a strength and joy to ourselves, and a help, such as we have never yet been able to give, in ministering to all the needs of our fellow-men.

Standing at our own post of duty, we look back in retrospective and reverent mood, and we see the great cloud of witnesses, the men of every generation, of whom the world was not worthy, and we see, looking straight into their faces (so Dr. CROTHERS concluded his lecture), that they all were worshippers, all believers, with something of a transcendent vision. We see the light in their faces; but when we would ask what it means, we must no longer look back. We must turn to see what they were looking at.

"These were men whose faces shone, because they were looking forward; because, standing at the beginning of great tasks (too great for them), they saw, and they knew, the light dawning from afar, they were hoping because they were looking in the direction wherein hope always dawns, they were knowing, because they were doing, God's will, they were believing because out of their experience faith was made, and joy came again; they were children of the dawn, and they rejoiced in the light. We cannot know what religion is by looking back at our saints and heroes, but by looking forward to that which they looked for. We are here not to preserve their work, but to continue it. Religion consists 'not of spent deeds, but of doing.' As we face our tasks, resolutely determined to go forward, we see the same vision that cheered our fathers, because we are moving in the same direction."

THE WARRIOR.

Him I hail of men the first
Who, in this mad war of things,
Sanely dares the fury's worst,
And the song immortal sings.

Him I hail the first and best—
Be the second he that will—
Who, with fire divine possess'd, Fights creation's battle still.

At the trumpet call of Fate
Others waver, weakly dumb;
He, as one the lists await,
Answers with a glad "I come!"

Him the Powers Eternal hail,
Round him ancient chaos yields,
Order, beauty, truth prevail,
Deserts turn to harvest fields

Strong is he, and blithe as strong,
Spite of all his battle-scars—
Singer of the primal song,
Brother of the morning stars!

NEW YEAR'S MESSAGES.

THE REV. JOSEPH WOOD, PRESIDENT OF THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

To the Ministers and Members of the Churches on the Roll of the National Conference.

DEAR BRETHREN,—I should not venture to address you in this fashion at the New Year had you not called me to the high honour and great responsibility of the President's office. It is your confidence emboldens me to offer you a New Year's greeting, and to accompany it with a word concerning that which is nearest to my heart—the welfare of our churches. The writer of an apostolic epistle utters a wish I could make my own: "Beloved, I wish above all things that ye may prosper, and be in health, even as your soul prospereth." It is a wish first of all for soul-prosperity in the confidence that if inwardly the man or the church is in health, not merely alive, but abounding in life, all other needful prosperities will follow. What are the prosperities we desire for our churches? Numbers? Crowded pews? Balance-sheets on the right side? Generous gifts? Eloquent preachers? The world's goodwill? Social recognition instead of social ostracism? Such prosperities as these may or may not be good for our churches, but they are certainly not the things one emphasises in the good wishes of a New Year's greeting. It is power to do good, to heal the sick, to cleanse the leper, to give sight to the blind, to raise the dead, and to make the impact of the church on the world more vital and effective for the world's regeneration which are the prosperities of chiefest concern. And, first of all, to transmute the truth we know into the lives we live.

Life! It is this of which not only "our veins," but our churches "are scant." How the word rings through the Bible! There is the tree of life in Eden, and there is a tree of life whose leaves are for healing in the paradise of the Apocalypse. First and last it is life which is the unspeakable blessing of religion. "Seek ye me, and ye shall live." "The fear of the Lord is a fountain of life." "I have set before thee the way of life." "Thou wilt show me the path of life." "The life is more than meat." "In him was life and the life was the light of men." "A pure river of water of life." "I am the bread of life." "For this came I into the world that they might have life and might have it more abundantly."

It is for this the whole world is eager. Life is what the sick man wants; life is the craving of the dying man; it is the want of life which urges the despairing soul to suicide, for it is not death he seeks, but to escape the living death of his own soul; it is renewing of the exhausted powers of life we hope to find in our holidays; it is life the bosom of the mother gives the infant; it is more life the soul needs when harassed and burdened and conscience-stricken; the supreme trouble of life is lack of life. And what is the matter with a feeble, ineffective, stagnant church but want of life? The hopeful thing is that the very pain and discontent with our weakness we feel is a sign of life stirring within us:

We have spoken much of a forward movement. But there can be no forward movement which is not preceded by an inward movement. Some of us feel our great need of organisation for effective doing, but we feel yet more deeply, feel it with a thirst which is inextinguishable, that it is life, the water of life direct from heavenly springs which is our paramount need. So many of us and so many of our churches are only half alive. We can recall, perhaps, some moment of experience when life was richer and fuller and more exuberant than ever before; when we thrilled with a sense of the power and joy of life, and nothing seemed impossible, and the yoke became easy and the burden light, and the feet moved swiftly on the errands of goodwill, and the very air we breathed quivered with vitality. But now—now how are we oppressed by lethargy, weariness, stupefying, enervating apathy about the great deep things of God and the soul, scarcely hoping that any flood of life will appear for our reviving. And does not this personal history of the soul too often repeat itself in our churches? Once there was a time of flowering and fruitage, and life—prodigal, inexhaustible life, like a youthful passion or the onward rush of spring, gave the churches a victorious season. But how dim and flickering is its life to-day! Love, aspiration, joy, creative power, the abandon of flinging everything into noble effort for the kingdom and the cause, and flinging it with a song—alas! what do we know of such ecstasies?

And yet we might know everything. The Fountain has not run dry; the hills still stand from whence cometh help; the miracle of miracles, the bringing of life out of death is waiting but two things, the touch of God and the willing mind. But where is the soul, where is the church, that really, deeply, and passionately wants to live its fullest life, the life that will overtop every other purpose? What church is willing to obey to the full length of obedience all that it knows of the true and the good, in perfect sympathy and co-operation with God?

It is nearly sixty years ago since Mr. Thom wrote: "It is said 'The administration of religion is so powerless.' It may be so; but, have you warmed it by the participation of a fervent heart? Has the feebly uttered truth been passed with power through your own souls, or fallen on sensibilities prepared to kindle? Has the lifeless prayer become life within your spirits? Have you prayed or only listened? Have you really conceived of yourselves as members of a church at all, a communion for fostering the religious life in one another, in which every earnest spirit breathes his own temper into all?"

I do not forget the peculiar difficulties of our own little community of churches. To stand as we do for "the pieties of the intellect" as well as the pieties of the heart, to make our church the natural home for emancipated minds, to witness uncompromisingly for the utmost intellectual liberty, is to incur a world of opposition and prejudice and misunderstanding. And if we stood for these things alone or chiefly we should deserve our reproach. But we have to prove that these things are not only compatible with the spiritual life, but that they are a better aid to that great end than the creeds and magic we have left behind. Intellectual integrity is surely a diviner handmaid of faith than believing the incredible. To be hospitable to the new thought of our time about God, and the universe, and the soul's destiny, is more favourable to the cultivation of the Christlike character and the graces that dwelt in him, than subscription to articles of belief. The Gospel of the Kingdom is, we are convinced, at once a far simpler and a far nobler thing than the churches have made it. But this conviction only increases our responsibility. If we have a nobler conception of the Gospel than others, we ought to do a nobler work. If we have a finer instrument it ought to accomplish better results; if ours is a sharper sword, it ought to win more victoriously. It is not the Gospel we preach that is wanting, it is that we are not fully alive who preach it. It is not that the sword is feeble, it is that the hands wielding it are lacking in strength.

Brethren, let us betake ourselves to the Source and Giver of Life. Let us more earnestly this New Year than in the past cultivate what Jeremy Taylor so finely called "the practice of the presence of God." Lack of life means a feeble consciousness of God. Really to live and live in abundance "the life which is life indeed," is to live in the Light of His countenance.

Fulness of life is in obedience, love and communion with the "Holiest in the Height," a Soul in ever-deepening sympathy with God. Whenever and to whomsoever the sense of God is intense and vivid, there the water of life will be found flowing as a river for the help of man.

JOSEPH WOOD:

THE REV. S. A. STEINTHAL, PRESIDENT OF MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD.

ALL who trust in the love of God will greet the New Year with hope and joy. Though the sky may here and there be dark, we know that above the clouds there is the pure vault of clear light. May the Heavenly Father open the hearts of men to the mind which was in Jesus, and, filling them with faith and love, grant to all a blessed and a happy New Year!

S. ALFRED STEINTHAL.

THE REV. DR. CARPENTER, PRINCIPAL OF
MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD.

DEAR EDITOR,—You ask for a few words of greeting as we all step forth upon our way, to the ministers and members of our churches. In our homes, among kindred and friends, we wish each other a Happy New Year; let us do so also in the household of faith. But happiness in the home does not come without thought and love and sacrifice. What of these gifts do we dedicate to Truth, to Liberty, to Religion? As we seek the things that are above, must we not desire for each other, as for ourselves, more joy in worship and more steadfastness in work? If our religion is to be to us anything more than a casual decoration on the fringe of life it must be maintained by unceasing endeavour. And for this end we must win the sympathy of the young. It is not always easy to do this along the technical paths of Bible study or philosophy. These have values which I do not wish to disparage. But when it is once realised that religion is the most potent of social forces, and holds the key to the highest achievements of life, we shall arouse a real enthusiasm in those who are now indifferent or unawakened. The great feature of our time is the deepening sense that the welfare of the people is bound up with the prayer "Thy kingdom come." The sense that it must come through man as well as for man will make us patient with impatience, and willing to labour and wait while science and statesmanship slowly work out the methods of realising new ideals. In this preparation every one must bear his part. I suggest, therefore, to my brethren, teachers and learners in religion, three aims for the coming year:

(1) Greater personal faithfulness in our common life and work.

(2) Increase of the spirit of worship in church and home.

(3) Arousal of the young to study and service for the amendment of the social order.

And may the good hand of our God be on us all.

J. ESTLIN CARPENTER.

THE REV. C. B. UPTON, EMERITUS PROFESSOR OF PHILOSOPHY IN MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD.

DEAR MR. EDITOR,—Fortunately the mental vigour of newspapers is not subject to the same conditions of growth and decay which hold good of individual minds. The celebrated Dr Osler assures us that the work turned out by sexagenarians, whether in literature or politics or theology, is necessarily inferior in quality to the achievements of their earlier years. But though THE INQUIRER has now passed its sixtieth year, I find it no less interesting, no less stimulating to earnest thought and to high endeavour than it was when, forty years ago, I first made its acquaintance.

The spirit of a newspaper finds its re-incarnations on this earth as each editor becomes emeritus, and hands on the task to his successor. Very fortunate has THE INQUIRER been in this matter; through its successive re-incarnations it has assuredly well preserved its original character—its passion for freedom and for truth—and in its columns the advances in scientific, philosophical, and theological insight have been faithfully reflected. During its existence it has seen and chronicled many important changes in the religious world, and now, if I rightly interpret the signs of the time, it is soon to see a still more momentous revolution. For many a year now THE INQUIRER has given frequent and forcible expression to the fundamental religious principle of the immediate self-revelation of God in the rational, the moral, and the spiritual life of man, and has maintained that here, and here alone, is the true and ultimate seat of authority in religion; the final court of appeal before which both the "Church" of the Catholics and the "Bible" of Protestants must find their justification. Till comparatively recently this has been as a voice crying in the wilderness, for it has called forth hardly any response either from the Established Church or from the great Nonconformist sects in this country. At the present time, however, there are most remarkable indications that all over Christendom this grand belief in the present Incarnation of the living God in Humanity, and His pre-eminent self-manifestation in the personality of Jesus, is stirring in the inmost heart of many churches, and will, ere very long, give birth to doctrinal divisions in a host of congregations. A great breaking up of denominational boundaries cannot be very far off, and much dissolution and reconstruction must needs be before religious thinkers re-organise themselves in accordance with their real spiritual affinities. For a time there will perhaps be painful discord, but out of it will arise a far deeper sense of unity and spiritual brotherhood. Theological differences will fade away or will be seen to be unessential when all religious souls look for light and guidance to the self-revealing Father within. These coming changes will no doubt lend new interest to the columns of THE INQUIRER and of its younger contemporary, The Christian Life; nor will our papers be content with recording the progress of liberal religion. They will themselves be active champions on the side of freedom and truth. Both editor and contributors have, I believe, a good time before them, and to both I heartily say, Macti, macti virtute este.

CHARLES B. UPTON.

THE REV. JOHN HUNTER, D.D., OF GLASGOW.

It is my prayer that over all the free non-subscribing churches of the country a new breath of life, of faith, of courage, and of unity may be breathed. They are not rising anywhere as they ought to the height of their opportunity—the splendid opportunity which unfettered trusts give to many of them in these days of movement and progress. Though the old doctrinal controversies are practically extinct, yet they are still thinking too much of what they stood against in the past, and too little of what they ought to stand for in the living present. They are free where other religious communities are more or less bound—free within the great Christian lines to think and believe, to worship and teach, to work and serve; but they might just as well be bound if they are not making the very most and the very best of their freedom in all best ways. True to their ecclesiastical position they should be gathering the choicest results of the Christian ages, and all that the experience of other churches has proved to be most helpful to faith and piety; they should have the purest, richest, and most inspiring Christian worship, the most enlightened and catholic Christian teaching, and the noblest forms of Christian service.

It is time for a great positive and constructive movement and work on unsectarian and liberal Christian lines to begin in right earnest. The most thoughtful religious men are everywhere ready for it. Their seeming indifference to institutional religion is mainly due, I am convinced, to the fact that they are no longer content with putting one sectarianism or dogmatism in the place of another. They want to set their feet in a larger place. We are also leaving behind the purely negative and critical stage of things, and the further liberalisation of theological opinion we may trust very much to the general progress of knowledge and learning. We have escaped at a great cost from the limitations of the past; we have clearer light and better understanding of the Christian ideas and the Christian spirit; but our larger freedom and larger knowledge are only means to an end—and that end is the building up of a church truly and simply Christian, full of spiritual life and light, warmth and inspiration, and wide enough and hospitable enough to welcome and to hold all disciples of Jesus Christ. No church is so necessary as this Church of the Reconciliation, mediating between the old and the new, the past and the present, where

"Mind and soul, according well,
May make one music as before,
But vaster."

Let nothing lower and narrower than this be our ideal, and let us, while we have opportunity, not grudge anything in the way of service and sacrifice which it demands for its full and beautiful realisation.

JOHN HUNTER.

The Rosary of the Years.—An ancient Persian poet says: "He needs no other rosary, whose thread of life is strung with beads of Thought and Love." The memorials of Infinite Mercy should convert the sequences of time into one liturgy of praise. In its entire completeness our mortal experience will appear as one divine gift, to find its place for ever on the bead-roll of Eternal Love, whose unbroken thread of providential goodness shall make our life in God an unending rosary of joy and peace.

FRANK WALTERS.

THE REV. L. P. JACKS,
MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD,
EDITOR OF THE "HIBBERT JOURNAL."

DEAR MR. EDITOR,—In reference to your request for a few words of good cheer, I confess to feeling little inclination to indulge in vague generalities, however pleasant they may sound at this season. Fortunately, however, I am able to point to something definite which seems to me to afford grounds of hope to those of your readers who are looking to the coming of a better day. I refer to the Van Mission, of which we hear good accounts from the North of England. I can remember no movement undertaken in my time among the circle of your readers and sympathisers of which the possibilities have been so large. I say possibilities, for it is too early to speak of results. If the movement should ultimately prove misdirected, that is to say, if it falls under the sway of denominational ambitions (which are amongst the worse forms of irreligion), it will assuredly come to naught. The world of our day would have no need for anything of the kind. But if, as I anticipate, its aims are ethical and religious, its leaders will find not a mere opening but a positive demand for that which they have to offer. The Great Awakening, which is not far off, will not provide a power of which any church may avail itself to turn the wheels of its machinery. That machinery in most churches, considered merely as machinery, has become obsolete; to a large extent it has broken down; and, though the persons most concerned seldom seem aware of the fact, it is already rusting on the scrap heaps of Time. The new movement will issue, as all great religious movements have issued and ever must issue, from the People, and not from the churches as such. The Van Mission, therefore, in going to the People is guided by a true instinct. It ought to have a great future. But there are dangers. Corruptio optimi pessima.

L. P. JACKS.

MISS MARIAN PRITCHARD, LONDON.

It is very pleasant to have the opportunity of sending a New Year's greeting to a larger circle of friends than we can reach by means of the postman, and therefore I gladly accept your invitation, dear Mr. Editor, to make use of your columns for this purpose. A very happy New Year to all friends who read these lines!

There are still a few folk here and there who look with disdain on the keeping of these special times and seasons, but, for my part, I think they are amongst the most precious legacies left to us from our forefathers; for did these landmarks disappear, the world would lose much of its glorious warmth and colour, and its trials and difficulties would be much harder to conquer.

Do we not all remember some long country excursion we have made, perhaps in the days of long ago? Many hours of steady walking were before us, and we went on and on; gradually our feet became weary, the beautiful stretches of country seemed to pass so quickly, while the stony places appeared almost interminable. How glad we were when at last a halt was called! How we stretched ourselves on the green grass, and rested, and ate, and recalled with hearty laugh some of the difficulties which, at the time of occurrence, we had well nigh thought insurmountable. Then came out our maps and our compass; we looked to see if we had come by the right road, and we made up our minds which would be the best way to continue. Finally, we put on our knapsacks or side-pockets again, and started on with fresh courage and vigour.

And surely the observance of these landmarks of Life's Journey are just as delightful and refreshing as were the halting places in our day's excursion. The sterner business of life has been put aside for merry-making with our children in the Christmas festival of peace and goodwill; there has been time for "backward looking o'er the past," in order to see whether we are in the right path; and finally, here we are beginning the New Year, refreshed, reinvigorated, and, I trust, full of hope for the future.

MARIAN PRITCHARD.

THE REV. J. H. WEATHERALL, BANK-STREET CHAPEL, BOLTON.

There does not seem to be anything in the immediate outlook to stir up a mighty enthusiasm amongst us, and to send us singing on our way through the year to come. The liberal movement in theology, from which so much was hoped, does no good to the Unitarian churches, whose happiest time was when the morose god of the penal theologies gave them the opportunity of an effective moral protest. Unfortunately for Unitarianism, its baptism into liberal theology was too previous; if it had been postponed a generation its liberalism might have been idealist and Christian and glowing, instead of realist and rationalist and dry. In the political situation there is no grist for the Unitarian mill, unless in Disestablishment the old Unitarian plea for veracity be heard again. For the present our text ought to be, "Stablish the things that remain, that were ready to die." It was said of Lord Randolph Churchill that he had a brilliant future behind him; the words will serve as our epitaph unless we reform. Our chief need is an honest stock-taking. In mission work the whole policy of starting new churches that, under the most favourable conditions, must remain mendicant for many years, needs reconsideration. Half our pessimism is due to the tale, repeated at every meeting of our local associations, of the failure of churches that never had the prospect of successful life. Let our ambition be at present to fill the churches we have with a full congregation at every service. Then the future will take care of our mission work. If we cannot succeed handsomely in the towns where we are, we shall do no better elsewhere. There is no law of Nature to ordain that a Unitarian building shall be one-third full. And, on the theological side, there is urgent need of reconstruction and restatement. Penny tracts won't do it. There would be some instructive answers if we canvassed our people for answers to such questions as these:—"What is the theory of a Unitarian congregation?" "Is it in any sense a Divine society?" "What spiritual functions does it possess, and when and where and how are they exercised?" "What, other than pecuniary, are the obligations of its members?" One would be glad to see our expensive colleges helping us in the work of theological restatement. They have not neglected historical criticism or philosophy, but they have done little for our systematic theology.

J. H. WEATHERALL.

Bolton, December 31, 1906.

THE REV. ALEXANDER WEBSTER, ABERDEEN:

I would place as the first article in a man's faith the belief that he is in some way needed; that there is a definite work for him to do which does not lie at the hand of any other, and that his religion consists in the doing of that work. His personality is to him the nearest and divinest fact. It indicates his life-business. When he "comes to himself," he is not very far from God.

The second article of his faith may well be "My life shall be a challenge; not a truce." He has to challenge each thought ere he gives it a place in his mind. Each affection ere he harbours it in his heart. Everything for its right to be, even the cherubim that keep the way of the higher life, so as to know facts from fancies and truth from falsehood. And being intent on living rightly, a man should also set it down as an item of his faith that to suffer is not the supreme evil, but to be unserviceable; The strenuous struggler is never permanently hurt. He is repaired by his struggling energy. The struggle for service gives a broad mastery of life, a lucidity of intellect, a fortitude of heart, and an august wisdom which far more than make up for the wounds got by the way.

Another article of faith may be added: in true life there are neither false heroisms nor rebellious cynicism. The true heroism is in the soul that keeps its place, and takes its share of the world's burden. The conscientious man does not charge his dyspepsia to God, nor imagine that his headache is due to an eternal fault in nature. Probably the last thing that comes to us is the purification of passion, the sifted, clarified, mellowed, radiant serenity of the wholly victorious soul. Ere that comes we have to recall our misplaced affections, give up all the frauds we practice on ourselves, work out the last dissonant vibration of selfishness, reconcile each faculty with another, and steady our souls by ballast of wealthy wisdom. We may never be without flaw, but the course of our life will not flow through the flaw, but past it or over it with watchful wariness of the fracture. ALEX. WEBSTER.

MR. JOHN DENDY, MANCHESTER.

"What shall we hope for in the New Year?" "Let us," said he, "pray that we be not made too comfortable." The fire was warm, the chair easy, his dinner had been good, outside snow fell, and wind blew; nevertheless he continued in this wise: "The desire for comfort is become a disease in our time, a corruption of civilisation. Comfort, beginning with warmth, degenerates into stuffiness. Our minds follow the trick of our bodies, and hug cushions when they should be tasting storms. Our house of life is a group of little overheated apartments, political and social, theological and moral, for the most part with windows closed and blinds down for fear of draughts. We make them seem larger by hanging mirrors which reflect only our own furniture, designed by others. We move from one to another cautiously keeping the front door closed; fully persuaded that no house is so good as ours. Outside the great elemental forces play fiercely and beautifully. Of them are bred storm and danger, difficulty and doubt, also strength and light, health and high endeavour. Yet our wisdom consists in dodging them, our success in taking refuge behind stuccoed walls and accommodating creeds. To miss comfort, bodily and spiritual, is to fail in life. To live in the open is altogether too dangerous. Shall we not amend our prayer and cry, 'From too much comfort, from all stuffiness of mind and soul, from the fear of the unknown and the terror of the change that is at hand, from the conceit of small opinions about great things, and the self that does so sorely beset us, Good Lord, deliver us'? Let us stand up and go outside."

JOHN DENDY.

THE REV. W. J. JUPP, FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH, CROYDON.

You demand, Sir Editor, "a message of greeting and exhortation" to put folk "into good heart" for the coming year.

I respond as to the "greeting;" the "exhortation" I must leave to others, being, in relation to that, much more in the mood to receive than to give.

How dare I exhort you, or your readers, favoured as I am, unduly—sitting here at a window wide open, southwards, to the sea and sky, with the winter sun shining through, and the sound of the waves coming up, as the tide sways shoreward, calm and full. But I greet you, and all the world! How otherwise, with these broad spaces of air and morning sunlight drawing out the soul into fellowship with all things! One must needs be in love with life on such a morning, and believe that all its creatures are loveable, if only one's heart were big enough and its finer sensibilities alert and responsive to the charm of existence, lurking somewhere in every form which that existence takes. If only I could greet the good in the worst of men—even in myself as one of the worst—I should call it forth and cheer it into fruition of beauty and joy. Look how the sun, though low in the sky, greets the cold grey sea, and makes it glow with colour! And far out on the horizon, where the broad breast of the sea heaves to meet the bend of the sky, there is a line of golden light, making a path to the end of the endless world. The mystery is there as of old, and the secret of the sea and the sky, like the secret of human destiny, is well kept; and the cry of the sea bird over the waste of waters is like the cry of man's passionate soul down the long wastes of time. But that blending of gold and grey on the far horizon, and the harmony of colour and form in sky and cloud and waters, are symbols of that invisible world which the thoughts of men inhabit—the realm of desire and wonder and hope.

So, in spite of the cold grey mystery of evil and wrong, which is still all about us and within us, we may go forth into the new year bravely enough—with that old human courage of despair which carries in itself all the unuttered prophecies of good; we may greet the Unknown with a cheer, sure that it will not fail to yield its own surprise of gladness and of peace.

To thought and love, expressed in passionate service, all things are possible. The world is as full of need as it is of beauty, and in striving to meet its need we get our clearest vision of its beauty. The world as God makes it every moment is all right; but it is all right, for us, only as we live to transform and transcend it by the light of human reason and the ardour of human love. W. J. JUPP.

THE REV. J. C. ODGERS, ULLET-ROAD CHURCH, LIVERPOOL.

(From the Church Calendar.)

HAIL to the New Year, with its new opportunities, bright hopes, glad anticipations, and unsullied record! Let us greet its coming with renewed trust in the highest and best, and with a heightened resolution to do more than we have done in the past for the truths which we hold, and for the church of which we are members. Our church life is a corporate existence which we should do our utmost to cherish. We should remember that we are not merely a number of listeners, critics, truth-seekers, seat-holders in a building set apart for religious purposes, but that we are fellow-worshippers, members of a free Christian church, bound together by holy bonds, associated for common objects, "helpers of one another's joy." When we come to church it is not to indicate a passive assent to the presentation of a particular form of faith or to the routine of certain religious rites—we come to show a spirit of active co-operation, of kindly interest, and of cordial support. We should be welded together as members of one body, brothers and sisters meeting in one religious home. We look forward hopefully and gladly to the future, but we do not forget the past. The past has made us what we are to-day. Dr. Martineau once said: "I cannot rest contentedly on the past; I cannot take a step towards the future without its support." Yes: we will live in the strength of the past, but we will listen to the call of the future. May the year upon which we have entered be marked by deeper interest, wider activities, and fuller life!

J. COLLINS ODGERS.

THE LATE PRINCIPAL RAINY.

PREACHING in St. Mark's Chapel, Edinburgh, on the Death Roll of the past year, the Rev. R. B. Drummond spoke at some length of the late Principal Rainy, who died at Melbourne, on Saturday, December 22, eighty years of age.

It would be generally admitted, Mr. Drummond said, that Principal Rainy was a man of great ability, of consummate tact, of indefatigable industry, a born leader of men, with profound knowledge of human nature. Not a great theologian, or preacher, or orator—but the man of the hour, the leader of a great movement. Without any self-seeking on his part, or undue influence, he naturally took the first place in securing the union of two of the three great branches of the Presbyterian Church in Scotland. Himself a strong liberationist, he persuaded his party to waive that question, and so removed a chief obstacle to union; and he also prevailed upon the great majority of the old Free Church to adopt an Act similar to that Declaratory Act passed by the United Presbyterian Church, which was the first ostensible step away from the Calvinism of the Disruption Fathers towards a broader and more generous theology. Dr. Rainy was himself, theologically speaking, a broad and moderate-minded man, in favour of tolerance and comprehension within reasonable limits. He could move with the times, but he could not, or rather he would not, move faster than the times. He had nothing of the martyr spirit. He was what is called in politics an opportunist. His qualities were those of the statesman rather than of the reformer. But all this was just what was required for the work he had to do. That work he carried to a successful issue, and in his conduct of it, his only fault as a statesman was that he underestimated the strength of the opposition and consequently took no pains to conciliate it. It was a serious fault, and went far to mar the completeness of his triumph. To him, as to others, the Lord Chancellor's judgment declaring that the whole property of the church belonged to the very small minority who had opposed the union came like a bolt from the blue, and never, perhaps, did Dr. Rainy appear a greater man than in that hour of trial. It was a terrible blow, but he rose at once superior to calamity, and abated no jot of heart or hope. Principal Rainy was certainly a great leader, and succeeded in carrying through a movement for which the time was ripe; yet, I am not sure that he was one who roused great enthusiasm in his followers, or attached them to him by strong personal ties. His name, however, will go down to posterity as the leader of a movement, which perhaps even more than he himself was aware, was a movement of reform, and which meant ultimately an end to the doctrine of exclusive salvation, the beginning of a more enlightened theology and the establishment of the right of free criticism of the Bible.

WILLASTON SCHOOL.

SIR,—It must be with the greatest pleasure that we read the notice of the success in natural science of a Willaston boy.

Having lately been at Willaston School lecturing, I can heartily testify to the capabilities of the school. All that is required is boys. As one who has had considerable and varied experience of schools and teaching, I most confidently recommend, nay urge, parents and guardians to entrust their boys to the care of the new headmaster, his experienced wife, and able staff, and support a school which works on right, modern, open lines.

THE LAND OF OPHIR.

SIR,—I notice in your issue of December 29 your correspondent, Rev. J. Tyssul Davis, thinks that Mashonaland is the Land of Ophir. The general opinion is, however, that Somali, to the south of the Gulf of Aden, is the Land of Ophir. The Egyptians called the district Punt, and got so much gold from there, that at one time silver was the more precious metal. The remark about the solid towers and monoliths is a pure guess; but one repeated so often, that it is now accepted without proof.

KENNETH LUPTON.

Lystra Villas, Leckhampton-road,
Cheltenham, January 1, 1907.

FRIENDS who are interested in the work of Mr. Horace M. Livens (brother of the Rev. H. M. Livens) have an opportunity during January of seeing eight of his pictures in the exhibition at the Rowley Gallery, Silver-street (within two minutes' walk of Notting Hill-gate Station on the Inner Circle), in which he joins with three brother artists, Frank Brangwyn, A.R.A., A. D. Peppercorn, and Bertram Priestman. There are here two examples of Mr. Livens's brilliant paintings of fowls, and other subjects in still life. The pictures need plenty of light.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

LONDON.

THE announcement of the retirement of the Rev. William Wooding from the ministry at Stoke Newington Green suggests much that is interesting, both on the historical and the personal side. The retiring minister has worthily sustained the honour of a pulpit associated with names famous in Presbyterian story, such as Rees, Lindsay, Towers, Amory, and, most celebrated of all, Richard Price. The congregation was founded, I think, about two centuries ago; anyway, the old chapel was built in 1708. It was but a modest little meeting-house, and when it was enlarged in 1860 its dimensions were still comparatively small. But some choice spirits have found a religious home there in each succeeding generation, and an audience which to-day includes Pritchards, Turners, Youngs, and Titfords—to go no further—is one that demands enlightened service and calls for the preacher's best. For twenty-five years Mr. Wooding has successfully responded to this high demand, and it is sorely against his hearers' will that he is now seeking rest from regular pulpit work. Let us all congratulate him on the vigour with which he has gone on, and the vigour with which he leaves off. Many years, we trust, are before him, and his strong manly voice is needed. Mrs. Barbauld, one of the famous attendants at Stoke Newington a hundred years ago, records that an old-time minister there besought the Lord that "when we come to die we may have nothing to do but to die." With womanly shrewdness, Mrs. Barbauld preferred the contemplation of dying, as we should say, in harness. There is still plenty to be done, and our friend will perhaps now find ways of helping the general movement which have hitherto been closed by the claims of his pulpit work, added to arduous teaching duties. As for the congregation, it has no need of anything but a leader; we trust the new leader will be soon found.

Turning to the life of our congregations as a whole I have reason to believe that faithful effort is being put forth all round. I need not say that effort is required. London is no lubberland for our churches, nor, in general, for churches of any kind. The crush and whirl, the care and competition, the dissipation, the poverty, the riches, and the middle-class inertness—all the old features of this amazing metropolitan life—are as prominent as ever. But many are faithful, some hopeful, in the midst of it all. Results differ; in most cases there is encouragement, at least, visible to the thankful mind; in all there is room for improvement.

The signs of the times were surely never more prophetic of a speedy diffusion of liberal religious views. The "New Theology" movement is growing more courageous, if not more definite, every year. The recent utterances of the Rev. R. J. Campbell at least have left no doubt where he stands; the upholders of the old Evangelical doctrine are aghast. Mr. Lewis, the successor of Dr. Guinness Rogers at Clapham, appears to have provoked so much alarm by his outspoken acceptance of views which were terrifying to the orthodox fathers, that serious proceedings are on foot in his congregation. Elsewhere, one catches echoes in the same key. On the other hand, here is Mr. G. Bernard Shaw frankly (how else?) admonishing Churchmen respecting things obsolete, and, at the same time, confessing convictions which a little while ago would have seemed impossible to him—all tending very directly along the path we Unitarians have been trying to lay down these many years. It is the hour for the fearless renewal of our labours.

Amidst our usual activities some exceptional events have happened. We have had a plentiful crop of bazaars and sales of work; the need for them tells a tale which calls for no exposition, their organisation and completion bear witness to industry and ingenuity on the part of many somebodies. Some of these enterprises have had special reference to building schemes and some to current expenses. So far as I have learned all have yielded good, if not overflowing, harvests.

By and by, unless I am much mistaken, some new effort of an organised kind will be needed, if our long-contemplated "new churches" are not to be unconscionably delayed. Readers should need no telling that at Plumstead, Lewisham, and Kilburn we have land ready and congregations well alive, but insufficiently housed. A tantalising sum of money is available to build the proper church structures—a large sum, and yet too small. The congregations referred to, and their ministers, are pluckily holding on; but the trial must be a severe one all round, and the sooner it is ended the better. I am glad to hear that private munificence is giving our Missioner at Limehouse, the Rev. J. Toye, more adequate accommodation for his excellent work among the very poor.

Friends in the country have noticed, and some more than noticed, the appeal made by a joint committee on behalf of the Boston Fund. (Of course, I mean "the Fund for helping to send a body of representative ministers from this country to the meeting at Boston, U.S.A., of the International Council of Unitarian and"—well, &c. I beg to say again, simply, the Boston Fund.) It must be a great disappointment to our good friend, Dr. Herbert Smith, that the breakdown in his health still prevents him from carrying successfully forward the scheme which he so chivalrously championed many months ago. I think the distance of the date of the meeting probably dulled the imagination of many then who, now we are in 1907, will realise the necessity of prompt action. Berths will soon have to be secured, and other arrangements made both at home and in the States. Happily, a considerable response has been made already to the joint appeal, and the "promise of a shower" seems really in the air. I refer to the matter in this letter not because London has any special claim in the matter, beyond initiating and organising the fund. The whole life of our churches throughout the country will assuredly receive new and abiding stimulus, as Dr. Herbert Smith prophesied, from the contemplated embassy of our preachers to a land, a scene, and a people so abounding in life-giving impulses.

Meanwhile, to return strictly to our own flocks, it is pleasant to observe that, on January 20, there is to be something like a "General Post" (the phrase is not mine but a learned brother's) among our London pulpits. The notion is due to the conference between the Committee of the London District Unitarian Society and representatives of the congregations which took place in October, and to which I referred in my former letter. This interchange will surely promote mutual knowledge and fellowship among a people far too content with isolation; and the preachers will experience the educative effect of looking another audience in the face. Later on, in March, I understand, there will be in many districts series of lectures delivered by visiting ministers grouped together for this purpose; and these may be expected, if the subjects are well-chosen and well-announced, to stir up local interest. Perhaps my lay brother at the end of the church would add: "if well-treated and well-delivered." I agree; so do we all, quite unanimously. The dear lay brother (or sister) will really help in these last particulars by cultivating in the New Year the habit of regular attendance and hearty participation in the good work of the church. Many things go to the making of a great preacher; cold neglect is not one of them.

W. G. TARRANT.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Aberdeen.—At the annual Sunday-school party, on Saturday, December 29, the school was reported in a prosperous condition, showing an increase of 27 scholars for the year. The principal item on the programme was the performance by some thirty of the children of a musical piece entitled "Princess Paragona."

Boatle.—On Sunday afternoon, December 23, selections from the "Messiah" were beautifully rendered by an augmented choir and orchestra at the Free Church; after the evening service a sacred concert was given.

Chichester (Presentation).—The Rev. C. A. Hoddinott, having completed the eightieth year of his life, and twenty-first year of his pastorate at Chichester, the congregation remained after the close of service, on Sunday evening last, to congratulate him, and to express the hope that he would be spared for a long while yet "to continue the good work he has so long and ably done here." The treasurer (Mr. G. Bowers) afterwards handed him a written address, and a purse containing four sovereigns, as the congregation's tribute, with best wishes also for Mrs. Hoddinott. Mr. Hoddinott is still remarkably active, and preached at the workhouse last Sunday afternoon.

Dover.—On the evening of Peace Sunday Mrs. Ginever, the minister's wife, was the preacher at Adrian-street Chapel, when a congregation of between eighty and ninety were present. She dwelt upon the incompatibility of war with that brotherhood, that love of one's enemy, which Christ taught. The evolution of the nation from the family of primitive man was traced, and with it the gradual restriction of war by the action of the law; and Mrs. Ginever showed how history should thus encourage us to hope and work for its complete abolition. Public opinion was in this matter of great weight. Men and women, the world over, were coming to see that war is a terrible evil. Everyone might help in extending this opinion, and who more so than the mother, who could thus train her children to aid in inaugurating the Kingdom of Peace.

Halifax.—The services at Northgate end Chapel were conducted on Infirmary Sunday by the Rev. W. Mellor, of Huddersfield. There was special music by the choir in the evening, and the Orchestral Society gave a concert in the chapel in the afternoon. The collections for the days (£6 9s. 9½d.) were for the Royal Halifax Infirmary. The Christmas Day morning service was conducted by the Rev. John Ellis, and the offertory (£5 10s. 4½d.) was for the Poor's Purse. The annual tea-meeting was on Wednesday, December 26; after tea Mr. J. Sayer was in the chair, and short addresses were given by the Revs. H. D. Roberts, of Liverpool; H. McLachlan, of Hunslet; J. A. Pearson, of Oldham; and John Ellis. There is to be a sale of work in February to help to re-decorate the chapel, put in electric light, and improve the organ.

Hinckley.—At the Christmas morning service at the Great Meeting, the Rev. T. J. Jenkins preached on "The Ministry of Childhood." Special hymns and anthems were rendered by the choir, under the conductorship of Mr. H. Atkins, J.P., and the G.M. band played a selection of sacred music.

Kidderminster.—The fifteenth annual "Robin" breakfast was held in the Town Hall and Corn Exchange early on Christmas morning, organised by the Guild of the Good Shepherd, in connection with the New Meeting House. The members of the Guild not only collect the funds for this "annual," but they divide themselves into six districts, with a secretary to each, and in this way they find out who are the poorest children that may not have a good breakfast on Christmas morning. They received the able assistance of the police, and other agencies. This year provision was made for over 1,000 children, and it was a very merry scene among the "Robins" on Christmas morning. They sang "Hark, the Herald Angels Sing," and then after grace, breakfast began. As it proceeded, the Mayor (Mr. W. Adams) went round and gave a new penny to each of the children, and Mr. E. Adams, as Father Christmas, distributed gifts. At the close of the feast, the Rev. J. E. Stronge, president of the Guild, was supported on the platform by the Mayor and Mayoress, Colonel and Mrs. W. H. Talbot, Rev. C. D. Badland, and others. Mr. Stronge explained the object of the festival, and moved a vote of thanks to the Mayor, which was enthusiastically passed. A telegram of greeting was received from the Rev. E. D. P. Evans, the founder of the breakfast, and a response sent to him at Bury.

London: Lewisham.—At the tenth annual Christmas party for the Sunday-school children and their friends, on Friday, December 28, the plays, "Aladdin in Japan," and "Absence makes the heart grow fonder" were given. On Wednesday the minister and Mrs. Pope, the hon. treasurer, and the hon. sec. and Mrs. Warren, were "At Home" at the church to all members and friends of the congregation. The weather was favourable, and the church was crowded. The main object of the gathering was to become better acquainted with the new members, and to afford those of longer acquaintance an opportunity for a chat, which is scarcely possible on the Sunday. Many new friendships were formed, and it is believed the congregation will be a little stronger for this New Year's "At Home." Vocal and instrumental music and readings added to the enjoyment of the evening.

London: Limehouse.—On New Year's eve the Durning Hall teachers had a social gathering, at which they made gifts to three of their number who had come of age. At 11 o'clock the teachers adjourned, and the doors were thrown open to the people of the neighbourhood. Coffee and biscuits were served, after which the whole company passed up into the larger hall, where a few of the band were playing Christmas hymns. The usual Watch-night Service was conducted by Rev. J. Toye, and, as on former occasions, the place was filled to its utmost capacity.

Newcastle-under-Lyme.—On Wednesday, December 26, the ladies of the newly-formed sewing meeting held their first sale of work. Considering the wintry weather the proceeds were very satisfactory. At the annual Sunday-school tea-party and prize-giving next day an operetta on "Nursery Rhymes" was well given by the children.

Rochdale (Resignation).—At a special meeting of the members of the Rochdale congregation last Sunday the Rev. T. P. Spedding's resignation of the pulpit was accepted. Mr. Spedding's twenty years' pastorate in Rochdale thus terminates in February. A resolution expressing gratitude for his long and strenuous services in the town on behalf of Unitarianism, and wishing him all possible success in his important new work, was cordially passed.

MR. TCHERTKOFF has issued from the Free Age Press, Christchurch, Hants, a forcible pictorial tract against War: Pictures by Emile Holarek, with readings on the subject from the writings of Tolstoy, Maupassant, Channing, and others. The contrasts and the horrors of war are ruthlessly depicted. The tract, in large quarto size, may be had for 1d., or on better paper, 6d.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE National Conference Union for Social Service has arranged to hold a public meeting in Manchester on Wednesday evening next, in the Memorial Hall. The chair will be taken at half-past seven by the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed, President of the Union, and among the speakers announced are the Revs. Joseph Wood, H. D. Roberts, and Charles Peach, Councillor Wigley, Miss Harriet Johnson of Liverpool, and Miss Catherine Gittins of Leicester, one of the secretaries of the Union.

A MESSAGE from Norwich on Thursday tells us that the meeting of the Committee to decide as to the plans for the Martineau Memorial is postponed until Tuesday next, and that £450 is still needed to complete the fund.

THE new number of the Hibbert Journal, strong and rich in interest as ever, has an article in French by M. Paul Sabatier, "La Crise Religieuse en France et en Italie," instinct with his eager faith in the power of the younger Catholics to make something new and better of their Church. With that faith English readers may already have become familiar through the translation of M. Sabatier's little book on "Disestablishment in France" by Mr. Robert Dell, issued last year by Mr. Fisher Unwin, with an introduction by the translator, and the text, in French and English of the Separation Law.

THE new Irish Licensing Act has come into force with the New Year, the public-houses on Saturday night being closed at ten o'clock instead of eleven, as hitherto. The Sunday Closing part of the Act started on Sunday, when licensed premises were opened from two to five instead of from two to seven. Telegrams from Limerick and Cork state that no difficulty was experienced in putting the Act into operation.

THE Archbishop of Canterbury, the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Westminster, and Mr. Scott Lidgett, President of the National Council of the Evangelical Free Churches, issued on New Year's Day the following joint manifesto on the subject of Sunday observance:—

"As representatives of various Christian bodies in England, we desire to call the attention of our fellow countrymen to the combined efforts which are being made to set forth explicitly and forcibly the principle of Sunday observance.

"We believe it to be literally impossible to exaggerate the importance of this matter to the well-being of the nation.

"It is not merely that one day's rest in seven contributes vastly to the physical and mental efficiency of men, women, and children, and tends to make our home life more truly what English home life ought to be. There is more than this. Under the sacred sanction which attaches to the Lord's Day it is intended that all should have opportunity, in the worship of Almighty God, to escape from the grip of ordinary cares and occupations into regions of higher thought and nobler aspiration.

"We are convinced that on adequate and reasonable Sunday observance depends in no small measure the possibility of promoting in England the deeper, the more sacred, and the more enduring interests in our common life."

For further information as to what is proposed to be done by the 'Sunday National Observance Movement, the hon. secretaries may be addressed at 1, Albemarle-street, London, W.

A LAFFAN telegram serves to remind us afresh of the national tragedy which is suddenly preparing in Russia. We have not been hearing quite so much lately of the atrocities by which the Government of the Tsar is being carried on, although we know in general terms that the prisons are overcrowded, that life as well as liberty is insecure, that no age, even the youngest, and neither sex is any defence against the police and the military. Yet this last telegram claims attention. The Tsar has decided to do away with his Ministers of the Army and Marine. It seems unimportant, but then these ministers sat in the last Duma, and were required to answer interpellations as to court-martial and such like illegal or extra legal proceedings. A new Duma is to meet, but there will be no official there to answer questions about army or navy. It is a decision which serves to increase the gloomy forebodings with which all observers look forward to the assembly of the new Duma.

To the second edition of his book, "Red Rubber," published by Mr. Fisher Unwin, Mr. E. D. Morel adds a new preface on the present situation. He wrote while the debate in the Belgian Chamber was still in progress, with little hope of good result therefrom. "For the rest," he says, "I can only repeat here what I have stated in this book. Until some Power (or Powers) insists upon the integral application in the Congo of the fundamental principles of the Berlin Conference, principles which obtain everywhere in the African tropics except, by a strange irony, in that vast portion of them to which the Act applies, the horrors of the Congo will continue on an ever-increasing scale, whether under the Congo, or under the Belgian flag. The Congo native, like the native of every part of the African tropics, must be protected in his rights in land, property, and labour. All those rights have been swept away from him by the most colossal act of spoliation ever imagined by mortal man: The right of trading freely in the produce of his soil, and in the fruits of his labour must be restored to him. . . . To remove from a primitive community the right to trade is to strangle for ever the economic development of that community, to reduce it to perpetual sterility, or to enslave it."

WHAT will now be done Mr. Morel does not venture to predict, but as to what the Government of this country ought to do he has no doubt:—"The Government should proclaim before all the world its unshakable determination to repudiate absolutely and entirely these claims to the land, the produce of the soil, and the labour of the Congo native set up by King Leopold. It should decline before the world to even discuss any pretensions founded upon such impossible and utterly immoral claims. It should declare them to be a negation of the most vulgar conceptions of civilised and uncivilised usage; opposed to all the legitimate interests of commercial nations; and a violation of the Berlin Act. It should declare its unalterable determination not to recognise these claims, in practice, when the legitimate interests of British subjects, white or black, in the Congo, or in the territories adjacent to it, are affected by them. And, coupled with these declarations, it should provide, in the shape of an increased Consular staff, furnished with powers of jurisdiction, and with independent means of conveyance, the machinery whereby its declarations can, in practice, be rendered effective. In so doing it would have a united nation at its back."

MR. MOREL repeats, in conclusion, the grave warning of Sir Harry Johnston as to the dangers of procrastination in this matter, and adds:—"There is in the atmosphere of England at this moment a singular determination to liberate, with God's help, the natives of the Congo from their unspeakable bondage, and to save Europe the shame of tolerating, by consent, the revival, under worse forms, of the African Slave Trade. It is a force to reckon with. It is a force which finds expression in these words of the Bishop of Southwark, words noble and true:—"On the attitude and action of this country in reference to the Congo will depend in a great degree England's own moral future." The statesman who comprehended this feeling of determination, based not upon unreasoning sentimentalism, but upon a sober realisation of responsibilities historically incurred, upon the clearest common sense and the soundest political wisdom, would create for himself in the annals of this country, an immortality—to paraphrase Sir Harry Johnston—of good renown. Next March marks the centenary of the passage through both Houses of Parliament of the Total Abolition of Slavery Bill. The statesman who introduced that Bill into the House of Commons was Lord Howick, first Earl Grey, and Sir Edward Grey is that nobleman's collateral descendant."

On the subject of Self-Government for India we have this week a welcome letter from Sir R. K. Wilson, referring to our quotations last week from the Spectator. Sir William Markby wrote to the Spectator in reply to the same article, referring to Japan as an example of how chances may come even to Oriental peoples, and deprecating the use of the term "autocratic," as applied to the Government of India:—"The King and Parliament are a despotic power in England, and in exactly the same sense they are a despotic power in India: The true grievance of India, however, does not lie here, but in the practical exclusion of Indians from all share in this power, which in England is diffused very widely. In short, it is exactly the same grievance as is now felt by many women in England. To them, as to the people of India, the Government is a despotism. And it would be a great mistake to suppose that this grievance is only felt by a minute fraction of Indians. Does the native Press, not only of Bengal, but of Madras, of Bombay, of the Punjab, of Lucknow, represent nobody? Are we to imagine (as Mr. Meredith Townsend once asked) that the Indian Press alone in the world represents precisely the ideas which its constituency disapproves? And are we for ever to go on saying that to share the government with Indians is an absolute impossibility? Surely it is not on moral grounds that this can be said, for we have already handed over to them the larger share in the administration of justice. Do we not pride ourselves on the efficiency and purity of our administration of justice, and do the moral qualities of the judges contribute nothing to them? Again, have we not established in a large part of India a system of co-operation between British and native authority which, whilst it places the ultimate responsibility for good government on British shoulders, leaves to the native Princes a large freedom of action? If co-operation in this form between ourselves and Indians (not as our nominees) is possible, why should a like co-operation in any other form be so absolutely inadmissible?"

ON this the editor of the Spectator noted: "We pointed out that the antiseptic of despotism in India is its dependence on the free democratic Government of Britain, and we realised that this also involved the supremacy of the law. We were careful, therefore, not to describe the Indian Government as arbitrary, for that it most certainly is not. We admit, however, that despotic, non-representative, or non-democratic would be a better description of the government that we hold to be suitable to India than autocratic. If the ultimate power is not to be with the representative body, it is better not to establish such a body."

DR. JAMES KERR, the head of the health section of the educational work of the London County Council, has just presented his annual report, a volume full of valuable information, and one which may well serve to remind us of phases of public work which do not count much in the popular imagination, but are of incalculably more importance in the lives of the children. The work of medical inspection has been greatly facilitated by the bringing of the denominational schools under the Council, and has been developed very largely since that date. Dr. Kerr is assisted by twenty medical men and a staff of thirty-two nurses, who carry on a vigorous sanitary campaign day by day. The number of children in London elementary schools is not far short of three-quarters of a million, and of this nearly one hundred and fifty thousand a year are selected by the teachers for inspection. The members of the health staff also carry out special and instructive investigations. They have, e.g., taken the measurements of 20,000 children, and from this anthropometrical examination one significant result may be mentioned. The children fall into age groups and "standard" groups. At first sight we should expect height to vary with age. But the thing is not so simple. Of fifty children of ten years of age in Standard 3 he measured and fifty in Standard 4, but of the same age, the latter are taller than the former. Very often, indeed, younger boys in a higher standard are taller than older boys in a lower one. So soon does stunted growth begin to handicap a child in the race of life.

THIS week's Christian World Pulpit contains a sermon by the Rev. Gertrud von Petzold, of Leicester, which she preached in the St. Vincent-street Unitarian Church, on occasion of the Jubilee. The subject of the sermon is "The Cross of Christ." It concludes with Miss Cobbe's well-known lines:—

"Only upon some cross of pain or woe
God's Son may be;
Each soul redeemed from self and sin must know
Its Calvary."

THE second of the Rev. Charles Hargrove's sermons in review of "Thirty Years' Changes of Religious Thought," is published in the January number of his Mill Hill Pulpit, and deals with "The Decay of Dogma." The old view, which regarded heresy as the deadliest of sins, he says, is passing away:—"A brighter day has dawned and of all the changes of these last thirty years I know none more important than that which is now appearing. It is not that old dogmas are losing their hold on the minds of men. If new ones take their place though there may be much gained yet the old obligation is not loosed and men will still be bound to believe though the articles of belief be different. Nay we might have articles of unbelief not a whit less stringently enforced by public opinion and penalty of disfavour than affirmations have been in the past. The spirit of bigotry and intolerance is a world-wide influence and it must be withstood wherever it shows itself, whether in the garb of orthodoxy or heresy, in the interests of socialism or Catholicism, of Church or dissent. The great change is that dogma itself is passing away. Men still believe and their belief is the vital force which invigorates and directs their lives. But they believe not because they must but because they are persuaded. Their reasons may be strong or weak, mostly they are only afterthoughts to justify the faith which comes to them as satisfying a sense of want. They have experienced the power of religion in one or other of the many forms under which it presents itself and their experience produces conviction, a conviction which is generally quite independent of reason." That last sentence appears to us to need guarding against misunderstanding, for religious conviction, based on experience of life, must surely gain the full assent of reason, if it is to prove reliable and of enduring worth. Reason and emotion both go to the making of experience.

IN the Christmas number of the South African News one of the most interesting things is a story by the Rev. R. Balmforth, of Cape Town, entitled, "Cyril Hartford's Engagement." The moral issue involved in indentured labour is dexterously woven in with the love-problem of the story. The large circle of Mr. Balmforth's friends, which is by no means confined to the members of the Free Protestant Church, is rejoicing in the almost complete recovery of his health. His medical adviser, however, has decided against a voyage to England, which has therefore been abandoned. The Rev. J. Tyssul Davis, who went out to give Mr. Balmforth a much needed rest from ministerial work, is now, we believe, on his way home.

DR. G. S. BARRETT at the close of last year completed forty years' of service as minister of the Princes-street Congregational Church at Norwich.

DR. JOHN WATSON (Ian Maclaren) is leaving Liverpool, and is to sail next month for a lecturing tour in America. On his return he thinks of settling in the neighbourhood of London, but he has been nominated for the Principalship of the Westminster College, Cambridge. Dr. Oswald Dykes, who is now seventy-one, is retiring from the Principalship, which he has held since 1888.

DR. VAUGHAN PRYCE has resigned the Principalship of New College, and will retire at Midsummer. Last Sunday Principal Rowlands, of the Brecon Memorial College, passed away, being seventy years of age. He served a few years ago as chairman of the Welsh Congregational Union.

THE late Captain William Lowrie, of Newcastle-on-Tyne, among a large number of legacies, has bequeathed £200 each to the Church of the Divine Unity and the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Christian Association, and a further £50 to the Association for the circulation of the Memoir of Dr. Channing. The residue of the estate, which is said to be over £9,000, is to be equally divided among a number of institutions and societies selected in the broadest spirit of benevolence and religious catholicity. The Salvation Army, the Peace Society, and R.S.P.C.A., hospitals, Sailors' Homes and the Christian Endeavour Society are among those who will benefit.

ON New Year's Day the New College buildings at Edinburgh were restored to the United Free Church of Scotland.

TOWARDS SOCIAL REFORM.

COLLECTIVE OWNERSHIP: ITS ETHICAL SIGNIFICANCE.

THERE is a prevalent impression that the advent of limited liability companies, and especially their later developments into combinations and trusts, have distinctly lowered the tone of morality in commercial and industrial affairs.

The severance of the personal relations between the actual profit recipient and the worker earning the profit; the fact that large numbers of the owners probably never see the place where their property is situated, or the people by whom it is worked, but see it only on paper, and hear of it once a year at the annual meeting; the handing over of entire management to men who are themselves servants, and not the actual owners, these and other accompanying circumstances have given rise to this pessimistic idea. The scandals connected with the more notorious company promotions, the abuse of power on the part of large combinations of capitalists striving for monopoly, have confirmed and increased this opinion.

It has found expression in a terse and homely phrase; that a limited company has "neither a soul to be saved nor a body to be kicked." It is doubtful, however, whether this impression, prevalent as it is, is true.

That the evils and abuses generally connected with limited companies are there is undoubted, but that they constitute a true picture of the effect of the change as a whole is by no means certain; and, I venture to think, far from being correct.

In the first place, the element of risk on the part of the actual promoters and owners is largely reduced. This is the whole object of "limited liability," and in the reduction of risk the temptations toward really cruel and mean conduct in business are very distinctly lessened.

What is it that for the most part produces the anxious face, the careworn looks, the nervous manner of the worried "City man"? It is the fear that he and those as dear to him as himself, may be drawn down into the vortex of poverty, of the struggle for existence in which so many perish, and from which all would desire most earnestly to escape. The risk of such a result is not eliminated, in some speculative cases it is probably increased, but in the greater part of the operations of a great industrial change like this, there can be no question that the collective ownership and consequent sharing of risk of commercial operations has considerably reduced it.

Again, the ordinary shareholder who is a part owner of an undertaking need not be consciously engaged in mere selfish money-getting by means of that part ownership, certainly not to the same extent as if he were dependent entirely upon that one ownership for livelihood, comfort, and provision for the future. He may be so engaged in another capacity, but that is not the point. The fact that from being sole owner of one, he becomes part owner of many concerns, which he does not manage nor conduct himself, this change reduces the temptation to become absorbed in mere money-getting, compelling business to occupy his mind from early morning to late at night, even into his dreams.

Then it may fairly be urged that the transition of the active and managing director of affairs from the architect of his own fortunes to a builder for others to a greater extent than for himself is a gain from a moral point of view. True, some men seem willing to do for a company what they would scorn to do for themselves; but more, I am inclined to believe, find in the conscious exercise of faculties for others' benefit and not so entirely for their own, a position giving greater opportunities for the exercise of moral qualities of no mean order.

"I must do my best for the shareholders" is a bracing appeal to energy and thought of a finer type than that which simply puts it mentally in the shape, "I must do my best for myself."

The change from the private firm to the limited company seems, however, to lose even the advantages just claimed for it, when we come to consider the position of the ordinary labourer, or "hand." The avowed object of a union of private businesses into a company or a combination of companies has often been to economise in the use of labour, to reduce the number of workers and to eliminate competition among employers in regard to the rate of wage for a particular work. The relation of the factory worker, or labourer, in the employ of a private firm, was much oftener of a friendly and personal nature than is possible to the worker in a large factory, who never sees his employers from one year's end to another. Wages are an item in a balance sheet to be kept as low as possible. The fact that numbers of men are working for 16s. and 17s. a week in the manufacturing districts, for 14s. to 15s. in the docks, and women for still smaller amounts, sums quite insufficient for the barest necessities of life, becomes advantageous to the shareholder or collective owner, whose profits increase, while the wages of the actual workers decrease. See the comparison between profits and wages in Mr. Chiozza Money's book on "Riches and Poverty." The individual employer of teneer recognised that he could not justifiably pay a man an absolutely insufficient wage.

We must eliminate, for the most part, the agricultural interest from such a statement, but the fact remains that there were numerous instances of such a recognition of a moral obligation. They have not disappeared under limited companies, especially limited companies largely under the control of one man, but they are distinctly rare, and the well-known character of a few, such as Messrs. Cadbury's, Rowntree's and Lever's works at home, and the National Cash Register Co.'s in the United States prove by their very exceptional character how different is the rule.

The lack of interest on the part of the shareholder owner begets a like lack of interest on the part of the "hand." The human element—the moral element—tends more and more to disappear under the influence of this change in industrial ownership. Such advantages as the worker wins he wins by co-operation and union with his mates. It is trade unionism and not limited liability companies or collective ownership in this shape which has improved the position of the worker.

A new type of collective ownership has arisen, and is rising in the industrial world, which seems to promise much better ethical results for the workers of all kinds. Municipal and national ownership of industries are multiplying fast, they are meeting with keen and unfriendly criticism, but, despite it all, are fast claiming entire branches of industry for themselves. Already private water companies, gas companies, tramway companies are in the minority.

The argument need not be laboured. What, if any, is the ethical result of the change in this respect? The most striking effect seems to have been upon the workers themselves engaged in such undertakings. Despite very imperfect apprehension, even on the part of municipal, corporation, and public bodies of their moral obligation as employers, sufficient progress has been made to prove that, as a rule, the transfer from private to public ownership has meant better conditions of life, not merely better wages for those employed in the industry so transferred, and the effect upon the character of the men has been marked. The Glasgow, Liverpool, and Manchester omnibus drivers and conductors are a case in point. Those witnesses, and they are many, who have been able to contrast the personnel under the two systems are almost unanimous in their testimony in this respect.

And there is a rational reason for this. Speak to a municipal employee, and you will generally find him conscious of the fact that he is a public servant, with all the sense of responsibility which such a position gives; and that he is in reality working for the common benefit in which he shares to however small an extent. This fact often gives him a perceptibly different outlook upon his work and its reward than was the case before.

In addition to this there is the presence of the influence of public opinion, both as a deterrent and as a protector against arbitrary management. There is a court of appeal in the electorate with respect to municipal and national employment which rarely interferes as yet with a private owner or company doing what it likes with its own. Duty, humanity, fair treatment and fair service have entered into the relationship to an extent not possible under the previous conditions. I am quite aware that this shows itself imperfectly, and partially at present; but it is there, and it is growing, and the prospects are promising that with further extension of public interest in public ownership it will increase rapidly.

This brings us to another ethical advantage in public ownership. The sense of interest and legitimate pride in the benefit which the whole community may derive from a well-conducted public industry. The usual ignorant taunt to the man who boasts of his part ownership of public property: "Your share is a brick, take it and go," shows a total want of capacity to see any but the selfish character of ownership. But a new dignity in ownership dawns upon the man who, in view of a fine public building, or a beautiful park or a gallery, or a well-managed electric tramway service, thinks of it as the property of the community, existing for the public service and benefit in which he can take not his selfish but his collective share, if even we do not give it its higher title, his unselfish share. Here lies the capacity for ethical influence of a refining kind, which may be developed among even the humblest.

The conclusion of these considerations seems to be that collective ownership already shows, public ownership gives promise of more distinctly ethical advance on the part of all classes of the community, owners and workers, or owners and workers combined in the same persons—that is, the community.

OLD MASTERS AT THE ACADEMY.

THE Academy Winter Exhibition at Burlington House, which opened to the public on Monday and remains open till March 16, is of great interest. There are fine examples of Old Masters of Italian and Dutch as well as of British schools, and in the Water-colour room, besides a number of studies by Lord Leighton and chalk drawings by George Dance, R.A., there are some charming examples of Samuel Prout, Thomas Collier, Peter de Wint, and others, and a collection of Turners lent by Sir Donald Currie, twenty of which were sketches made for an illustrated edition of Campbell's poems. Some of the larger pictures, "The Lake of Zürich" (216), "Grenoble," "Rivaulx Abbey," and "The Lake of Thun" (232), are magnificent.

Of the first room, which is chiefly Italian, the gem is Botticelli's "Virgin and Child" (24), lent by Lady Wantage. There are also one or two early Flemish pictures, and Germany is represented by a Dürer and Holbein's "Portrait of a Lady" (13). Of "The Angel of the Annunciation" (22) the catalogue says "Filippino Lippi," but the frame "Botticelli." There is also a Raphael, "La Madonna dei Candelabri" (29).

In the second room there are two striking portraits by Franz Hals, of himself (41), and of Admiral de Ruyter (47). There one can also enjoy Albert Cuyp and admire Jan Steen. There is also Rembrandt's portrait of a woman, known as his "Cook" (58).

The third room is notable by reason of the portraits by British artists, the Reynolds "Viscount Althorp" as a boy (86), and another boy, "Sir George Sinclair" (88), by Sir Henry Raeburn, being specially charming. Gainsborough and Romney are also well represented. There is Turner's "Burning of the Houses of Parliament, Oct. 16, 1834" (113), taken from the Surrey side, with an extraordinary representation of Westminster Bridge, lent by Mr. Holbrook Gaskell.

In the next room the most popular picture will be Wilkie's "Chelsea Pensioners Reading the Waterloo Despatch" (131), lent by the Duke of Wellington, and there is another Turner, lent by Mr. Holbrook Gaskell, "The Devil's Bridge, St. Gothard" (137). Thus it will be seen that there is plenty of variety.

A MAN IN EARNEST.*

NEARLY forty years ago Robert Collyer wrote a brief life of Augustus Conant, with the above happy title, the life of a man worth remembering; and the present abridgment of that work in the new series published by the American Unitarian Association should receive a warm welcome in this country as well as over there. Young men who believe in straightforward simplicity and sincerity and practical grit will like this book. It should be found useful by ministers and teachers of elder classes.

Conant, who was a native of Vermont (he was born in 1811, at Brandon, in that State) went as a young man to the West, and in 1835 settled as a farmer on the Desplaine river, twenty miles N.W. of Chicago, then a very different place from the great city of to-day. Two years later he chanced upon a copy of Freeman Clarke's Western Messenger in Chicago, and was led to read some Unitarian books. Always earnestly religious, this led him after a time into the ministry. He had a year at Cambridge in the Divinity School, and in 1841 settled at Geneva, which he made the centre of very active missionary labours and where he ministered for sixteen years. The story must be read in Mr. Collyer's record, largely told as it is by extracts from the laconic journal which Conant kept. Here are a few samples, as he noted each day:—

- "Wrote on a sermon, read Neander, and made a wheel-barrow.
- "Planted potatoes. Wrote a sermon on Unitarianism.
- "Made benches for the school.
- "Papered my study.
- "Finished sermon. Made soap."

And this record of six consecutive days in 1849, beginning November 12: "Went to Elgin with father to build a cupola for the church. Worked at cupola. Raised cupola. Hung the bell. Preached in the church. Finished the cupola, and went home."

The last act of this brave life was in the Civil War. In July, 1861, Conant became chaplain of the 19th Illinois Regiment, in which one of his sons had enlisted. Passages from two letters to his wife will best tell of the supreme experience of his life.

- "In the Hospital on the Battle-Field:
- "nr. Murfreesborough, Tenn., Jan., 1863.

"DEAR WIFE,—We have been fighting three days nearly on the same ground, and the battle is not yet decided. . . . We have over 100 wounded men in the house, federal and confederates together, and both sides try not to hit the hospital. I worked all night till 4 o'clock in the morning night before last, bringing in the wounded from the battle-field, and while the ambulance was taking the load, I generally remained out in the woods or fields, building fires for the comfort of the poor fellows who were waiting to be taken in, and also hunted them up. While so employed I was made a prisoner by a confederate colonel, and my ambulance and assistants were also captured; but we told them what we were doing, so after some parley they concluded to let us go and keep about our work. Just now, as I wrote, the rebels were in the yard—now again our own men are here, and the house jars and the windows rattle with the discharge of artillery close by us. We are surrounded with a wall of fire, and I can hear the balls sing and the shells burst as I write; but our work of mercy is our protection; we shall be hit only by accident. I need not dwell on this.

"I have often been impatient because I had had so little to do; but the opportunity to help those in need on this battle-field pays all delays. You cannot imagine how much I have enjoyed for the last 48 hours in helping friend and foe.

"When captured, I made one of the confederates help me to bring a wounded Ohio soldier to the fire, as we clasped hands beneath him, I told him we would take one brotherly grip, if we never did again. It was the best right hand of fellowship I ever gave or received. Now I must hasten to my duties, and will write more when more at leisure, the good Lord willing.

"Your affectionate husband,
"A. H. CONANT."

"Same Address, Jan. 5.

"DEAR WIFE,—The storm of battle is over at last, and I have the happiness to inform you that Nero and myself are still unharmed. . . . Since I last wrote you, I have been acting assistant surgeon, nurse, and messenger, and have felt that my opportunities to help those in need have richly paid for all the delay and discontent of the past. I think I must set down the last night of the old year, and the morning of the new, past in the woods on the battle-field gathering up and bringing in the wounded men, as the grandest and happiest night of my life."

—But in February he died in hospital of inflammation of the lungs, brought on by exposure and over-exertion on the battle-field. He was buried at Geneva, and Robert Collyer, who preached the funeral sermon, read the following extract from a paper handed to the son by a wounded soldier as they were leaving the hospital. We cannot better commend the book to our reader than by these extracts:—

"Many hearts will be made sad when they hear that our chaplain has gone to his rest; many a fearless soldier's eye will grow wet when he hears that the brave and noble chaplain, who dared the dangers of Stone River, who never turned aside from bullet or shell, but where balls flew thick and fast, sought out the wounded and administered to their wants, is dead. Never while I live can I forget him, as I saw him on the field, with his red flag suspended on a ramrod, marching fearlessly to the relief of the suffering; appearing to the wounded soldier like a ministering angel. I can never forget the night of the 31st December, when he laboured all the long night seeking the wounded. I can hear his voice now, loud and clear in the still air, crying, 'Any wounded here that need help?' And so he laboured to the end, taking no rest. When we said, 'Chaplain, you must rest, or you will die,' he always replied, 'I cannot rest, boys, while you suffer. If I die, I will die helping you.'"

THE TEACHING OF THE TWELVE APOSTLES.*

Now that this most interesting fragment has been again introduced to English readers, it is to be hoped that it will become widely known. Its importance is certainly not to be measured by its bulk, for, all told, it contains little more than two thousand Greek words. To those who are attached to Christianity in its simplest form, and who deplore what Priestley termed its corruptions, the omissions of the little treatise are exceedingly significant. These omissions its orthodox translator, and editor, Canon Spence, obligingly supplies in his edition, which was first published in 1885.

It is very remarkable how the good Canon reads into this manual the very dogmas of which it is so refreshingly innocent. The author says, "baptize into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit." βαπτίζετε εἰς τὸ ὄνομα τοῦ Πατρὸς καὶ τοῦ Υἱοῦ καὶ τοῦ ἁγίου Πνεύματος. Reading his own preconceptions into this formula, the Canon says: "While considerable licence was permissible in the description of water used, running or other water, while immersion or aspersion were alike sanctioned, the use of the Baptismal Formula given by the Son—in the name of the ever blessed Trinity—is declared here to be absolutely necessary for the validity of the rite."

Now, as nothing of the kind is declared, and as the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Spirit are never said to be a Trinity, this appears rather a curious gloss. It is not what the author says, but what Canon Spence considers he ought to have said, and evidently, in the Canon's mind, meant to have said, as the Canon is good enough to point out.

Perhaps, however, it is not so very surprising that those who accept the dogma of the Trinity should find it in the baptismal formula, and to say that because the author gives no alternative therefore he "declares that formula to be absolutely necessary to the validity of the rite," may be good reasoning according to Canon Spence. A still more astounding statement, and one which no preconception can well excuse, is this:—

"His prayer—the Lord's Prayer—is quoted as the one constantly to be used. Prayer is distinctly offered to Him." Of course, the statements are contradictory. How can the Lord's prayer, the Πάτερ ἡμῶν be offered to the Son. In the whole treatise there is not a word about prayer to Jesus Christ. All prayer is directed to the Father, and to the Father alone. This is most marked in the directions for giving of thanks in the Eucharistic service. "First, as regards the cup: We thank Thee, our Father, for the holy vine of David, Thy servant, which Thou has made known to us through Jesus, Thy Son; to Thee be glory for ever. And as regards the broken bread: We thank Thee, our Father, for the life and the knowledge which Thou hast made known to us through Jesus, Thy Son; to Thee be glory for ever."

*"The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles," for English Readers. A Translation, with Introduction and Notes, by James Edwin Odgers, M.A., D.D. (Philip Green, 5, Essex-street, Strand, W.C. 1s. net. Postage 2d.) A notice of this book appeared in THE INQUIRER, November 17, 1906.

Yet, in the face of this, with the very words that he himself has translated from the Greek staring him in the face, the Canon can assure his readers that "Prayer is distinctly offered to Him," i.e., to Jesus Christ.

It is a marvellous instance of how prejudice or preconception can warp the judgment. But even Canon Spence is obliged to admit that "nothing is said respecting the atonement." Truly a significant omission.

But let us dismiss Canon Spence's editorial comments, not without heartfelt gratitude for the good work which is not lacking in his version, and feel the freshness and the beauty of this early Christian document. For is there not in it a breath as of the country and the hills? We must not imagine primitive Christianity as confined to huge cities like Rome, and Alexandria, and Antioch, for this book speaks to a rural community: to those whose first fruits were of the wine-fat and the threshing-floor, and sheep and oxen. We have a glimpse of folk who toiled in the fields till the honest sweat dropped from their brows, suggesting the simile: "Let thy pity or alms (ἐλεημοσύνη) drop like sweat into thy hands," reminding us of that mercy "which droppeth like the gentle rain from heaven."

And there is about it the sober moderation of the country contrasted with the feverish fanaticism of city life. The author warns his child against fanaticism: "Become not inclined to anger : : ; nor a fanatic (Ζηλωτής)."

The right emphasis is put on kindness and generosity. "Thou shalt not give directions when thou art in anger to thy slave or thy handmaid." How much bitterness and evil-speaking would be spared if that direction were carried out! There is, indeed, much in this little manual for all time, for it is imbued with the spirit of that dear Master whose earthly life was almost a recent memory when it was compiled. Therefore, all success and wide diffusion to its most recent edition! CLEMENT E. PIKE.

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

THE Independent Review, which was published from the first by Mr. Fisher Unwin, has now passed into the hands of Mr. John Lane, and is published by him at the Bodley Head, Vigo-street, W.; for the rest, its outward form and purpose as a strong democratic Review remain unaltered. In the January number Mr. J. A. Hobson writes on "The Lords or the People?" and urges the adoption of the referendum, as the line of least resistance for breaking the legicidal power of the Lords. "The substitution," he concludes, "of the popular assent for the assent of the House of Lords upon determinate acts of policy would have an immense stimulative and educative value for democracy. . . . A referendum which expressed the sovereignty of the people in important concrete acts of legislation would bring home to the people the meaning of self-government more effectively than any other way. The democratic solution of the House of Lords question is to accept and apply their doctrine of the mandate by taking away their power of veto and giving it to the people." Mr. C. F. G. Masterman, M.P., in an article on "Twelve months of Parliament," gives a very interesting account of some of the chief personalities of that assembly. Mr. J. Arthur Hill writes a salutary article on "The Fallacies of Materialism," in which, however, the concluding passages are not so lucid or convincing as the earlier criticism of the crude form of materialism encouraged by the popularity of such a book as Haeckel's "Riddle of the Universe." The value of many of the R.P.A. publications such as Arnold's "Literature and Dogma" and Huxley's Essays and Spencer's "Education" he fully admits, and reminds us that foolish and overbearing dogmatism is found on both sides of the field. M. Ernest Dimnet, in an article on "The Crisis in France," traces marks of the anti-religious bias of the Government, but regrets the unfortunate attitude of the Pope.

In the Contemporary Mr. L. T. Hobhouse writes on the House of Lords, and Dr. Macnamara, M.P., on "The Education Bill and After." He summarises the advantages which have been lost by the rejection of the Bill, and concludes: "I have this final word to say, that if the Local Education Authorities, together with the Board of Education, would, without discriminating in any way between the various classes of schools, Council or Voluntary, see that every school was well lighted, well ventilated, well found, and in good sanitary condition; and if sufficient money were forthcoming to enable the Local Educational authorities to replace any school not satisfying these most legitimate and reasonable conditions by a school under its own control, I am rather inclined to think that within a couple of years from the date upon which I am penning this article, the Church of England, particularly, would be clamouring for the very Education Bill which their friends in the House of Lords have just destroyed." The Countess Martinengo Cesaresco writes on "The Growth of Modern Ideas on Animals," and Mr. Richard Heath on "Peasant Insurrections, 1381 and 1525."

The place of honour in the Nineteenth Century and After is given to an article by Lord Stanley of Alderley, on "The Education Bill of 1906 and the Future of Popular Education." Lord Stanley clearly does not regret that the Bill, with its too many concessions to denominational demands, is gone. He is thoroughly conversant with the needs of practical administrations. Here is one among several notable paragraphs which reveal his mind on the subject:—"The Bill of 1906 had a proposal for the distribution of £1,000,000 a year, some of which would have gone in rent, much of it in repairs of dilapidated school buildings. It is to be hoped that this million will go hereafter to what would be really to the advantage of education—the replacing of bad, worn out, obsolete Voluntary schools by new well-planned Council schools."

What the Government will now do, says Lord Stanley, is for them to decide, and adds:—"Much may be done. Much should be done by resolute administration, but the forces which carried the Education Bill through the Commons, the unprecedented vote which rejected the Lords' Amendments by nearly four to one, show that within a very short time national education must be taken entirely out of the hands of ecclesiastical bodies and made definitely and completely a part of the lay municipal activities of the nation."

Mr. Wilfred Ward's article on "The Pope and France" should also be noted, and we have turned with special pleasure to the article on "Giotto in Modern Life," by Basil de Sélincourt, who has an article also in the current Hibbert. Of Giotto's work he says: "Perhaps only one monument exists where, above the ruin and desolation wrought by time and by restorers, the image of this grand old Titan still rises unsubdued; and this, unhappily, is at Padua, a city, indeed, of wonderful charm and beauty, but cast into comparative shade by the dazzling pre-eminence of her too near neighbour, Venice. The decoration of the Arena Chapel at Padua, though it belongs only to Giotto's middle period, and lacks the reconciling grace which he infused into his latter and more perfect work, remains incontestably the grandest existing expression in art, not only of the Gospel story, but of the faith of Christendom."

THE INDIVIDUALITY OF QUAKERISM.

THE following article appeared in the December British Friend. Its testimony we also shall do well to ponder:—

Quakerism does not exist for its peculiarities, whether of garb or of grammar; neither is it based upon its negative testimonies, such as the non-celebration of baptism and the Eucharist; neither speech nor silence, in themselves, are of its essence. Although it objects to war and oaths, drunkenness and slavery, and uses every effort to put them down, yet, in its deeper and more inward aspects, it is a positive and not a negative faith, a conviction that goes down to the eternal heart of things, and is satisfied only when it touches the bedrock of the love of God, the restoring grace of Christ, and the immanence of the Holy Spirit. All this, of course, has been said so often as to have become a commonplace among us, but these are things that need to be repeated "lest we forget." Just now the cry is for union. Surrounded as we are by apathy and indifference and irreligion, there is a strong feeling in favour of closing up the ranks. "Let us march shoulder to shoulder," we hear on all sides; "it is only in the non-essentials that we differ; in the great things of life we are at one." Good and needed words so far as they go, but they do not go all the way. It is, we note, mostly from the Free Churches that the cry for union comes; and many Friends are heartily supporting and actively working in the Federation of Free Churches. In this they are to be commended. The success of the Free Church Councils, local and national, is one of the most striking features in the religious life of our time, and shows how much may be accomplished by co-operation instead of isolation. Many meetings, especially small ones, have been helpfully brought into touch with the religious life of their own towns by working with these Councils. There is something joyous and inspiring in joining the many who are fighting in public and private the good fight for freedom and righteousness, and helping others to enter into their heritage.

All this is to the good, but it must not blind us to the fact that to us has been given a deep spiritual message which we shall neglect at our peril. The question is not how are we to preserve our distinct and corporate existence, for, unless we have something special to offer which the world needs, it is not worth preserving; we may as well consent to be absorbed in some of the more effective organisations round about us. The real question is how shall we best fulfil the mission that has been given us for the help of men. Unless our members are willing to learn and teach and live out the true message committed to us, we may as well abandon our separate organisation. The other Free Churches have, for the most part, no such consciousness of a special and unique mission. They can, without inconsistency, go much further in federation with one another than we can.

The nature of that special message we have often insisted on, and it need only be here repeated in the most general terms. It centres in that equal opportunity for entering the life and service of the kingdom, regardless even of sex distinctions, which we call "the priesthood of all believers"; in a practical and far-reaching trust in the presence and activity of the Spirit, freeing men from the bondage of elaborate organisation; and in a deep sense of the claims of human brotherhood. Any union with other churches should be so conducted that we do not hide our testimony to these great and vital truths, but endeavour to draw others to them.

OBITUARY.

THE LATE REV. T. W. CHIGNELL.

THE following tribute to the late Rev. T. W. Chignell, for forty-four years minister of George's Meeting, Exeter, by "A. J. G." appeared in the Devon and Exeter Gazette of January 3:

Mr. Chignell's death has removed one of the most remarkable of Exeter citizens. But he lived a life so retired that he was probably little known beyond the members of his own congregation, and I avail myself gladly, therefore, of the permission of the Editor of the Gazette to put down on paper a few random thoughts and memories of my dear old friend.

There was in all that he said and in his whole way of looking at life a note of distinction and individuality. This was far removed from eccentricity. He shunned and disliked eccentricity in books, in philosophy, in opinions. His eyes were always fixed on the great beacon lights, and he scrutinised a little sceptically the claims of new writers and thinkers to be placed in the same category with the great ones whom he had studied so well. But, I repeat, there was a certain distinction in all that he said and did. As a preacher he managed to avoid entirely the preacher's common-place of phrase, thought, and action. When he was at his best he was one of the most remarkable and penetrating of preachers. Who that has heard him when he was strongly moved by his topic will ever forget him?

I have not heard him for some years, and yet the figure comes back to me with perfect clearness—the eyes usually closely shut, the figure now crouching, now drawn up in an attitude of great dignity, the constant references, drawn from a wide range of reading, to Aristotle, to Dante, to Goethe, to Carlyle, to Rousseau, perhaps, above all, to Spinoza. His discourses were infinitely varied, but there were certain often recurring topics and views. He loved, above all, to urge his joyful confidence in the goodness and love that lay behind the phenomena of the world; to assert the dignity of man and the holiness of pleasure, and to protest against intolerance of every kind and the cramping influence of asceticism.

I recall passages which he was especially fond of handling in the pulpit and in conversation—"Consider the lilies of the field," and Spinoza's cry, "If you overthrow the altar of reason what altar will you set up?" Goethe's paradox, "I remain of the order of believers." Perhaps, above all, a beautiful passage in Dante's "Paradiso," where the existence of God is compared to the floor of the ocean, visible in some points, in most not visible, but always assuredly there. But if I begin to recall his favourite passages there would be no end to it.

He loved nature with an ardour which I have never known surpassed, and he could love her in all her moods and in nearly all places. I connect him in my memory with walks near his own house under blooming orchard trees, along green lanes, or on quiet autumn days under branches of which only a few patches of colour remained.

On such occasions he would not argue; he never loved the clash of debate. It was his custom rather to exchange thoughts and suggestions, to recall the ideas of great writers, often with a deep thought of his own added, with here and there an amusing, but never malicious, story that had reference usually to some book or writer and thinker, and rarely touched on personal gossip. Sweet it was, too, to talk to him by his own fireside in his room, where the pictures reflected his own vivid and discriminating love of art, and his bookshelves were full to overflowing of his favourites and his teachers.

Much to the regret of his friends, he left little behind him in writing. The process of composition was irksome to him, and his sermons were, so far as I know, always preached without notes. But those who came into close contact with him have found their lives permanently influenced by him. His memory links itself, as he would have wished it to do, with the bounty and the joy of the world. His nature was not, I think, daring or aggressive. Rather, there was much in life from which he shrank, and controversy was at all times painful to him. But he lived his life out in openness and sincerity, concealing no opinions, making little compromise, confident in the guidance of reason and of truth. He had reached a ripe old age, but his delight in nature, literature, and art was still so keen that his friends hoped that many more years might still be given to him. Their memories will often turn lovingly and thankfully to his sensitive, eager face, and their sympathy goes out warmly to those who tended so lovingly his last years.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

THE GREATEST THING IN THE WORLD.

"MOTHER," said Jessie Barnett, who had been too ill to go to church, "what was the sermon about this morning?" "It was about what has been called 'the greatest thing in the world,' Jessie!" "And what is that, mother?" "Try to think it out," said Mrs. Barnett. "Was it one of the pyramids of Egypt, mother?" asked Jessie, adding immediately, "Oh, no; there are larger things than pyramids. The Alps are far larger, aren't they, mother?" "But," replied Mrs. Barnett, "if you remember, I said the greatest, not the largest, thing in the world! And this greatest thing was said to be LOVE. And now I am going to tell you a story, which I read many years ago, to show you how LOVE, if it be pure and unselfish, can do much which might seem to be impossible.

Long ago, in France, there lived a good man and his wife and two children, who were inseparable companions. The father mended wheels and wagons for the small farmers of the countryside; and he and his wife, being hard-working and thrifty, were greatly respected by the rest of the villagers. When the children were nine years old, however, a terrible accident happened to their father while he was mending a cart, and he was brought home dead. Nor was the poor wife left much longer to be the guardian of her girl and boy; for in a short time she, too, fell ill and died. Neighbours did their best to provide for little Maurice and Genevieve, and to train them for their work in life: the boy became very useful to the farmers, by whom he was kept constantly employed; and the girl—living under the same roof as her brother—grew daily more expert in household matters, and none could make sweeter butter than she. One day Maurice was putting the last sheaf upon a huge stack of corn when suddenly a flash of lightning struck him, and he rolled helplessly to the ground. When the workers gathered round they thought the poor lad was dead; awe-stricken they lifted him into a cart, and took him home, where Genevieve hung over him in anguish, calling to him in pleading tones to speak to her once more. At last there came a sigh and a slight movement, and life was known to be still there!

The poor boy was tenderly nursed by his devoted sister; and in time he was able to sit up; and then to be lifted out of bed. He was, however, paralysed in the lower limbs, and walking was impossible. Despair sometimes overcame him, because he felt himself to be useless, and a burden on his good sister. Once, during these moments of depression a soldier reached the little village, and, seeing the helpless lad, he asked the cause of such a sad condition. After hearing the tale, he said, "Cheer up, Maurice! I believe you can be cured. I was for years a wretched cripple till I went to Boulogne and had the salt-water baths which set me on my feet again; and you must go there too!" Maurice said that was for him impossible. There were in those days no railways, and the little village was two hundred and fifty miles from the sea. But Genevieve also heard of the soldier's wonderful cure, and resolved that, no matter what the effort and sacrifice might be, some plan should be found by which Maurice, too, should have the sea-water and the invigorating air. After a few days she told her brother that she had arranged to go with him to Boulogne! She would herself draw the little invalid chair, and she felt certain all would yet be well, and Maurice would come back cured! He, poor fellow, said it was impossible for Genevieve to carry out her plan; besides, where was the money to come from? Then the good sister had to tell her one secret! She had managed, by her care and thrift, to save five gold pieces; and Maurice could no longer refuse to try the experiment. So in June the pair set forth from the little village, followed by the blessings of all their friends. They were a fortnight in reaching the coast, and of their adventures it would take too long to tell. Their joy when at last they beheld the sea and the white breakers was indescribable. After a few weeks real improvement began to show in Maurice, and by-and-by he found himself able to walk a little without crutches. And at last the old strength and vigour had come back, and all traces of the poor useless invalid were gone. Maurice could walk and run and work as before! During all these long weeks the pluck and heroic courage of Genevieve had been noticed by many of the visitors of Boulogne, and the young people determined to help such a deserving brother and sister; and among them a sum of £50 was raised. Maurice and Genevieve were thus able to pay their debt to the kind man who had befriended them in Boulogne, and they had enough left to secure help for the homeward journey. It was indeed a happy day when their own little village was reached. Young and old came to offer a glad welcome to the devoted sister, and to the grateful brother, and the remembrance of the struggle, now so fortunately ended, filled their hearts with thankfulness for the fresh measure of health and comfort they enjoyed. All who knew them realised that Maurice's recovery could never have been brought about but for the bravery and the self-sacrificing love of his noble sister Genevieve.

"That's a nice story, mother," said Jessie. "I wonder whether it is really true!" "That I cannot tell," said Mrs. Barnett; "but I feel very sure that the spirit within it is always true. Love of self lowers us, but the sacrifice of our own ease for the love we bear to others, makes men godlike. Perhaps I shall tell you another story about this greatest thing in the world, Jessie, if you cannot go out again next Sunday."

MARTINEAU'S "ENDEAVOURS."

WITH a rare gladness we welcome the appearance this week of a popular sixpenny edition of the first volume of Dr. MARTINEAU'S "Endeavours after the Christian Life," the twenty-two sermons originally published in the summer of 1843, a religious classic which we are thankful indeed to see thus placed within reach of the widest possible public.

The late BASIL MARTINEAU, who was his father's literary executor, anticipated this popular appeal, when the copyright should have expired, which had been already announced by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, by the issue before Christmas of a cheap edition of both volumes of the "Endeavours" at the price of eighteenpence a volume (Longmans & Co.); and, as the Association's edition of the first volume is also issued in a bound form on better paper at the same price, readers now have a choice, of which they need make no complaint. The Association's volume is enriched by a portrait reproducing the well-known engraving from AGAR'S portrait of 1847, thus most fittingly presenting the young MARTINEAU of the "Endeavours." That was the year in which the second series first appeared, the year before the old Paradise-street Chapel in Liverpool, where the sermons had been preached, was abandoned by the congregation, and the building of Hope-street Church began.

But the great thing now is this sixpenny edition of the first volume of the "Endeavours." Is it too much to hope that the book may now find its way over the world as never before, and be earnestly studied in reading circles, and in classes of thoughtful young people, for the training of a noble manhood and womanhood, and the nurture of religious life, to which it is fitted to minister with such rare power?

"The publication of Dr. MARTINEAU'S 'Endeavours after the Christian Life,'" said the late RICHARD HUTTON in 1885, "was in many respects the beginning of my life. I do not know that at that time it did take full hold of me: You are aware that boys of seventeen would be unable to enter into the deeper thoughts of that great book. But the imaginative charm did at once take hold even of boys of seventeen; and I remember that many of the passages in that book inspired me with a kind of exaltation which made me walk along the streets hardly conscious that I was myself."

And here is the testimony of Mr. A. W. JACKSON, of Concord, Mass., in his biography and study of Dr. MARTINEAU (1900): "A student of divinity, in an American school, opened for the first time a volume of the 'Endeavours.' Presently he was in a realm of wonder. Vision opened upon vision. The sentences seemed but translucent media for stars to shine through. On the current of thought he was borne almost as resistlessly as if afloat in the whirlpool of Niagara River. That hour's reading brought him in contact with one of the master influences of his life. He closed the volume with a feeling not unlike that of General WOLFE, floating down the St. Lawrence River, reciting the immortal Elegy. : : Being of an imaginative mind and mystic temperament, the imaginative and mystic features he everywhere met in Dr. MARTINEAU'S discourse awoke in him responsive raptures. If the beauty was bewildering, why, it was a bewildering beauty; if the heights were ethereal, to breathe ether in exchange for common air he found exhilarating!" These sermons, Mr. JACKSON says a little further on, we place "with the classic literature of devotion: with the volumes of TAULER and TAYLOR and the Theologia Germanica. We pass from any of these to the "Hours of Thought" or the "Endeavours," sensible of no decline of spiritual altitude. The manner is different, the tone is different; but through these, as those, the like heights gleam, the like raptures thrill. By spiritual consanguinity he is the kinsman of ECKHART and THOMAS A KEMPIS, and draws his sermons from the like spring as they their meditations. In him, as in them, is the mystic soul, out of which alone the mystic utterance can come. : : Whoever will speak the oracular word must retire within the shrine where oracles are given. This secret of his office Dr. MARTINEAU, beyond all contemporary preachers, seemed to know; and hence the well-nigh incomparable appeal with which his words speak home to us."

One remembers how deeply FREDERICK ROBERTSON, of Brighton, was influenced by these sermons, and how they won for MARTINEAU the friendship of such men as STANLEY and JOWETT. Miss COBBE told in her autobiography what they had been to her—especially, in her own early struggles, that sermon on "The Strength of the Lonely." There was in them, she said, such wonderful and varied wealth, making sometimes the earnest critic or the philosopher heard. And again, "Another would leave the impression of a poet, as great in his prose as the author of In Memoriam in verse. And, lastly, and above all, there was always the pious Man, filled with devout feeling, who by his very presence and voice communicated reverence, and the sense of the nearness of an all-seeing God." These sermons, Dr. DRUMMOND said, in the "Life," "must hold their place so long as there are men who can look beyond the trappings into the secret soul of religion, and who can appreciate nobility of thought expressed in noble language, fervour of sentiment, depth of spiritual insight and humble aspiration after perfect communion with God." And Dr. CARPENTER, in his study of MARTINEAU as Theologian and Teacher, says of the Endeavours, "Here the divine and human are presented in constant union within the scene of our moral and religious experience. The prophet from his mount of vision discerns God for ever mingling with man, and the philosopher does not attempt to part them. . . . A note of what may be called Christian Stoicism sounds again and again through the insistence on the sovereignty of duty, and the lordship of self-control. Never was the ethical demand enforced more fervently, or presented with austerer dignity." Dr. CARPENTER also notes the affinity of these sermons with the spirit of In Memoriam. "MARTINEAU is, in fact, the TENNYSON of preachers. There is the same fastidiousness of form, the same concentrated phraseology, the same lyric intensity, the same ascent into a realm where thought and emotion are transfused into each other, and both are recognised as giving the soul immediate access to a divine life that at once pervades and transcends them. . . . Long since have the Endeavours taken their place among the choicest utterances of English religion in the nineteenth century."

And finally, let us recall Dr. MARTINEAU'S own words concerning these sermons, dealing "with the inner heart of life and faith," words with which he concluded the fourth edition in 1866, when the two volumes were issued as one, and when he was relieved to find how little, after the lapse of years, he felt the book to need any change:

"It would have been far otherwise, had it treated of subjects whose interest is critical or speculative, and which take new aspects with the shifting light. But appealing mainly to the simplest trusts and aspirations of the human heart, it is compensated for having nothing new upon its page, by having so much the less that is liable to grow old; and while not pretending to trace any line of progress in religion, gains a little shelter from its permanence. To heal the broken unity of Christendom, the scholar may rely on the ultimate establishment of his critical results; the ecclesiast may plan treaties of peace and fusions of doctrine between Church and Church: but, meanwhile, those who find it more congenial to pass behind the whole field of theological divergency and linger near the common springs of all human piety and hope, may perhaps be preparing some first lines of a true Eirenikon."

Certainly MARTINEAU in the Endeavours penetrated into the inner sanctuary of devotion and was there with kindred souls of many churches. The testimony which we have here gathered together as to the power of the sermons will be not unwelcome to those to whom the book has been a life-long friend. We trust that it may lead many new readers to turn to these pages, to submit to their strenuous discipline, to glory in their power and beauty, and to drink of the living waters of their inspiration. Those who know the worth of this great treasure can now do much, through the wide dissemination of this popular edition, to extend its influence for good. To those who come for the first time to the Endeavours, we offer here a few passages from the first six of the sermons as earnest of what they will find in the book.

Our Kinship with God.

"A MAN," says the Apostle Paul, "is the image and glory of God." And truly, it is from our own human nature, from its deep experiences and earnest affections, that we form our conceptions of Deity, and become qualified to interpret the solemn intimations which creation and Scripture afford to us respecting him. Without the stirring of divine qualities within us, without some consciousness of that which we ascribe to the All-perfect, the names and descriptions by which he is made known to us would be empty words, as idly sent to us as treatises of sound to the deaf, or some "high discourse of reason" to the fool. All that we believe without us, we first feel within us; and it is the one sufficient proof of the grandeur and awfulness of our nature, that we have faith in God; for no merely finite being can possibly believe the infinite.

The Besetting God.

We sometimes complain of the conditions of our being, as unfavourable to the discernment and the love of God; we speak of him as veiled from us by our senses, and of the world as the outer region of exile from which he is peculiarly hid. In imagining what is holy and divine we take flight to other worlds, and conceive that there the film must fall away, and all adorable realities burst upon the sight. Alas! what reason have we to think any other station in the universe more sanctifying than our own? There is none, so far as we can tell, under the more immediate touch of God; none whence sublimer deeps are open to adoration; none murmuring with the whisper of more thrilling affections, or ennobled as the theatre of more glorious duties. The dimness we deplore, no travelling would cure; the most perfect of observatories will not serve the blind; we carry our darkness with us; and instead of wandering to fresh scenes, and blaming our planetary atmosphere, and flying over creation for a purer air, it behoves us, in simple faith, to sit by our own wayside and cry, "Lord, that we may receive our sight."

The Way of Self-Surrender.

It is not apparently the design of heaven that we should be permitted to seek rest and to desire ease in this aspiring life; and it is the vain attempt to make compromise between duty and indulgence, that creates the corrosions of conscience, and the perpetual disquietudes of spirit, and disappoints our own ideal from day to day and from year to year. There is no way to the peace of God but by absolute self-abandonment to his will that whispers within us, without reservation of happiness or self. Then, the relinquishment once made—our whole nature given up to any high faith within the heart—the sorrows of mortality, its reproaches, its fears, will soon vanish, and even death be robbed of its terrors; for, to quote the noble words of Lord Bacon, "He that dies in an earnest pursuit is like one that is wounded in hot blood, who for the time scarce feels the hurt; and therefore a mind fixed and bent upon somewhat that is good, doth best avert the dolours of death."

Great Principles and Small Duties.

In himself was the serene and unapproachable dignity of a higher nature, a mind at one with the universe and its Author; in his acts, a frugal respect for the most neglected elements of human life, declaring that he came not to be ministered unto but to minister. What wonder that, when he had been ensphered in the immortal world, he appeared to the affectionate memories of men as a divine being who had disrobed himself of rightful glory to take pity on their sorrows, and had put on for the gladness of praise the garment of heaviness? The conception is at least in close kindred with a noble truth—that a soul occupied with great ideas best performs small duties; that the divinest views of life penetrate most clearly into the meanest emergencies; that so far from petty principles being best proportioned to petty trials, a heavenly spirit taking up its abode with us can alone sustain well the daily toils, and tranquilly pass the humiliations, of our condition; and that, to keep the house of the soul in order due and pure, a god must come down and dwell within, as servant of all its work.

The Great Heights of Faith.

We must go in contemplation out of life ere we can see how its troubles subside and are lost, like evanescent waves, in the deeps of eternity and the immensity of God. A mind that can make this migration from the scene by which it is surrounded is removed from all vain strife of will, and gains its tranquillity without an effort; feels no difficulty in being gentle and serene, but rather wonders that it could ever be tempted from its pure repose. How welcome would it often be to many a child of anxiety and toil, to be suddenly transferred from the heat and din of the city, the restlessness and worry of the mart, to the midnight garden or the mountain top! And like refreshment does a high faith, with its infinite prospects ever open to the heart, afford to the worn and weary: no laborious travels are needed to the devout mind; for it carries with it Alpine heights and starlit skies, which it may reach with a moment's thought, and feel at once the loneliness of nature, and the magnificence of God.

Nothing less than the majesty of God and the powers of the world to come can maintain the peace and sanctity of our homes, the order and serenity of our minds, the spirit of patience and tender mercy in our hearts. Then only shall we wisely economise moments when we anticipate for ourselves an eternity, and lose no grain of wisdom when we discern the glorious and immortal structure which its successive accumulations shall raise. Then will even the merest drudgery of duty cease to humble us, when we transfigure it by the glory of our own spirit. Seek ye then the things that are above, where your life is hid with Christ in God.

Self-Consecration.

Between these two sources of Christian peace, virtuous toil and holy trust, there is an intimate connection. The desponding are generally the indolent and useless; not the tried and struggling, but speculators at a distance from the scene of things, and far from destitute of comforts themselves. Barren of the most blessed of human sympathies, strangers to the light that best gladdens the heart of man, they are without the materials of a bright and hopeful faith. But he who consecrates himself sees at once how God may sanctify the world; he whose mind is rich in the memory of moral victories will not easily believe the world a scene of moral defeats; nor was it ever known that one who, like Paul, laboured for the good of man, despaired of the benevolence of God.

Whoever then would have the peace of Christ, let him seek first the spirit of Christ. Let him not fret against the conditions which God assigns to his being, but reverently conform himself to them, and do and enjoy the good which they allow: Let him cast himself freely on the career to which the secret persuasion of duty points, without reservation of happiness or self; and in the exercise which its difficulties give to his understanding, its conflicts to his will, its humanities to his affections, he shall find that united action of his whole and best nature, that inward harmony, that moral order, which emancipates from the anxieties of self, and unconsciously yields the divinest repose: The shadows of darkest affliction cannot blot out the inner radiance of such a mind; the most tedious years move lightly and with briefest step across its history; for it is conscious of its immortality, and hastening to its heaven. And there shall its peace be consummated at length; its griefs transmuted into delicious retrospects; its affections fresh and ready for a new and nobler career; and its praise confessing that this final "peace of God" doth indeed "surpass its understanding."

AMERICAN NOTES.

A HEARTY New Year's Greeting to the Editor and readers of THE INQUIRER! The coming months are likely to bring them into closer relations with their American co-religionists through their mutual interest and participation in another session of the International Congress of Unitarian and other religious liberals on the soil of the New World. This international movement of liberals was so brilliantly and successfully inaugurated in London five years ago, that it will be difficult for us to parallel the admirable arrangements and lavish hospitalities which attended the first Congress under the auspices of our British friends and fellow-workers. But we are doing our best, and the prospects are bright for a largely attended and interesting series of meetings in Boston in September (22 to 27) next.

We have been much delayed in making our preliminary announcements by not receiving replies to the invitations sent to prominent liberals in Europe and Asia to address the Congress. A trip to America is a somewhat more formidable undertaking than one to Amsterdam or Geneva, and requires longer deliberation. Next month we hope to be able to send you fuller information than is possible to us now, and to furnish a fairly complete programme of the Congress.

At present it can only be said that the guests will be welcomed to home and hotels on Saturday, the 22nd. All foreign clergymen and their ladies will be entertained free during the week of the Congress. We may be able to extend this hospitality to the lay delegates also. In any case, reduced rates will be made at hotels and lodging houses.

On Sunday, the 23rd, the visiting clergy will be asked to occupy local pulpits, so far as possible. In the evening there will be an opening mass meeting in our large Symphony Hall, with organ and chorused choir, and addresses. Every morning a devotional half hour will be held in King's Chapel. The regular sessions will take place in Tremont Temple, the central Baptist assembly room, which seats 2,500 or more. The last day's session will occur in Sander's Theatre, the Aula of Harvard University. There will also be meetings in various Boston churches. The Unitarian Building will be the centre of the business and hospitality of the Congress. Ample provision has been made for public receptions, a banquet, and other social occasions. It is hoped to hold at the State Capitol an International Reception, at which the delegates shall be received by some of the most eminent of American Statesmen and scholars.

Excursions will be made in and about Boston, and to Plymouth, Lexington, Concord, Cambridge, and other shrines of political and religious liberty, in some cases, by special train. Visitors desiring to take New York and the Hudson, the Canadian cities, the St. Lawrence, Niagara Falls, Washington, and Philadelphia, into their itinerary, can do so, either before or after their Boston stay, on reduced rates, under the management of Thos. Cook & Sons.

It is too early to announce speakers, but it may be said that Prof. Otto Pfeiderer, of Berlin, the veteran pioneer of free thought in religion, Profs. Eerdmans and Groenewegen, of Leyden; Meyboom, of Groningen; and Revs. P. H. Hugenbultz, Fleischer and Binnerts, of Holland, will take part in the Congress. Also Prof. E. Montet, and Revs. E. RoCHAT, L. Ragaz, of Switzerland; Prof. Bonet-Maury, of Paris, and many others. The addresses, with but few exceptions, will be in the English tongue.

The representation of American liberals will be large and inclusive. Besides the Unitarian, Universalist, liberal Friends, Christians, and other bodies, many free churches and large-minded individuals, clergy, educators, and men of affairs will participate. We already foresee that this Congress will have a wide-reaching effect on the religious mind of America, and cannot fail to greatly benefit the cause of a rational and spiritual Christianity in this country. It is estimated that fifteen nationalities and some seventy-five or more religious associations will be represented officially at the Congress.

We are delighted to learn that so great an interest is taken by our British friends in the Boston meetings, that a fund to assist delegates is being raised, and that we may venture to provide for a hundred visitors from Great Britain. The more the better. Their coming will draw closer the bonds of political and religious consanguinity, and impart to each and all of us added faith in the ultimate triumph of our principles. The presence of a goodly number of foreign delegates can alone give the Boston Congress a truly International character. If the attendance from abroad were to be meagre and unrepresentative, it would be both mortifying to us, and a severe blow to the cause of international fellowship among liberals. We trust our European friends will keep this steadily in mind, and be willing to make the efforts and sacrifices involved in a journey to the United States next autumn.

They may be assured that we need their presence and word in the solution of our American church problems. The liberal cause is commonly thought to be more favourably circumstanced in the New World than in the Old. It may be so. Yet we are still in a minority, are still refused recognition and fellowship by the larger and more orthodox sects, and must continually struggle against an intolerant majority for religious freedom and rational and progressive views of religion and life. The presence and testimony of liberals from abroad at the Congress will hearten and strengthen us in our endeavours, and promote the cause of "pure religion and perfect liberty" throughout the world.

Next month, and in April and June, will appear a bulletin of the Congress, illustrated, and giving details of its meetings, excursions, &c.

The first volume of the new and complete edition of Theodore Parker's works is in the press. Its title is "The World of Matter and the Mind of Man." It will contain the latest utterance of Parker on religious topics, including a series of discourses delivered just before his exile and death. None of the material in this volume has ever been collected in book form before, though some of it has been printed in pamphlets. The editor is George Willis Cooke, well known by his biographies of Emerson, Browning, George Eliot, his history of American Unitarianism, &c. The editorial committee consists of Rev. Samuel A. Eliot, president of the American Unitarian Association, which will publish the edition; Frank Sanborn, of Concord, Mr. Parker's literary executor; Col. Thos. Wentworth Higginson, Parker's fellow-worker in great causes; Rufus W. Leighton, Parker's amanuensis and the stenographic reporter of many of his sermons and prayers; Edwin D. Mead, P. R. Frothingham, W. C. Gannett, S. B. Stewart, J. Haynes Holmes, and C. W. Wendte. The number of volumes will reach sixteen or more, and they will be sold separately or together.

Mr. John C. Haynes, who, responding to a suggestion of the present writer, made the generous gift of $11,000 which has made possible this new edition, is a well-known and wealthy merchant of that city, the head of the great music publishing house of Oliver Ditson & Co. He was a warm supporter of Theodore Parker during the latter's 17 years' ministry in Boston, and a foremost spirit in the erection and maintenance of the Parker Memorial Church. He is also known for his generous support of public charities. Retired recently from active service because of the state of his health, he has the gratification of beholding the speedy rise and great promise of his only grandson, Rev. John Haynes Holmes, who graduated from the Harvard Divinity School a year or two since, and after a brief but brilliant service in a suburban pulpit, has just been called to succeed Rev. M. J. Savage, in the Church of the Messiah, New York.

Rev. S. M. Crothers, since his return from England, has been greatly in demand as a speaker at our various denominational gatherings, on his recent experiences among the British brethren. Fortunate the people and the cause that have so optimistic and genial an advocate.

Some 100 of our Unitarian Women's Alliances are studying the series of lessons on "Liberal Movements and Leaders in Foreign Countries," prepared for them in anticipation of the coming Congress. Never, we are informed, has any course of Alliance study been so generally and earnestly pursued. Besides papers from the ladies themselves, Revs. J. H. Crooker, A. Lazenby, J. T. Sunderland, the present writer, and other clergymen, have been kept busy with appointments to address the Alliances on the aspects of religious free thought in the countries studied.

The American Unitarian Association has applied to the Courts to have its charter amended so as to increase its property holding power from one to three million dollars. An effort is being made this year to increase the amount of annual contributions it receives from the churches from its present average of $75,000 to $150,000.

The Secretary of the Association, Rev. Chas. E. St. John, is away on a visit to Mexico in pursuit of health.

Rev. M. J. Savage at last accounts was regaining strength, and some hope is felt for his ultimate recovery.

Rev. Dr. Crapsey, the episcopal rector in Rochester, N.Y., whose heresies led to his recent expulsion from the ministry, will found in that city an independent movement, which most of his parishoners will join. There is already in the town a strong Unitarian Society under Rev. W. C.

Gannett: Mr. Crapsey denied the virgin birth and bodily resurrection of Jesus. He was recently an honoured guest at our Boston Unitarian Ministers' Meeting.

Meanwhile, in Cincinnati, Ohio, the Rev. Mr. Cox, a prominent episcopal clergyman, announced that he held precisely similar views to Dr. Crapsey, and demanded a trial for heresy. The church authorities of Ohio, however, after considering the matter, have declined to grant his request, and will ignore the application. What is all this to lead to? Is heresy in New York orthodoxy in Ohio?

At a recent Union Thanksgiving Service in Boston, held in a Congregational Trinitarian church, six orthodox denominations were represented, and a Unitarian preached the sermon. At another, eight orthodox clergymen assisted, and a Jewish Rabbi preached the sermon. At the recent Massachusetts elections, Gov. Guild, Lieut. Governor Draper, and Secretary of State Olin, all Unitarians, were re-elected. The Chaplain of the Senate is a Unitarian clergyman. The newly-appointed justice of the United States Supreme Bench in Washington, Judge Moody, is a Unitarian, as is one of his colleagues, Judge Holmes, son of the eminent poet, Oliver Wendell Holmes.

The U.S. Secretary of War, President Roosevelt's principal adviser, Wm. H. Taft, is also of our fellowship, and recently addressed one of our conferences.

Rev. J. H. Crooker, who preaches in one of the most beautiful of Boston's suburbs is having such success that the trustees are planning to enlarge the church edifice to accommodate the ever-increasing congregation:

DR. ADAMSON CONCERNING THEOLOGICAL MOVEMENT.

THE British Congregationalist of Nov. 29 published a notable article "Concerning the New Theological Movement," by the Rev. Dr. William Adamson, of Windermere. Speaking of present-day movements within the Free Churches of Britain, Dr. Adamson refers to the efforts for an educational settlement and for the establishment of institutional churches, and then proceeds:—

"Deeper and more fundamental, so far as Church life is concerned, is the movement for the supersession of the old doctrines of Christianity, and substituting in their place a new setting of theology, constituting a distinct modification of popular and scientific expositions of the main articles of the Christian faith. . . .

A new statement of the Christian verities was to be expected, because required. Those who thought that the old credal conceptions would harmonise with the advancement of science, the knowledge of historical developments, of philosophy and criticism were living in a world of illusions. Religion and religious ideas cannot longer remain apart from the general thought of the age. The Church is no longer a garden, walled around to keep it from contact with the stream of human life, which flows through and thrills the hearts of men. Its teachings must be seen to harmonise with what is known to be true in science, history, and experience, and derive their authority largely from their meeting the deepest longings and most imperative needs of the human mind. So much may be taken for granted. A new theology is required, is being expounded and enforced, and it is for the leaders of theological thought, and, indeed, for all the followers of Christ, to seek to understand its postulates, truthfulness, and practical bearings."

The fundamental question is of the Being and Nature of God, a question inevitably raised again in each new generation, with the growth of knowledge and changing conceptions of life in this universe. The scientific doctrine of evolution, Dr. Adamson points out, has led to a new recognition of the immanence of God in the universe; it has led some to the conclusion that God cannot be personal, self-conscious or ethical. And he quotes Sir Oliver Lodge, who has done much to explain evolution in a Christian spirit, with the desire to make it harmonise with Christian doctrine, as yet approaching "the border line, on the other side of which a living, thinking, loving Father, God must be denied." That is so, when Sir Oliver suggests that the idea of evolution may be extended even to the Deity. "From this and other statements which could be produced from the works of divines," says Dr. Adamson, "it is most apparent a new theology, based on the doctrine of evolution—as applied not to the heavens, the earth, and man only, but also to the Power which lies before and behind all phenomena—must present a doctrine of God very different from that of Jesus Christ, His Apostles, and of the Christian Church in all ages."

"The controversy has been raised, and cannot be avoided. Congregations are being informed of what changes are passing over the minds of preachers, religious teachers, and scientists. The more intellectual portion of Church members are asking for light and leading, and know not where to find it, while young men and women are anxious to know where they can get their difficulties removed."

The Free Churches, Dr. Adamson concludes, "are expected to do their part in preserving what is sound doctrine, in educating the people in the deep things of the spiritual realm, and the refutation of error. Their mission is to remove wrong conceptions of sacred truths, revealed by Him who came that the children of men might have the light of life imparted to them, enabling them to perceive what can be known of the Divine One, whom on bended knees they should call 'Our Father.'"

That is a fearless and a searching utterance. The question whether God is "a mere cosmic process, one with nature," or "a personal ethical Being Eternal and Transcendent," has certainly to be faced; and it is by the way of a true apprehension of the whole spiritual content of human experience that guidance must be sought. To any who are burdened by the necessity of facing this fundamental question we cannot wish a better fortune than to come under the influence of the ethical and spiritual teaching of James Martineau, and to enter in through the portal of Armstrong's "Essay towards Fundamental Religion," "God and the Soul." Then we are confident that any suggestion of an unfinished, struggling Deity will be seen to be a monstrosity. A true theology cannot be based upon evolution, for that is simply the method by which the Eternal manifests and works out the unfolding purposes of life. Faith, even while engaged in the bitterest conflicts of life, may be lifted up to the beatific vision of God, in whom is perfect Love and infinite Peace.

THE INDIAN DEMAND FOR SELF-GOVERNMENT.

SIR,—Your desire to know what the late Mr. Ananda Mohun Bose would have thought of the Spectator's curiously belated opinion that Indians, being Asiatics, must be for ever incapable of self-government, can be very easily gratified. At all events, this is how he expressed himself seven years ago, speaking as President of the Indian National Congress:—

"It is because we are friends to British rule, it is because all our highest hopes of the future, and not our hopes only, but the hopes of generations to come, are indissolubly bound up with the continuance of that rule, with the strengthening and the bettering of that rule, with the removal of all and every cause that may tend to the weakening of that rule, that we speak out, and point out the impolicy, the unwisdom, yea, the danger of the recent course of administrative and legislative proceedings, that we are trying to the best of our power—alas, so limited! to induce the authorities, and the great majority of justice-loving and generous-minded Englishmen, both here and in England, to withdraw from that course, and find the path of safety, of honour, of mutual advantage, and the truest and most abiding glory, in going forward in fearless confidence, trusting the people, extending the bounds of freedom; not forging new fetters, but gradually removing those that exist; not taking away, but adding to the rights of the people, helping on the cause of India's regeneration with the passionate longing and the loving ardour that comes from consciousness of a duty and a solemn responsibility from on high. The educated classes of India are the friends and not the foes of England, her natural and necessary allies in the great work that lies before her. . . . All that they ask for is that England should be true to herself, that she should not forget the teachings of her history and the traditions of her past. Is this, ladies and gentlemen, sedition, or is it the highest homage that India can pay to England, the dawning of the proudest day, foreseen as in a vision by Macaulay, when, instructed in European knowledge, we might ask for the blessings of European institutions?"

The application of these remarks was chiefly to recent curtailments of liberties previously conceded, and he apparently did not then think the time ripe for formulating such extensive demands as those now made by Mr. Naoroji. But as against the non-possumus attitude of the Spectator not only this speech but his whole career was an emphatic protest; and his last public letter, recommending in effect a general boycotting of the reactionary Lieutenant-Governor of Eastern Bengal, looks as if he, like many other Indians, had come to think that the time for bated breath and half-measures had gone by.

In your extracts from the Spectator I find nothing but the old, old fallacies that one gets rather tired of answering. The central fallacy consists in assuming that the future is going to resemble the past in one particular when all the other conditions have been altered. The opinion expressed by the writer concerning Asiatics was held with equal confidence by most Englishmen concerning Frenchmen down to, and for some time after, the establishment of the Third Republic. It was held by all English Tories concerning the bulk of their own countrymen down to, and after, 1832. If Oriental records show no examples of good (or bad) representative government, neither do Western records, our own included, show any marked success in that line before the last century. It would be as much to the purpose to point out that Oriental records make no mention of railways and telegraphs. The term "Asiatic races" requires definition. Are the Japanese Asiatics? Are the Hungarians? Or, if not, how can their first cousins, the Turks, who have been encamped in Europe nearly as long, be counted as Asiatic? Yes, but the Turks are Mohammedans. True, and this is the one grain of truth in our critic's contention: There is a real difficulty in reconciling the creed of Islam—not only with popular government but with good government of any kind, as measured by modern standards. Akbar found it so, and renounced the creed accordingly. There is the same difficulty with the Roman Catholic form of Christianity, and still more, perhaps, with the Byzantine form; it is true, as no one knew better than Mr. Bose, that in India, as in Europe, political and religious progress must go hand in hand if either is to be successful. They are, as a matter of fact, going hand in hand in India. And this brings me to the last of the well-worn fallacies: the idea that the "warrior peoples of the North" would have it all their own way in the event of our withdrawal. Just so were the Spaniards under Alva expected to make short work of the fat shopkeeping Dutchmen; just so, to come nearer the point, were one of these very "warrior peoples," the Sikhs, an obscure sect of ultra-pacific heretics, until persecution converted them into a nation of soldiers: Were we, as the Spectator suggests, to withdraw prematurely and petulantly, instead of gradually shifting more and more responsibility on to the shoulders of our most promising pupils, it would be a shameful abandonment of duty on our part, and would naturally cause terrible distress and confusion; but I know of nothing in the past history of India, any more than in that of Europe, to suggest that the victory would ultimately rest with brute force rather than with mind and character:

[R. K. WILSON:

NATIONAL HOME-READING UNION.

SIR,—May I, in your pages, inform your readers of recent developments in the work of the National Home-Reading Union, and of the special encouragement and assistance that have been given to us by the Board of Education? The Board of Education have sent out two circulars, one to local education authorities and the other to public library authorities. In the former they say the "Board are aware that a number of education authorities have already recognised the work of the Union, and have sanctioned the forming of reading circles in connection with it, but they are anxious to take the opportunity of bringing its aims and methods before all education authorities throughout the country, in the hope that many more may see their way to similar co-operation." The Union is fortunate in being able to call to its aid the devotion and help of a number of distinguished men of letters and of science, who contribute important and interesting articles to its official journals, and draft the very varied courses of reading which the Union offers to the choice of "reading circles." The Board accordingly set forth methods in which home-reading circles may be formed among senior scholars of every school, instead of the ordinary reading class, so that the children may be taught before they leave school how to use the gift of reading in the reading of bright and useful books at home. They also desire the formation of home-reading circles for those who have left school. In the second letter the Board of Education also indicate ways in which the N.H.R.U. can co-operate with library authorities in giving guidance and help to the readers who frequent these libraries.

In order to give effect to the desire of the Board of Education, the N.H.R.U. invite teachers of senior classes to become members of the Union, and in that case accepts the scholars of the reading circle as members of the Union without any further charge, and offers the monthly tutorial magazine of the young people's course to any scholars in the circle at a small charge. The same privilege is offered to teachers in Sunday-schools that unite their class in home-reading circles, so that their scholars, too, may have all the encouragement and help which the N.H.R.U. can give in the enjoyable reading of books at home.

The N.H.R.U. has now also formed an introductory course for working men and women who have comparatively little time for reading, and who, because they have little time, need the more to have a selection of the best and cheapest books made for them on the subjects that interest them, and also to have tutorial help by competent persons in their reading, explaining difficulties and answering questions. The fee to working men and women who will form a reading circle and receive our magazines in connection with the introductory course is only 6d., so that for them, as for young people in schools, the great advantages which the Board of Education set forth in both their circulars are offered at a nominal price.

In view of the great extension of its work by the action of the Board of Education, and also because of the growing interest in it among other classes of readers, the N.H.R.U. is now organising the formation of branches in different cities and towns in the country, which branches are being directed by strong committees representing different classes of the community. The N.H.R.U. has been styled the "People's University," because it offers some of the privileges of a university training in the guidance of reading and the tutorial help it gives in explaining difficulties to its readers and in other ways. It is hoped that, as the People's University, it may during this winter receive a large number of people who have not yet availed themselves of the benefits which it confers.

Further information with regard to the N.H.R.U., the various magazines issued, and the four courses which it has formed for different classes of readers, will be supplied on application to the secretary, at Surrey House, Victoria Embankment, London, W.C.

WILLASTON SCHOOL.

SIR,—I should like to follow up the letter of the Rev. H. D. Roberts, which appeared in your issue of last week, with the corroboration of one who has had a boy at the school for several years past. I am sure that the school, its tone, its influence, and its teaching have only to be more widely known to be more widely appreciated. We read a great deal at the present time in disparagement of the education given in the old-established public schools, and one's own observation satisfies one that much of the criticism passed thereon is just; and while the difficulty of reform in them is admittedly exceedingly great and the progress slow, we have at Willaston a school free from the accumulated prejudices of some of the older foundations, and where, I believe, the result as well as the aim is "to equip the boys to play a useful part in the world" and to awaken in them "a spirit of perception of beauty, and a generous admiration for what is noble and true and high." The words quoted are from the article on Education in Mr. Benson's "From a College Window." I think if Mr. Benson went to Willaston he would find that there many of his ideas were being put to practical test and with the best results.

By the way, why do we so very rarely see any reference to the school or any report of the annual Speech Day in THE INQUIRER? Mr. Jones's short address last year, and Mr. Lewis's the year before, deserved most fully reporting. The existence of the school, its aims and its methods, should, I venture to think, be brought much more frequently and fully before the readers of THE INQUIRER; and it should not be possible, as I am afraid it is, for a boy to miss entering the school because his parents do not know its merits.

BANDS OF HEALTH.

SIR,—Mr. Lummis is surprised and disappointed that there has been no response to his appeal made in THE INQUIRER of October 13 for organised health work in connection with our churches.

I sympathise intensely with Mr. Lummis in his desire that men and women should "know how to live," and should carry that knowledge out in practice. But I acknowledge that I looked forward with some trepidation to a correspondence on the subject of health in THE INQUIRER.

In some circles at the present time food is a staple subject of conversation, to the detriment surely of intellectual and spiritual life, and to the doubtful benefit of health.

The opening of the correspondence columns of THE INQUIRER to this "Battle of the Diets," giving all who possess them an opportunity of "airing their fads," would be a step surely of very doubtful wisdom. But if Mr. Lummis, with his literary taste and gifts, would contribute an article giving us his own ideas on the most important points of right living, no doubt such suggestions would be welcomed by many.

Liverpool. CLARA ARMSTRONG.

[We certainly are not prepared to welcome a general correspondence on the subject of diet, but what would be interesting and valuable to know would be how far any practical response to Mr. Lummis's appeal has been made in the work of Health Teaching in our churches and schools. We know, for instance, of the invaluable work done by the late Mrs. Cash for years in her health lectures to women at the Rhyl-street Domestic Mission, and were there not some admirable health lectures by Mrs. Enfield Dowson published a few years ago? At more than one of our London Missions courses of lectures to women on the care of children have been given by qualified teachers furnished by the London County Council.—ED. INQ.]

THE BUILDING OF A CHURCH.

A NEW YEAR'S APPEAL.

FRIENDS, we are gathered into this church that we may not be forgetful of God, that the deeper needs of our life may be satisfied. It is good to be together, to acknowledge our desire for the better life, and to find our strength in the living God. It is good to give thanks together, to lift up the heart in reverent prayer, to confess common needs, common aspirations. This is the meaning of fellowship in the church. It is a life of sympathy that should be nurtured here, a home life in which every heart may find its rest because of the brotherly kindness that prevails and the common trust in the all-sufficient grace and goodness of our God.

With what better words can we enter upon the duties and the hopes of another year than these of joyful confidence: "Thou wilt show me the path of life: in Thy presence is fulness of joy." Let us now renew our consecration to this service, the service of God, who has called us to seek after Him and to find Him in the simple faithfulness of our daily lives. We are here to worship God; that is, to acknowledge His goodness, to be true to all the truth He makes clear to us, to do all the good we can, and in every way that opens to us to overcome evil with good. We are here to keep mind and heart open for the incoming of new light, for the deepening of our love of what is true and good, and a more perfect surrender to our Father's will; that we may be really led by Hint in the path of life. And we can only worship Him if we are true to one another in the spirit of brotherly kindness and helpfulness. This implies not a good-natured indifference to faults, but a care for the honour of each one, as of the whole body; it implies reverence for the purpose of God in each individual life, not judging our brother, but knowing that God judges, desiring with all our hearts to strengthen the good, not in ourselves alone, but in everyone who is gathered with us into this fellowship.

The terms of our membership do not include the acceptance of any form of doctrinal belief. It is the bond of sympathy and the common need of God, in which we trust. Thus the more urgent necessity is laid upon us to strengthen the power of that sympathy, and to show that the great need of the human soul finds with us full and thankful satisfaction.

We desire to gather into our fellowship all who find with us a true and helpful spirit of worship, whatever their form of thought. If they will seek with us the truth of God, and in practical life the truth of a brave and faithful manhood, we heartily and thankfully accept their comradeship and ask no further question. I lay stress on this, because there are so many in our time who have broken away from the old lines of thought in religion, but hesitate to join any other church, although they may desire such fellowship, because they do not want to be pledged, but to be left free to think their own thoughts. Now, to such we offer a perfectly frank and cordial welcome. We say that in our fellowship you are free. The name Unitarian attached to our church seems a stumbling-block. If we could find a better name, better as more exactly marking our position and our principles, I for one should most eagerly accept it. But the name "Unitarian," as we use it, does not pledge any member of the church to a special form of doctrine—it simply points to the kind of teaching that may be expected here; and no one need hesitate to join us if he is drawn to us in genuine sympathy, because he cannot or does not care to call himself a Unitarian. If he is one desiring the true life with God, and is glad to join in our services and be welcomed into our fellowship, then he belongs to us; and we appeal to him for the sake of our common cause, to come in and avow himself one of us.

In this way we want to strengthen our position. We believe that we are making here a good home, in which there is growing up a true spirit of religious life, and we want to welcome many newcomers into it. We want to be more helpful and to be able to do a wider and a better work. And we say the cause is worthy, and no one can set himself loyally and heartily to serve it without himself being the better and the happier for it.

But if we are, so to extend our influence for good we must strengthen our fellowship especially on the inward side. If a homeless stranger chances to come in here, he must feel that this is a gathering of people who are in earnest, that with them religion is not a pretence or a convention, but a master power in their lives. He must feel that here is genuine love of truth and desire for true life, a reverent trust in God, and acknowledgment of His holy presence, and a seeking for His help in every need. The silent influence of those who forget themselves in the earnestness of worship will help him to pray. The spirit of reverence, as the spirit of thanksgiving in the hymn of praise, quickly touches the heart, just as on the other hand, the sight of an indifferent or self-satisfied person disturbs and wakens ugly thoughts. The home feeling of welcome and goodwill gives rest and gladness, and the solitary one soon feels that he is no longer a stranger, and that he has something to give as well as to receive. For he, too, helps to make the church a place of rest, the true rest in God, which issues in stronger, better, and more joyous life.

Let me, then, plead once more for this first essential of our common life, that everyone should give all that he can give to help, in hearty goodwill and cheerful service, and feel that this is a work he is called upon to do, in which no one else can do his part, which yet must be done for the common good! For my own part, as your minister, I beg you to remember that everyone who comes in with earnest purpose really to join in our worship puts new life, new power of helping into me, and those who are present when the service begins help more than those who come late. The power of a church is built up of the earnestness, the ready sympathy, and the faithful efforts of its members. Let us, then, agree that in this coming year we will help one another, and bear with one another, and give ourselves to the common cause, even more gladly and earnestly than we have done in the past.

Looking back on the year that is just ended, let me say how thankfully I recognise that the life of our church is sound at heart. We have the germs of a prosperous growth, if only they are tended with due care and guarded from the canker that might destroy.

I do not, of course, mean that there were no little trials accompanying the work. Even in the closest relations of family life there are at times cross purposes, and sensitive feelings may get a jar; and it would be wonderful indeed in the wider circle of friendship in the church, which aims at the ideal of home life, if now and again similar trials had not to be met. But to work together in this way is a splendid discipline for the temper, and the secret of success is in that charity, "the love which seeketh not its own and is not provoked, but hopeth and endureth all things." Nothing of the sort should ever be allowed to hinder the good work, and with those who understand the greatness of the cause for which it is worth while to endure much harder rubs than are ever likely to be met with here, it will not hinder. "If thou canst not make thyself such a one as thou wouldst, how canst thou expect to have another in all things to thy liking?" But love does not see defects, it looks for all the good in others, and rejoices in that.

And may we not say that in this church there is goodwill and a willingness to help and be of service? I know there is. I may not say all that I know, but I have seen quiet acts of kindness and unselfishness and patient helpfulness which have made me very glad and thankful, and I have a thorough confidence that we are set the right way for progress in good feeling and in loyal service.

Whether the future will bring us a large increase in numbers and a larger outward prosperity we cannot say. To guard our inward life, to be doing our work, and to be reaching forward towards the better future, that is our concern, and we need not be anxious about the morrow.

To build up such a church as ours for fellowship in religious life, with freedom to follow only truth, and with the prayer for universal charity—to be the helpers in such building is worth while. It must mean the strengthening of what is best in our own lives, and it cannot fail to be of some help to others.

In fact, when we ask ourselves, Are we loyal, are we doing all we can to help? there comes to us this urgent pleading: It is not for ourselves alone, it is not our work alone, it is God's work in and through us. He has called us to this loyalty to truth, this strong holding to righteousness, this life of brotherly fellowship, and through our faithfulness, though it be in the humblest place, He is declaring truth and strengthening the power of good in the world!

That ought to make us faithful, that ought to give us a great joy, knowing that God is with us, leading us in the path of life and using us for His purposes of eternal good.

God grant that in true humility and faithfulness we may be found worthy of our place in His kingdom and in the great fellowship of living souls!

CHRISTMAS AT THE MANCHESTER DOMESTIC MISSIONS.

Of all the Christmas and New Year's parties and prize-givings of this season it is not possible to publish reports. The following example of what was done at the Manchester Missions may serve as an example of what has happened in many other places. For this we are indebted to our Manchester correspondent:—

At Willert-street they took time by the forelock, and began with a supper to the members of the working men's club, presented and presided over by Mr. G. H. Leigh. On Christmas Eve the young people to the number of eighty had supper together, and, thus fortified, about half of them set forth carol-singing until about four in the morning. On Christmas Day two separate teas were given, the scholars being divided according to age, and numbering together nearly 500. Besides tea there were dolls, articles of clothing, and many other things good to give and good to receive. New Year's Eve saw the recently enlarged chapel quite full at a watch-night service, while on New Year's Day itself there was a congregational tea, at which over 200 sat down, a number considerably enlarged at the subsequent entertainment given by friends from Moss Side. In addition to all this in the Mission buildings, Christmas dinners were taken to many homes, over 100 persons being provided for. All this varied activity Mr. Bishop sums up in the brave words, "We have had a merry Christmas and a good time."

At Renshaw-street they were also very busy. There were special services on the Sunday, conducted by the Rev. J. E. Manning, and the succession of parties commenced on Bank Holiday and ran on until New Year's Day. There were separate parties for juniors, seniors, and adults, and the opportunity was taken to distribute school attendance prizes as well as gifts more special to the season. Besides all this, there was here also a careful distribution in the homes of the poor of good Christmas cheer.

Goulden-street does not lend itself to large gatherings, but the Rev. B. Walker, the missionary here, makes the most of his opportunities. There was a tea party and entertainment on Boxing Day, at which about fifty scholars and poor folk from the district attended. There was also a widespread distribution of "cheer," which, with catholic sympathy, included tobacco for old men as well as toys for children and wholesome dinners for all. Thus the Christmas glow and something of Christian love and brotherhood were brought into the lives of some of the very poorest of our brothers and sisters.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Belfast: Stanhope-street Mission.—On January 3 the congregational soirée was held, the Rev. Wm. H. Drummond presiding. A goodly company attended and much appreciated the music, instrumental and vocal, contributed by several friends from outside. The scholars' annual party took place the following evening, the prize-books for regular attendance being distributed by Mrs. Ridell. The rest of the evening, after the tea and distribution, was given up to games. 130 scholars were present.

Bristol.—The usual Christmas social in connection with the Lewin's Mead choral class took place on Friday week, when Mr. Thomas Gaylard (conductor) was supported by about fifty members and friends, and the evening, which included other amusements, as well as some capital music, was greatly enjoyed.

Burnley.—The Burnley-lane Unitarian Mission has suffered a severe loss in the death of Mr. James Hargreaves on December 26 at the age of 42. He was one of the superintendents and a Sunday-school teacher, and also took his turn as lay preacher. He was born at Higham, near Padiham, and settled at Burnley about 24 years ago. He was employed at Messrs. Gray's, Ltd., as loom overlooker, where he was held in the highest esteem both by the employers and the weavers employed under him. He was brought up a Wesleyan, but many years ago joined the Unitarian Church at Trafalgar-street. He became a member of the committee and also of the choir, and for a short period was treasurer of the church and also secretary of the choir. Since the movement in Burnley-lane commenced he was devoted to that Mission. The funeral was at the Padiham Public Cemetery, and on the Sunday following a memorial service was conducted by the Rev. J. M. Whiteman.

Dudley.—A new organ, built by Messrs. Martin & Coate, of Oxford, was opened on Sunday. A special programme of music was arranged for the evening, when some of the best vocal talent in the neighbourhood was generously put at the disposal of the congregation. Large audiences and liberal collections cheered the hearts of minister and church officers. The organist, Mr. S. Harvey, presided at the organ.

London: Stamford-street.—On Sunday afternoon, January 6, an interesting address was given to the children of the Sunday-school by Dr. Ghosh. Following this, a paper was read at the teachers' conference by Mr. J. C. Ballantyne, of Manchester College, Oxford, at which about twenty teachers and others were present, the subject being "The Use of Illustration in the Sunday-school." In the evening Mr. Ballantyne preached to a good congregation. On Tuesday, January 8, the New Year's Party for the school children was held, when an operetta was performed under the direction of Miss Hall, of Islington, which was much appreciated by all present.

Manchester: Broughton.—On Wednesday next, January 16, the congregation are to hold a reunion of former members and scholars of the Strangeways Church. The meeting is to be in the schoolroom in the Bury New-road.

Manchester: Pendleton.—The New Year Party on Saturday last, January 5, was very largely attended and much enjoyed. Short encouraging addresses were given by the Rev. N. Anderton, who presided, and by Councillor Wigley.

Newcastle-upon-Tyne (Resignation).—The Rev. Frank Walters has resigned the pulpit of the Church of the Divine Unity, and, the resignation having been accepted with many expressions of regret by the congregation, his ministry will terminate in April, at the end of its twenty-second year. We understand that it is not Mr. Walters' intention to retire from active work.

Scarborough.—The congregation of the Westborough Church has just sustained another severe loss by the death of Mr. A. N. Booth, at the early age of forty-one. Mr. Booth was formerly a Baptist, and on his conversion to Unitarianism became a member at Mill Hill, frequently walking five miles each way from his native village of Gildersome, in order to attend the service there, so earnest was he in spirit and so devoted to the new truth revealed to him. He retired to Scarborough some seven years ago, and immediately attached himself to the Unitarian Church, subscribing freely, joining in all its activities, and regularly attending its services. Four or five years ago he was elected to the church committee, and was for a period its chairman; whilst in the town he was a very active and esteemed member of the committee of the Charity Organisation Society.

Stockport.—Last Sunday morning the Rev. B. C. Constable preached on the text, "As thy days, so shall thy strength be," these being the words on the motto cards which he had previously distributed. In the evening he preached his annual sermon to the young,

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

A PUBLIC meeting organised by the National Conference Union for Social Service was held in Manchester on Wednesday evening, in the Memorial Hall, the President, the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed, in the chair. The room in which the meeting was held was by no means crowded, but an earnest and hopeful spirit pervaded the gathering, and the speeches, of which we hope to give some account next week, were of great interest. The Rev. Joseph Wood, President of the National Conference, was, unfortunately, prevented by illness from being present, but addresses were given by the Chairman, Miss Gittins, Miss Johnson, the Revs. H. D. Roberts and Charles Peach, and Councillor Wigley.

WE refer in our leading article this week to a point in regard to the Rev. R. J. Campbell's recent statements on the subject of the "New Theology." They have led to much correspondence in the papers, expressing the most divers and contradictory opinions. The veteran Dr. Guinness Rogers thinks the statements "against the doctrines of every Church," and asks, for what the City Temple was built? His successor at the Grafton-square Congregational Church, Clapham, on the other hand, declares himself "heart and soul with Mr. Campbell." Dr. Clifford, interviewed on the subject by a representative of the Tribune, made a full and interesting statement:—"New theology! There is none about. There is no 'new theology' about it, but there are points that have been brought before the public again and again by different individuals. The first thing, I think, that is necessary is to recognise this fact, that the liberty of prophesying certainly belongs to Congregationalists and Baptists, and that nothing should be done or said that would tend to the limitation of that liberty. The next thing, I think, is that, before people criticise Mr. Campbell, they should really try to understand him. Mr. Campbell is engaged in an effort not simply to expound New Testament teaching, but to set that teaching out in terms of 'the whole,' to use a phrase of his—that is to say, in terms of the entire scheme of things, and the whole of our available knowledge concerning the universe and its contents."

WE must not print the whole of Dr. Clifford's reply, but the following paragraphs on Mr. Campbell's position are of special interest:—"We must not be surprised if some of his statements collide with the accepted creeds of the churches. . . . The doctrine of the immanence of God was obscured by the Augustinian theology, which gave dominance to the idea of the Divine transcendence, and the corruption of that doctrine was seen in the way in which it placed God outside the universe of human life, watching it, observing it, judging it, instead of being in it and even of it. That doctrine is in the Old Testament and in the New, and for the first three centuries of the Christian Church controlled its general interpretation of life. The revival of that doctrine has been proceeding at an accelerated rate for the last fifty years, and Mr. Campbell is applying it to the interpretation of the contents of the New Testament and of life. For the last thirty years there has been a widespread conviction that a re-statement of New Testament truth was on its way. The discontent with the old theology was deep, and tended to the alienation of men from the Christian Church, and to the creation of a strong aversion to theology in all its forms, and in order to re-establish theological science in its true place and secure for it its proper influence in the thought and life of men a re-statement is most urgently required. Therefore Christian men should be ready to welcome efforts pointing towards that re-statement, even though they may not be prepared to accept the tentative conclusions which are arrived at by such thinkers and constructors."

THE Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, secretary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, interviewed by a representative of the Daily Chronicle, made the following reply:—

"Mr. Campbell's theological position is an interesting development, but I do not know that there is anything very 'new' about it. It is a little difficult to characterise it, because no clear, logical statement of what the 'New Theology' amounts to has yet been published."

"So far as I have been able to gather its meaning, it seems to differ very little from the teachings of Unitarians, like the Rev. John Hamilton Thom, Dr. James Martineau, and others whom I might name. I should not myself label Mr. Campbell's utterances as Unitarianism, because at present they seem to be less robust, less consistent, less far-reaching than modern Unitarianism."

"If, however, the starting-point of the New Theology is belief in the immanence of God, I can only say that Theodore Parker and other Unitarians preached that doctrine more than half a century ago, and I do not suppose that any Unitarian minister to-day would regard it as other than a commonplace in his teaching. In speaking of the essential oneness of God and man, I detect in Mr. Campbell's teaching the note of that Neo-Hegelianism about which there is, of course, considerable difference of opinion among philosophical thinkers belonging to various schools of theology."

"Let men everywhere seek to discern the truth, wherever it is, and, when revealed to them, let them declare it, without calling each other names."

It is pleasant to find that men of leading in some of the Free Churches, such as the Rev. R. J. Campbell, are awakening to the fact that the old methods of teaching the Bible in Sunday Schools are no longer adequate. In the monthly magazine, The Young Man, for January, in answer to a correspondent, Mr. Campbell laments that "teachers are expected to treat poetry and legend as though it were literal history and actual fact. Thus the real meaning of some of the most valuable portions of the Bible is lost or obscured. What is wanted, he continues, "is a series of publications which will open to the Sunday School teacher the treasure of spiritual truth contained in myth and Oriental imagery." Then comes a passage which is of especial interest for us: "At present, I am sorry to say, the only really critical and up-to-date manuals of the kind desired are published at Essex Hall. My objection to these is that occasionally they seem to give too much of a Unitarian bias, but this is really very slight. If our correspondent would go and get some of the manuals he would see how simple and interesting they make the Bible seem." It is good to know from the Book Room manager that this advice has been taken.

DR. CLIFFORD has a few words to say with regard to what kind of teaching should be taken from the Bible that, perhaps, may help to clear away some confusion over the question of religious teaching. In a letter to The Times (January 12), he deprecates the idea that ethical should ever be considered as opposed to religious and spiritual, which he maintains should be included therein. He continues: "So far as I know the word 'ethical' in this controversy indicates that use of the Bible which is directed to 'conduct' and not to 'Churchmanship'; to the spirit and motive and qualities of daily 'behaviour' rather than to the memorising or mastering the 'creeds' of the Churches; exactly as I found in Tasmania and New Zealand the word 'secular' was employed to mean 'non-credal,' 'non-theological,' and not non-Biblical. There are five uses of the Bible, the historical, the literary, the ethical, the devotional, and the theological or ecclesiastical. Experience shows that this last use must be kept out of State-provided and State-controlled schools, if we are to have universal justice, freedom from clerical tyranny, and efficiency in education."

In the responsible position of the centre of a signed leader in the Methodist Times one or two startling illustrations of the progress of temperance principles are given. "A quarter of a century ago wine was kept in Wesleyan ministers' vestries for the refreshment of the preachers. The present writer, when a local preacher of three-and-twenty, was offered wine in the vestry on a Sunday morning by a society steward of stainless sanctity, who was his class leader."

A friend of ours on hearing these two sentences read, said:—"Never till now did I realise the full value of the sacrifice I made when I left the Methodists!" Meantime neither the author of the above sentences nor the writer of this note pretends that the Wesleyans were exceptional in this matter. The general sentiment has altered in the last generation, and the only startling word is that which makes the change to have been so very recent.

MR. G. P. DYMOND, M.A. (Head Master of the Hoe Grammar School) is said to have given an "interview" the following statement concerning the management of the religious difficulty in Montreal:—"The next visit was to Montreal, where he found a very strong French element. Many of the English people spoke with a French accent, noticeable even in the tram and bus conductors. There he found a peculiar régime in their schools. They had separate superintendents for the Catholic and Protestant schools, and the people were able to ear-mark their rates and say whether they should be given to the Catholic or the Protestant schools. In some cases where the authorities were neutral, one-fourth of the rates were voted to the Protestant schools and three-fourths to the Catholic schools. Of course, the Catholic schools were much more numerous than the Protestant. This system appeared to work admirably, there never being any signs of friction. The authorities at Montreal seemed to have solved the problem at present troubling the homeland."

MR. HERBERT RIX'S "Tent and Testament" receives very favourable notice in the Methodist Times, which calls it a delightful book. "The author has absorbed some of the advanced ideas of the higher critics, and we cannot always accept his interpretation of a Biblical scene or passage. But he is an intelligent and open-minded guide, and no one can follow his tour through the Holy Land without deriving both pleasure and instruction."

WE are asked to state that the booklet containing information of the steamboat arrangements for the meetings of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers at Boston, U.S.A., in September, will be issued by Messrs. Thos. Cook & Son at the beginning of February. Those who think of making the journey to America should meanwhile make known their intention to the Secretary at Essex Hall. Circulars and booklets, when ready, will be forwarded on application.

THE 77th anniversary of the Brahmo Somaj will be celebrated at Essex Hall on Friday next, Jan. 25, at 8 p.m. The Rev. John Page Hopps will conduct the service. Mr. S. Halder will read a short paper on "The Message of Brahmoism." A discussion will follow on "Doctrines of Incarnation in various Theologies," to be opened by Mr. Bimal C. Ghosh.

NONCONFORMIST BURIALS IN MANCHESTER.

ATTENTION has been previously called to a serious question which has arisen in Manchester in connection with the conduct of public funerals. Some two years ago the City Council was induced to agree to the proposal of the Evangelical Free Church Council to the effect that the latter should prepare a rota of ministers who should undertake duty week by week in the matter of Nonconformist funerals. There is reason to suppose that the City Council acted under the impression that the Evangelical Council represented the whole of the Nonconformity of the city. Unhappily this is not so, and the limitation set on membership in the Evangelical Council has been extended to the public office entrusted to its charge. Unitarian ministers have been rigidly excluded from the rota. Unwilling to raise a public discussion on the matter, the Governing Body of the Manchester District Association of Presbyterian and Unitarian Churches has exhausted every possible form of appeal to both the Evangelical Council and the Cemeteries Committee. The Governing Body has felt compelled to regard the matter most seriously, as it involves nothing less than the re-establishment of theological tests in public affairs. Its feeling was well expressed by Mr. Councillor Marsden as here reported.

The subject came before the City Council last week. It was reported that a memorial has been received from the Manchester District Association of Presbyterian and Unitarian Churches on the "scheme for the conduct of burials in the Nonconformist portions of the Philips Park and Southern Cemeteries," suggesting that the committee should do away with the "rota" and retain in its own hands the control of its cemeteries by appointing their own chaplain or a "rota" of their own. The Committee did not consider it desirable to interfere with the arrangements already existing, and passed a resolution accordingly. Mr. Henry Marsden, J.P., moved that this portion of the Committee's proceedings be referred back, with instructions to inquire whether the Free Church Council can arrange to include all Nonconformist ministers in the "rota," and, failing their ability or willingness to do so, that the Committee itself make arrangements for the conduct of burials in the Nonconformist portions of the cemeteries. He described the proceedings which had led up to the present arrangement, and said certain of the Nonconformist congregations and ministers in the city were excluded from the Free Church Council on the ground of presumed differences of theological opinion. This limitation of membership the Evangelical Free Church Council had carried into its preparation of the "rota" of ministers who should serve at the cemeteries. Thus it set up a theological test for a public service and limited the exercise of a public office to a presumed standard of orthodoxy. If the Free Church Council could not arrange for the inclusion of all forms of Nonconformity on the "rota" then the Cemeteries Committee should resume its freedom to make its own arrangements. It might be said that the excluded ministers could still attend as before to conduct funerals of members of their own congregations, but so could all ministers, and if this sufficiently safeguarded the rights of one section of the community so it would those of another, who could always thus secure themselves against an assumed unacceptable service. Mr. W. B. Pritchard, J.P., seconded the resolution, and Councillors Abbott and Burgon supported it. There was very little said in opposition, but the resolution was lost.

The Special Committee of the Association has met and considered the situation which has now arisen. It has decided to immediately call a public meeting in the Memorial Hall to protest against the action of the City Council. Meanwhile correspondence is beginning to appear in the papers on the subject. This will, it is hoped, be vigorously followed up, when it is believed that many prominent Nonconformists will dissociate themselves from this latter-day act of sectarian intolerance, and that public opinion will compel the City Council to reverse its decision.

MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD.

THE annual meeting of the Trustees of Manchester College was held at the Memorial Hall, Manchester, on Thursday afternoon. A report of the proceedings we shall publish next week, but give here some passages from the Annual Address of the Committee, presented to the meeting.

The Address first recorded the great changes of the past year in the Teaching Staff, due to the retirement of Dr. Drummond and Dr. Odgers, and the appointment of Dr. Carpenter as Principal, with the Chair of New Testament, and the Case Lectureship on Comparative Religion. The resolutions of Farewell to Dr. Drummond and Dr. Odgers passed at the summer meeting of Trustees, which appeared in THE INQUIRER at the time, are embodied in the Address. Then followed an account of further appointments.

The Committee decided to make a request to the Hibbert Trustees to appoint Professor Henry Jones, M.A., LL.D., of Glasgow, as a member of the College Staff and Lecturer in Metaphysics, with special reference to the Philosophical Basis of Religion. Professor Jones, it was understood, would be willing to accept the appointment on the terms that he should reside in Oxford during the summer term, and deliver a public course of lectures twice a week, and conduct, in concert with Mr. Jacks, a weekly tutorial class. During Hilary Term he would deliver six lectures, making special visits from Glasgow for the purpose. It should be mentioned that the suggestion was not merely approved by Mr. Jacks, but that it was largely due to him. The Committee offer Mr. Jacks their cordial thanks for his help in promoting a scheme by which they believe the position and usefulness of the College will be greatly strengthened. They wish that the College should be recognised by earnest minds as a place where the best and highest thought is engaged in dealing with the ultimate problems of religion in a free and reverent spirit, and they believe that with two such lecturers in philosophy as Mr. Jacks and Professor Henry Jones, a large religious influence upon young men will be attained, and that our own students for the ministry will be well equipped for the warfare with materialism and agnosticism which every minister must be prepared to wage.

Professor Henry Jones began his work as Hibbert Lecturer in the summer term of 1906, when he lectured twice a week. Although the notice of his lectures was short, and the summer term is crowded with many engagements, his lecture room was full. The average attendance was about 120. The course was a striking success, and the Committee look forward with high hopes to the work which Professor Jones will do for religious thought in Oxford during the coming years.

The Committee further asked the Hibbert Trustees to assist them with a grant towards the appointment of Dr. Hunter, of Glasgow, as special preacher and lecturer for one year. It was felt that with the loss of Dr. Drummond and Mr. Odgers from the preaching staff, and with no new appointment of a member of the tutorial staff who could take part in the services at the College Chapel, the help of a special preacher would be very valuable. The Committee were fortunate in finding that Dr. Hunter would be willing to serve as special preacher for one year, that he would preach morning and evening for three Sundays in each term, and that he would be glad to give addresses and lectures to the students during the week. He will deal with such subjects as recent Nonconformist History, illustrated in the life and work of great preachers and leaders of religious thought, and he will speak to the students out of a large and rich experience with the view of helping them in their future ministry. Dr. Hunter began his work at the College as special preacher and lecturer in the autumn term of the present session.

Other arrangements made by the Committee in connection with the teaching staff may be described in the words of the recommendation of the Sub-Committee, which was unanimously adopted:—

"That Mr. Addis's appointments be renewed for a further period of five years on the same terms as at present."

"That Mr. Jacks be appointed to the office of Dean; that the appointment be an annual one. That his duties in connection with the External Students, whether residing at Oxford or at any other University, shall be as follows:—

"The Undergraduates at Oxford shall be required to meet the Dean once a fortnight during the term at a stated hour, and all of them together, to report, consult, and advise on what they are doing, and in order that they may be helped in cultivating that art of expression which is so important for them in their future work.

"The Dean shall put himself into communication with the various College tutors of the men, and draw up a combined report, based on the reports of the College tutors, and his own observations; and that this, after having been presented to the Board of Studies and passed by them, shall be forwarded by them to the Committee."

Mr. Jacks has very kindly accepted these important duties, and the Committee feel confident that much good will result to the External Undergraduates through this arrangement.

As concerns ecclesiastical history, the Committee have made arrangements for the present session with Mr. Vernon Bartlett, of Mansfield. The less advanced students will attend his lectures at Mansfield College, and the seniors will read privately with Mr. Bartlett, and will pursue their studies under his direction. The Committee believe that by this means the students will receive all the help they require, and they are glad to feel that there should be this friendly co-operation and fellowship with a lecturer of Mansfield College.

The Committee have to report again the loss by death of many good friends and supporters of the College.

In Mr. David Ainsworth, who was a subscriber since 1865, the College has lost one of its most distinguished Presidents, and one of its most faithful friends. Mr. Ainsworth was a student of the College; he was treasurer from 1874-1891, President from 1896-1900, Vice-President from 1900 to the date of his death, and for many years a member of Committee. He was ever gracious and kind, a firm believer in the principles of the College, and a loyal supporter of it throughout his life.

Mr. William Colfox, of Bridport, followed Mr. Ainsworth in the Presidency of the College, which he held from 1900-1904. He had been a subscriber since 1855. He was a strong, true friend of the College, wise in counsel, and a generous donor to the College funds.

Mrs. George Buckton, of Oxford, who had been a subscriber since 1854, was one of the oldest and most generous supporters of the College. She was beloved by all who knew her, and the memory of her gentle goodness will remain as a precious memory in the hearts of all her friends. The College owes to her the beautiful organ in the chapel and other gifts, and every friend of the College must remember her with affectionate gratitude.

Other Trustees less known, but not less truly friends and supporters of the College whose loss we have to deplore, are Robert Philips Greg, Esq., a Trustee since 1885; A. Currer Briggs, a Trustee since 1899; Miss H. E. Booth, a Trustee since 1892; Dr. J. Cameron, a Trustee since 1894; Frederick A. Harrison, a Trustee since 1894; Robert C. Potter, a Trustee since 1884.

The Treasurer's statement showed a total deficiency of £1,362 1s. 9d., the balance on the wrong side of the general account being £357 11s. 1d., with a deficiency of £564 3s. 2d. from the previous year, and £440 7s. 6d. from the Oxford Repairs and Renewals Fund.

The Session 1906-7 opened with 17 theological students, and 5 undergraduates, all studying at Oxford. Of the theologicals 8 are special students, including the Hungarian, Japanese, and Indian student, and Mr. S. E. Eliot (U.S.A.), formerly Rhodes Scholar at Hertford College. The Address made special reference to the double success of Mr. R. V. Holt in gaining a First Class in the History School and the Earl Stanhope Prize.

The Address concluded, after giving other particulars of the work of the College, as follows:—

In concluding this Address, the Committee wish to express the high hopes with which they look forward to the future work of the College, and the ever-deepening conviction of the great possibilities of usefulness which are open to it. They see a desire for freedom of thought growing in most of the Christian churches. They see a growing dislike of denominational names and creeds and barriers in many religious teachers and thinkers. They see the principles of Manchester College, consciously or unconsciously, accepted by men who, while they may be divided in opinion, are united in spirit. It is with a great hope that they see the larger liberal movement in Christian thought to-day. They feel that Manchester College by its complete freedom, by its love of veracity, by its reverence for whatever is good and true in all the creeds, has an ever-increasing opportunity of doing work on behalf of truth and unity in religion.

The Committee appeal earnestly to the Trustees for help in strengthening and extending the work of a free and reverent teaching of Theology, which was never more needed and never more important than it is to-day.

TOWARDS SOCIAL REFORM.

COLLECTIVE OWNERSHIP: ITS ETHICAL SIGNIFICANCE.

SIR,—The ethics of collectivism, in a discussion of which you invite me to join, may be regarded from different points of view. Mr. Robinson, concerned for the morality of commercialism and taking joint-stock companies for a step towards collectivism, suggests that shareholders are "less really cruel and mean" than they would be if in business on their own account. It is (ethically) time that these constant girdings at trade (survivals, perhaps, from feudal times) should cease. The basis of commerce is credit; this is the product of mutual confidence, hence all traders must deal justly and be reliable if they wish for success. It may be added that many traders have but a poor opinion of some non-trading classes.

Though limited liability be ethically good for the shareholder, it is bad for the workman, thinks Mr. Robinson, for the soul-less company manager wants to pay low wages and does not cultivate personal relations with his workpeople. The answer to that is, that all wages are now much higher than they were in patriarchal or ante-industrial or any recent times, and that the modern self-reliant working man does not want patronage.

But the workman's apotheosis, it seems, comes by collective ownership, that is, municipal trams and the like, and the improved character of the tram men, in certain towns, is adduced as proof. If, for the sake of argument, we grant the improvement, and assume also that it is general, we may suggest that better wages and conditions have attracted a better class of men. In any case, we have here the beginnings of a new danger, namely, the formation of a caste of public servants, whose numbers, united by common interests, will enable them to dictate terms to their employers, at the expense of the ratepayers. This brings us to some other ethical drawbacks of that municipal trading which Mr. Robinson takes as a type or equivalent of collective ownership. The ratepayers fondly imagine that they choose the councillors to whom all active powers in such matters are handed over; but, in reality, they have nothing more than the excitement of voting for gentlemen, selected by the party whips, whose principal qualifications are that they should subscribe liberally to the party funds or should, at least, vote straight. Few independent men have a chance, and as the demands on a councillor's time increase, fewer busy (and therefore experienced) men are, or would be, available. The choice is still further restricted by the tendencies of active politicians, beginning as Poor Law Guardians, to go on to the councils without giving up the Board of Guardians, so that all the control of the poor law, municipal and even educational work of a large town may be in the hands of two or three-score men. This, of course, limits the capacity available, and pro tanto the efficiency attainable. It also tends to favouritism and unethical influences, although we may hope that such practices as are alleged at West Ham and Poplar are still rare.

Administrative functions are necessarily delegated to committees and permanent officials, whose work, being done in private, is shut off from the influence of public opinion. The officials, if they have a sympathetic chairman, are practically despotic. If the chairman is otherwise, their activity is cramped and hindered. In any case, the ratepayer, who is supposed to rejoice ethically in his collective ownership, has little more to say in the matter than if he lived in the moon. Happily, our public officials are capable and honourable, and it is natural that, proud of what they have accomplished, they should wish to extend the field for their operations. Hence, in Parliament and committees, the functions and performances of local governments are constantly being added to. All this needs money, and it not being expedient to press the rates up too high, outside income is sought for. It was observed that private companies purveying water or gas, supplying electric light or running tram cars, having survived the mistakes and struggles of their earlier days, were getting a more or less satisfactory return for their enterprise and former losses, so these were, when possible, annexed. This might have been a prudent thing if finality had been reached, as, perhaps, it has been in the pumping of water, and as, certainly, it has not in any other case. Hence, many corporations are already burdened with out-of-date installations, which private enterprise has left behind, or are without advantages which, in other countries, private enterprise, working harmoniously with municipalities, has provided. A graver ethical disadvantage, however, is the discouragement given to all further development, by the tendency to prevent private persons or companies benefiting by their enterprise or experiment, as for instance, when Mr. Chamberlain, in trying to favour municipal electric ownership, checked electrical work in England and left the country twenty years behind Germany or the United States, where private enterprise still rules. If ever the time, longed for by Collectivists, comes when the State has absorbed all activities, to give them into the hands of officials, all progress must cease. The bureaucrat is, necessarily, sterile. Only in the free air of individual competition can the mind and work of man grow. And the State is merely an agglomeration of men that can never be better than its component atoms. When it deprives them of initiative and responsibility, it itself becomes inert.

SACRED courage indicates that a man loves an idea better than all things in the world; that he is aiming neither at pelf nor comfort, but will venture all to put in act the invisible thought in his mind. He is everywhere a liberator, but of a freedom that is ideal; not seeking to have land or money or conveniences, but to have no other limitation than that which his own constitution imposes. He is free to speak truth; he is not free to lie. He wishes to break every yoke, all over the world which hinders his brother from acting after his thought.—Emerson.

THOSE who are interested in the rational thought developments that are going on quietly in so many quarters within the boundaries of the Established Church, will find the little work entitled "For Faith and Science," recently produced by the Rev. F. H. Woods, B.D., Rector of Bainton, well worth studying. That there are many competing tendencies in the Established Church we know; some making towards supernaturalism in its grosser forms, which demand Royal Commissions to investigate, and some towards a rational faith in keeping with the results of modern science and modern criticism. It is the latter tendency that the book in question illustrates; causing one to wonder afresh at the comprehensiveness of a church that can keep within its boundaries men with views like the author, and at the other end men of pronounced Roman Catholic tendencies, of whom we have heard so much lately, without any violation of its underlying principles and creeds.

We have nothing but commendation for the spirit that has prompted this work, and with many of its results Unitarians generally would agree. But one asks whether this is real orthodox Church of England teaching, and can find but a negative answer.

The author's main object is to investigate the influence that science is exercising upon Christian belief; and this has demanded a preliminary investigation of the belief itself, and the causes that have produced it. The basis on which he builds is the religious consciousness. The foundation of religious belief, including the Christian, is an instinctive faculty, capable of development, which is spoken of as "analogous to the æsthetic tastes" and "practically universal." From this ground or starting point the author proceeds to examine the wide range of Christian ideas and to determine their value in the light of modern knowledge. True, there is scarcely one but whose value he affirms in some sense. The point is in what sense. The Bible is inspired, but it is yet a book with all the usual human limitations, and the criterion of the truth of what it teaches is apparently the harmony of any particular portion of teaching with one's "whole spiritual being, intellectual and moral." Much of the presumed "scientific" teaching of the Bible may be discarded as "mythical" and as "of little if any religious importance." For instance, Genesis i. and ii. And as to inspiration, by that is consequently only meant the truth that "God's spirit moved men to feel and think and act from age to age, and so gradually enabled them to gain a clearer knowledge of Himself, a nobler standard of religion and life, and a deeper sense of sin."

That such a view would be carried out with full consistency would be too much to expect. In dealing with the New Testament, there are lurking indications of the older supernatural ideas of the movement of God's Spirit in human history. Miracles may still be believed in and, to some extent, prophecy too, though, taking everything into account, "it is clear that the argument from miracles and prophecy has not now the same logical force as it once seemed to have." The weakest part of the work is, however, here—in its treatment of the question of miracles. Though the author has got to the point of making it all a question of evidence, his presuppositions rather interfere with his power of estimating the evidence. Still we get some remarkable admissions, as for instance that the evidence for the virgin birth is "somewhat meagre," and one is left free to suppose that it is to be rejected. The physical resurrection of Christ is also put on one side in spite of the testimony of the Gospels. But here one may shelter himself behind the name of Paul and his conception of a "spiritual body."

The doctrine of the Trinity is upheld, though rather weakly. We are warned against the modern tendency to conceive of a Triad of Gods; and the deity of Jesus is always referred to by the ambiguous term "Divinity." Though the author declares that this "divinity" of Jesus is "implied" with varying clearness throughout the New Testament, he relies largely on the Fourth Gospel, the authorship and date of which are admitted to be uncertain. And inadvertently he brings in St. Paul against himself, for, as he says with St. Paul, "God means the one God whom he identifies with the Father." Enough has been said to show the general drift of the book. It belongs to a class of apologetic literature with which nowadays we are fairly familiar, in which the attempt is made to reinterpret Christian doctrine in the light of the conclusions of knowledge won in other departments, and by rationalistic thought. It shows the struggle of larger and broader ideas with many older and narrower, and the interest of the book lies in the way it illustrates how this is going on among an increasing number of teachers within the borders of the Established Church.

J. WORSLEY AUSTIN.

THE MEANING OF LIFE.*

It is not easy to say anything quite new on the subject chosen by Miss Albright for her essays. But that does not take away by any means from their interest. Indeed, it is because their subject-matter interests us all so much that one finds little fresh to write about it. What we most desire, when we take up a new volume of studies on the relation of the Individual to the Universal Self, is the note of personality and conviction; and there is no page of the book before us from which this is absent. It is packed besides with well-chosen thoughts from many fields, and all are woven together into one purpose.

The book speaks first of the mystical sense of the meaning hidden in the whole of life; and of the way in which this "Open Secret" may be guessed. The way is that of "a certain quality of faith, hope and love," which brings all faculties to the search, and gives control to that which co-ordinates all, not the reason, but "the heart."

The author turns then to discuss the significance of beauty, laying emphasis upon its "irresistible force" and

"appeal" to "pure appreciation." Beauty appears to her as a "message from the Heart of Love" to the heart of man.

But what is this heart of man? What indeed am I? "All that I can tell about myself is my relationship to things and people outside of me. I have no self independently of them," she says. But she adds, "Beyond a certain bastion, the fortress of self is impregnable. . . . We know of no power that can annihilate the self." These twin ideas of the indestructible self, and of its intimate relation to the whole, are central in the book; it is upon them that Miss Albright's view of duty rests, and her decision of the conflicting claims of egoism and altruism. Neither the separateness of the Self nor the Other can be final in our view of the whole. And when we recognise the common unity, and see ourselves and others as parts of a diviner whole," we shall see that Society claims of us not self-denial, but a nobler, truer manhood.

Miss Albright discusses the problems of sin, pain, and failure in the spirit of Professor Royce, and sees in the whole process of history, evidence of the creative labour of an immanent God; no mere blind, inchoate "principle of progress," if such could be, but an eternal purpose and idea creating a "perfect form."

The Immanence of God is necessarily associated with the Incarnation; not alone in general history, but in individual experience. Christianity can mean little for such thinkers as Miss Albright, unless it means that the Incarnation of the Christ is a matter of personal experience. "The Christ who was born once in Jewry, has to be born again in the hearts of all who would attain their true manhood."

Thus conceived as potentially divine, manhood is seen in these essays taking its due place in the midst of the great fellowship of Nature, wielding the creative power of Love and of divine desire. "He (Man) is capable of entering into conscious relationship with the world in which he finds himself, and uniting himself with what he believes to be the purpose of the whole. . . . His mere desire may have power to call forth elements unknown to exist before, and in fact it must be so if he is to work out that impulse of self-development that drives him on." He comes to the limits of what he conceives to be possible; but "the impossible with men proves to be the possible with God." These sentences are no mere pious paradox; they represent the author's conviction that faith finds a response everywhere in the Universe, a response which only faith can find. For she is of the school of the mystics, and knows no separation between the temporal and eternal. Her concluding essay, "The Eternal Now," is an attempt to suggest that "Our very finite selves take us out into the depths of the infinite and launch us on the ocean of the ideal, while the 'present' moment opens up into a world, not only where time limits fade away, but where experiences show themselves to have the element of eternity, i.e., 'the complete and perfect possession of unlimited life all at once.'" She believes that the object of all experience is to produce the character of loyalty, of "conscious adherence of the individual will to the central will." Our own contribution is essential to the whole. "We have a share in the making of the world. . . . We are permitted, if we will, to enter into fellowship with the purposes and thoughts of the master of the house." And the way into that fellowship is the way of the mystics, the way of "the silence of the heart 'that watches and receives.'" In this silence we bare our souls to see the mystery within us and around, and wait for the Infinite influence to work upon us as He will."

The book is one which should appeal directly and powerfully to the thoughtful worker among life's practical problems. For its atmosphere is as full of the finest piety as of the more robust and fearless qualities of faith, while it is always charged with thought and purpose. If there are passages in which its expression suffers from lack of either definition or of amplification there are certainly others of striking felicity. Finally, the book itself has space in it, and is pleasant to look upon and to read.

SHORT NOTICES.

The Reformers' Year Book, 1907, formerly the "Labour Annual," of which the present is the thirteenth annual issue, is edited for the use of "the student, the representative and the social reformer," by F. W. Pethick Lawrence and Joseph Edwards. It is full of useful information, particularly as to Labour representation and the year's efforts in legislation, and the Women's movement. Some amusement as well as serious interest may be got out of the portraits. The directory of reformers, the biographies of prominent workers, and the classified list of the year's publications on social reform questions are among the useful contents of the book. (4, Clement's-inn, Strand, W.C. 1s., or in cloth, 2s. net.)

The World's Work entered upon a new volume (the eleventh) with December, under new editorship, and the January number is marked No. 50. As frontispiece there is a portrait of our new American Ambassador, the Hon. Whitelaw Reid, who also writes on "How the United States Faced its Educational Problem." Mr. Henry Norman, the former editor, still writes on Motor Cars, &c., in its pages, and the magazine is as full of interest and good pictures as ever. (W. Heinemann. 1s. net.)

Theology and Truth. By Newton H. Marshall, M.A., Ph.D., contains a convenient summary of the fundamental problems of Theistic belief as they shape themselves at the present time. The author appears to be a liberal Nonconformist. He writes somewhat drily, in a style clear, but by no means "popular." The writings of Martineau and Professor Upton are frequently referred to. The book seems calculated to be of most use to busy ministers who have not time to study large books, but who are interested in the present tendencies of religious thought regarding fundamental questions. SHOULD CHRISTIANS MAKE FORTUNES ? *

MR. GLEDSTONE answers this question in the negative. According to him fortune-making is inconsistent with Christianity. And as, by his definition, a "fortune" means any money or other possessions laid up against future contingencies, such as old age, the question concerns many of us who are far enough from being millionaires.

In the first half of his book our author seeks to expound the New Testament teaching on the subject, and in the second he endeavours to show how this teaching, as he understands it, would work amid the conditions of modern life. There is much in both sections that is well and truly said, and the second part especially deserves the attention of all, and they are not a few upon whose minds and consciences this question is beginning to weigh.

Mr. Gledstone gives a literal interpretation to the saying in the Sermon on the Mount, "Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth," and rightly we think. It has been usual to explain the saying as though Jesus meant no more than that those whom he addressed should not be unduly attached to riches, that, in fact, they might heap up wealth to any extent they pleased and could, if only they did not become misers and worldlings. It is becoming clear, however, to every student of the Gospels, that this way of dealing with the words of Jesus is not the proper one, and Mr. Gledstone has the authority of the best scholars for all he has to say in condemnation of it. So far, then, as regards the meaning of the saying, we find ourselves in complete agreement with him; but we think him mistaken in assuming that the words were addressed by Jesus to the people generally. It has long been recognised that the Sermon on the Mount is not a connected utterance delivered on a single occasion, but is rather a collection of sayings spoken at different times and to various kinds of hearers. The likelihood is that the saying we refer to had a more limited application than Mr. Gledstone supposes. It was addressed most probably to the Twelve, and to those who like them were devoting themselves, or were invited to devote themselves, to the preaching of the Good News. The purpose of Jesus in thus insisting on their renunciation of wealth is not difficult to realise. He wanted to detach them from other callings and interests, in order that they might give themselves whole-heartedly to the service of the Gospel. That the first disciples did abandon all their wealth, such as it was, and their wonted means of living (their fishing, tax-gathering, &c.), at the Master's bidding, is abundantly clear; that some men in whom he recognised possible disciples or apostles made the great refusal is also clear; but it is just as evident that he did not demand such a sacrifice from everyone whom he addressed and who happened to show faith in him:

The rule laid down by Jesus that preachers should have no livelihood but their ministry has been generally observed, and doubtless with great advantage to the success of their work. But even in very early times it was not regarded as a hard and fast rule, admitting of no exception. Paul accepted the principle that they who preach the Gospel should live by the Gospel, but we know that he allowed himself some liberty in practice, working at his trade as tentmaker so as not to be burdensome to the churches. The possibility of men receiving handsome remuneration for their labours on behalf of the Gospel is not likely to have occurred to Jesus; and whether his dictum that "the labourer is worthy of his hire" is appropriate to such cases is a question that has to be argued on its own merits; it cannot be decided by reference to sayings of his which assume, as of the very nature of things, that the preacher's lot is one of poverty and hardship. The aim of Jesus, as we have indicated, was to detach his men from their accustomed ways and means of living. That object gained he could doubtless think them entitled to such comfort and wealth as the faithful could afford to give. And this might easily amount to a "fortune" in Mr. Gledstone's sense!

While, however, we do not think that Jesus condemned fortune-making so absolutely and universally as our author imagines, we heartily commend this little book for its hot wrath against the unscrupulous and selfish rich, its sympathy with the down-trodden poor, its plea for simplicity of living and faith in God; its earnest reminder of the too often forgotten text, "Keep yourselves from all covetousness, for a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth."

J. M. CONNELL.

"THE PARAGRAPH PULPIT."

By THE REV. CHARLES W. CASSON, MINISTER OF THE CHURCH OF OUR FATHER, OTTAWA, CANADA.

OPPORTUNITIES and obstacles generally appear together. The Canadian field, as regards our Unitarian work, especially exemplifies this fact. The present unrest in religious thought, and the lack of faith in the orthodox fold, coupled with a sincere desire to recognise the real in religion, give to us a splendid opportunity and an imperative duty. On the other hand, the conditions of the Canadian territory are such as to present serious obstacles in the way of regular missionary work. Cities are far apart, prejudice abounds, and the liberal nucleus, unlike cobalt silver, does not lie on the surface. Radicalism is reclusive, and needs to be stirred and strengthened, that it may seek the open. Many liberals have not realised their unity with Unitarianism, and must be given a chance to find themselves.

As a method for accomplishing this work in spite of these obstacles, I have devised the "Paragraph Pulpit." A certain space is contracted for in the columns of representative daily newspapers in Canada on a purely business advertising basis. In this space is printed a daily paragraph sermonette, under the heading of "The Paragraph Pulpit," in which a Unitarian principle is clearly and strikingly expressed.

This plan is already in successful operation. On October 1 a contract for one year was signed with the daily morning and evening Citizen, of Ottawa, and on November 10, a similar contract was made with the British Whig, of Kingston. As a result of these contracts I am preaching daily at the present time to an audience of at least 16,000 people, that being the net circulation of the two papers. This means that in Ottawa, the capital city of the Dominion, and since the Citizen is the only morning paper in the city, our Unitarian thought is going into practically every business office in the city, into thousands of homes, and is read by every member of parliament who reads a daily paper before noon. In Kingston is Queen's University, where I have been assured there is much liberal unrest among the students.

It is our wish and purpose to extend this system over a large part of Canada, and thus to create and crystallise the liberal sentiment. There are at least twenty cities where splendid work may be done in this way, and where the foundations for future organisation may be economically and effectively laid. Indeed, in no other way can this preparatory work be done so easily and so well. For the enlargement of the plan I am raising the Canadian Unitarian Press Fund, having a minimum of $1,000 and no maximum. From present indications the extension will be financially possible.

This press plan has been received with much enthusiasm, both in Canada and the United States. On November 1 the Middle States and Canada Conference, meeting at Rochester, New York, enthusiastically, and unanimously endorsed the method, showing its sympathy by resolution and a generous contribution. Many prominent Unitarian ministers in Boston and New York have expressed their appreciation by word and cheque. Rev. Samuel A. Eliot, president of the American Unitarian Association, has given the plan his complete approval. Canadian newspapers are referring in terms of praise to the unique and progressive movement.

The effect of the publication of the "Paragraph Pulpit" has been most marked, both in and out of the Ottawa church. It is arousing wide interest, evidence of which is seen in rapidly growing audiences, especially at the evening service. Many people are being reached for the first time, and not a few are being permanently retained as members. Letters from many parts of Canada, with contributions of cash or criticism, show how wide is the influence and how great is the interest. Viewing the matter from every standpoint, it is very evident that we have started a missionary plan that is well adapted to the time and territory, that promises large and beneficial results, and that has already proven its merits.

I do not write this article as a request for contributions, but lest anyone should fancy that we are unwilling to share this fine enterprise with others, let me say that an English sovereign is just five times as effective in this work as an American dollar bill.

Our readers will, we feel sure, like to know more of Mr. Casson's novel plan of missionary work, and we are glad to be able to add here some examples of how he preaches from his "Paragraph Pulpit."

* "Should Christians Make Fortunes?" By James Paterson Gledstone. (Headley Brothers.)

Accepting the Bible.

Some one said the other day, "Why, Unitarians reject the Bible!" Nonsense! Do you reject a fish when you refuse to swallow it, bones and all? Do you reject the letter of a friend because there are certain errors in it? Surely not. And Unitarians accept the Bible as a sacred book, but insist upon the right of rejecting what is not reasonable in it. They do not accept it for its past face value, but for its present fact value. They give it high and honoured place as the record of religious thought in the past, but not as an infallible guide in the present.

Unitarian Belief in God.

It is urged against the Unitarians that they do not believe in God. It is not an argument; it is a foolish error. As a Methodist minister I believed in God, but as a Unitarian minister to-day, I find that the only change in my faith is that it has grown more ample and more sure. The conception has changed, but the conviction grows more clear with each new day of Unitarian progress. This statement is not mere speculation, but is the voicing of actual experience. If you have been taught to believe that Unitarianism is simply unbelief, you may correct the mistake.

The Grip of Truth.

The Unitarian principle concerning truth is that it is not something to hold, but something to be held by. No man can truly believe until the truth fairly forces itself upon him. Belief is based on the inability to deny. Truth is not a toy to be played with and cast aside at will; it is a stern master, commanding obedience. If your possession of any truth depends upon your grip of it, let it go! If it be truly truth it will retain its firm grip of you. Accept nothing, therefore, but the undeniable truth.

The Spirit of Love.

The spirit of true religion is love. It is not sectarian. It has no loyalty to names or tradition. It takes no pride in apostolic successions or prophet pedigrees. It recognises no denomination, and refuses to judge a life by a label. It finds its impulse in love to God and man. Its chief asset is sympathy. It is love-conquered life, reaching out to other life in love. It is love a-surge, swelling with desire to add to the sum total of human good and gains. It is like the bird-song, making the very atmosphere vibrant with melody. Is your religion true?

The Ministry of Love.

I proclaim the ministry of love. It is the most effective. What learning cannot accomplish love can effect. The lover is greater than the thinker. Affection is more potent than argument. Kindness of heart is more forceful than keenness of intellect. Love is omnipotent, and not to be resisted or refused. If you would save the world, silence your arguments, shelve your particular theories, drop your infallible scheme, and go out and LOVE! Love will find its own way of fulfilling itself, and so fulfilling the kindly purposes of the God of love.

The Religion of Jesus.

The religion of Jesus was summed up in love of God and man. The grandest word was love. The chiefest duty was love. The highest law was love. The vitallest principle was love. The divinest thing was love. Love was the essence and the essential. Then let us have done with our paltry strife over dogmas and divisions. The heart of the Christian religion is love, and only he who loves can possibly understand the message or fulfil the mission of Jesus of Nazareth. If you do not love your fellows you have never learned the chief lesson of the Christian religion.

The True Minister.

Whoever serves, or seeks to serve, his fellowmen, is a true minister of God. He may or may not believe in or attend any church; he may never have formulated his faith in words; he may never have taken sacred vow or sacrament; but if he loves and serves, the loving and the serving are his certificates of good standing. He may be clad in overalls, and work in a subway ditch, and talk broken English; but if he loves and serves, no archbishop takes precedence over him in the wider ministry whose spirit is love and whose ritual is service.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

THE GREATEST THING IN THE WORLD.

II.

ON the following Sunday, Jessie Barnett being still a prisoner in her room, the talk with her mother was eagerly looked forward to as during the week she had turned over in her mind some of the statements heard at the church she had attended while at school.

"Is it true, mother," she asked, "that God does not love all His children? For Mr. Goldson once said that only people who believed in Jesus would be saved; and I remember you told me that Buddhists and Mahomedans know nothing about Jesus."

"Ah, Jessie," said Mrs. Barnett, "can you imagine your own father caring only for Jack and not caring for you?"

"Why no, mother, of course I cannot!"

"Then, Jessie, you may be sure that the Heavenly Father must also care for and love every part of His human family, and indeed all His creatures. You know Francis of Assisi loved even the birds and beasts; and, as Tennyson writes, he 'used to call the very flowers sisters, brothers—and the beasts—whose pains are hardly less than ours.' Surely God cannot be less compassionate than man! When you are older I should like you to read a poem by Matthew Arnold called 'The Neckan.' This was a sort of sea creature or merman, who married a mortal, and carried her to his sea-home, where (having found that her husband had never been baptised) she sat and moaned, and wept because she had not a Christian mate. So poor Neckan rose again through the sea-billows, and waited patiently to find a priest who would make upon his brow the Sign of the Cross, that thus he might finally gain heaven with his spouse. At length, as he sat playing his golden harp one evening under the birch trees, Neckan saw a priest riding by; and the hope rose in his heart that now, indeed, he might be made into a Christian, as the Priest could baptize him, and then his wife would be happy! But the haughty priest cried out that sooner should the staff which he carried in his hand bear leaves than that Neckan should gain heaven! But lo! the staff budded, and greened, and branched and waved! And the proud priest knew (to his chagrin) that even the 'lost sea-creature' was not to be shut out of the heaven for which he craved; even Neckan was to be 'saved.' And so, ever after this, the merman sang that 'the earth had kindness, and the sea, the stars, and God above, but ah! not human souls.' By this poem Arnold meant to teach that 'the love of God is wider than the measure of man's mind.'

"In another poem, called 'The Good Shepherd with the Kid,' he works out the same idea. In the early days of Christianity there were some who held that only those who, after baptism, never sinned again would be saved. But others, who had drunk more deeply of the spirit of Christ, and had treasured up the stories he had told of the love of God, felt that even the most sinful when they forsook their evil ways would be able to find forgiveness and peace. A lamb, as you know, was looked upon as an image of innocence; and sinners were represented by goats. Arnold, in this poem, which is a sonnet, tells how, in the Catacombs at Rome, there was found a drawing of Jesus, carrying on his shoulder not the customary lamb, but a kid, or young goat, showing how Jesus sought to save even those who were accounted 'lost.'"

"What a beautiful idea, mother," said Jessie; "it's as good as a whole sermon, and far plainer. Why it's almost like a picture of the Prodigal Son! I think you must let me read that sonnet for myself, mother."

"Well, you shall do so, Jessie," said Mrs. Barnett; "and perhaps you may be able to understand most of it. And now I must not let you talk any more to-day."

ALICE A. LUCAS.

THE GOOD SHEPHERD WITH THE KID:
He saves the sheep, the goats he doth not save.

So rang Tertullian's sentence, on the side

Of that un pitying Phrygian sect which cried:

"Him can no fount of fresh forgiveness lave,

Who sins, once wash'd by the baptismal wave."

So spake the fierce Tertullian. But she sigh'd,

The infant Church! Of love she felt the tide

Stream on her from her Lord's yet recent grave.

And then she smiled, and in the Catacombs,

With eye suffused but heart inspired true,
On those walls subterranean, where she hid

Her head in ignominy, death, and tombs,
She her Good Shepherd's hasty image drew—

And on his shoulders, not a lamb, a kid:

PROGRESSIVE THEOLOGY.

WE were naturally a good deal astonished to see a statement with regard to Unitarianism attributed to the Rev. R. J. CAMPBELL, of the City Temple, in the course of an interview, in the Daily Mail of last Saturday, and unfortunately repeated in Monday's Tribune, and doubtless elsewhere, but corrected by Mr. CAMPBELL himself in the Daily Mail of Monday.

The interview was concerned with the "New Theology," a term which Mr. CAMPBELL dislikes, but finds it difficult to avoid, as currently describing "a certain tendency towards liberalism in modern religious thought." (We quote from the interview.) "It denotes an attitude and a spirit, rather than a creed. We object to the formal statements of belief which have distinguished the theology of the past. We object to ecclesiastical labels. Everyone knows that for the past twenty years there has been considerable uneasiness in the churches, due largely to the development of scientific knowledge, the progress of archæology, and the study of comparative religion. This uneasiness has affected every church, even Rome. From the side of science the new theology is typified in the work of men like Sir OLIVER LODGE."

There is a great cleavage, Mr. CAMPBELL continued, between the old and the new, the starting point of the new being "belief in the immanence of God and the essential oneness of God and man." Then followed the unfortunate sentences, which it is a great pity Mr. CAMPBELL had not the opportunity of revising before the interview was published, to have avoided the wide dissemination of so grave a misrepresentation.

"This is where it differs from Unitarianism," we read in the interview. "Unitarianism made a great gulf and put man on one side and God on the other."

In Monday's Daily Mail Mr. CAMPBELL wrote: "The sentence about Unitarianism is inaccurate, because unqualified. The ordinary Unitarian certainly does insist on the Divine Immanence as much as we do, but that does not make the New Theology a victory for Unitarianism: My contention is that Unitarianism and Trinitarianism alike have tended too much in the past to separate between man and God. In the New Theology the old issue between Unitarianism and Trinitarianism simply ceases to exist; we do need the names."

The acknowledgment of that last sentence on the part of a fearless champion of the "New Theology," we most cordially welcome, and can only wish that it might be fully accepted by all thoughtful and earnest religious people. Certainly, we have no desire to consider from any denominational point of view whether this is a victory for "Unitarianism." Our one concern, we trust, is that Truth should prosper, with constant victory over less perfect forms of thought, and over falsehood and misrepresentation.

And if we are to take "Unitarianism" as denoting the kind of religious teaching prevalent among the people called Unitarians in our Free Churches during the past century, Mr. CAMPBELL's correction of the interview needs to be carried a good deal further than it has gone. It is not only that "the ordinary Unitarian" certainly does now insist on the Divine Immanence as much as other liberal and progressive theologians, but that for generations, and long before Mr. CAMPBELL or most of us were born, their most influential teachers have been insisting on the fundamental spiritual truth expressed in the doctrine of Divine Immanence.

Of eighteenth century Deism and of what is commonly described as the "Unitarianism of PRIESTLEY and BELSHAM," which belonged to the end of that century and the early years of the nineteenth, and doubtless had its survivals much later, it may be true that they "made a great gulf and put man on one side and God on the other"; but since CHANNING and MARTINEAU began to teach, nothing could be further from the truth, as to the spiritual religion of which they were the prophets, and since the middle of last century theirs has certainly been the prevailing influence among Unitarians.

We quoted last week a passage from the first sermon in MARTINEAU's "Endeavours after the Christian Life," published in 1843, on the kindred nature in man and God, "for no merely finite being can possibly believe the infinite"; and two years earlier he wrote in the Christian Teacher: "The relation which thus subsists between the human conscience and the Divine excellence leads us to avow a faith in the strictly divine and inspired character of our own highest desires and best affections. : : : These really constitute a participation in the Divine nature." *

* See these and other illustrative passages, quoted in the introduction to the revised edition of Professor Upton's survey of "Dr. Martineau's Philosophy" (1905); to be had now at Essex Hall for 3s. 6d. net.

And if anyone wishes to be reminded of the character of CHANNING's teaching, let him turn to such a sermon as that on "The Imitableness of CHRIST's Character," with its avowals: "All minds are of one family," "All souls are one in nature," from the lowliest to the highest, of the "family of God." Or consider this passage, written from a letter by CHANNING in 1837:—

"I feel that among liberal Christians the preaching has been too vague, has wanted unity, has scattered attention too much. In my own labours there has been more unity, perhaps in consequence of the strong hold which one sublime idea has taken of my mind. This is, the greatness of the soul, its divinity, its union with God,—not by passive dependence, but by spiritual likeness,—its receptiveness of his spirit, its self-forming power, its destination to ineffable glory, its immortality. This great view binds together all other truth. I think of God as the Father and Inspirer of the soul, of CHRIST as its redeemer and model, of Christianity as given to enlighten, perfect, and glorify it, of the universe as its school, nutriment, teacher, of all outward beauty as its emblem, of life as appointed for its discipline, and death for its passage to a higher being, of heaven as its perfection, of hell as its ruin. I understand the love which passeth knowledge, when I consider that God looks, as none other can do, into the soul, and comprehends its greatness, perils, and destiny. Love to God seems to me to be founded not on his outward benefits, but in regard to him as the Father of the spirit, present to it, dwelling in it, calling it by conscience and by his providence to perfection, to himself. Love to man has no foundation but in the comprehension of his spiritual nature, and of his spiritual connection with God." (CHANNING'S LIFE. A.U.A., one volume edition, 1880, p. 445.)

We might, of course, multiply quotations from these and other of our chief Unitarian teachers during the past seventy years, and may refer especially to the essay on "Incarnation," by the Rev. W. C. GANNETT, author of "Blessed be Drudgery," included in the little volume, "What do Unitarians Believe and Teach?" issued last year by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. But our purpose is served if we have reminded Mr. CAMPBELL and others, whom these lines may reach, that it is not a thing of yesterday with Unitarians both in this country and America, nor of one generation only, that they have had nothing to do with the making of "a great gulf" between man and God.

WHEN Latimer preached his sermons "On the Plough," he voiced a real religion. The ploughman confronted the priest. He also had a faith. He believed in patient industry, in integrity. He found God in his manly labour. Let the clergy do their work as faithfully as the farmer did his and all would be well. Here was a great stream of religious life mingling with the religion of the Church and purifying it.—S. M. Crothers;

RELIGIOUS MOVEMENTS IN HOLLAND.

It is now nearly two years since Dr. Kuyper's Universities Bill was voted by the Second and First Chamber of the Dutch Parliament. For the present the Clerical majority of 1904 is a minority. In 1905 the united Liberal parties succeeded in beating the united orthodox Protestant and Roman Catholics. They gained a small majority. The new Second Chamber consisted of 48 Clericals and 52 Liberals. The new government did not try to get the newly voted Bill withdrawn, but did all that was required to give it a fair trial. Until now things are very little different from what they were before. One of the main points in the Bill was that private societies should have the right of appointing special professors in the State Universities, if they were found to possess about £8,000. The meaning of this was to enable the various denominations to appoint professors of theology, besides the professors in the State-faculty of Theology, this faculty being of an undenominational character. The churches existing in 1877 had already the right to appoint professors for dogmatics and other branches of theology they might desire to be taught by their own men; but now every denomination or society should have the right of appointing extraordinary professors in whatever branch of science it might like. The result of the new law has been that not a single extraordinary professor has been appointed, and that nothing is heard of any denomination or society wishing to do so, or collecting money for the said purpose. It should have been easy for a Calvinistic society to appoint one of their ministers, residing in a university-town, a professor of theology. It is evident that the great need for broader teaching, the Clericals liked to talk about, did not exist.

A second point of the Bill was that private societies should have the right of founding universities of at least three faculties and nine professors. It seems that the Roman Catholics intend to found a Roman Catholic University at Utrecht. No doubt this will be of high importance for the Dutch Roman Catholics. The clergy now are educated in seminaries, and are not very much thought of by their Belgian neighbours, who possess a complete University at Leuven, with a great number of professors in five faculties. In Holland, medicine, science, law, and letters can only be studied by Roman Catholics at the Universities of the State. If they succeed in founding a private university, the result will be that Protestants and Roman Catholics will live perfectly separated in their own circles, without a real knowledge of each other. Rome will do all it can to strengthen its position, and the result of the Calvinistic hatred against Liberal ideas will be a reinforcement of Rome, which is really its greatest enemy. Dr. Kuyper thought himself very clever in uniting with Rome in the political struggle. Sooner or later the Calvinists will find that it is dangerous to invoke the aid of enemies so sharp and clever as Rome has almost always proved to be.

A third point of the Bill was the obligation for the Government to bring before the Second Chamber a Bill dealing with the revision of the present State faculty of Theology within three years after the voting of the Universities Bill. What is to become of this point is not yet clear. The chief argument against the present condition was that no "dogmatics" were taught in the faculty. It was maintained that the faculty really was a faculty of theological science and not of theology. It was to become again a faculty of theology, by the appointment of a professor of dogmatics, who would be for the faculty what the head is to the body. During the discussion of the University Bill there was a great divergence of opinion as to the kind of dogmatics to be taught. Was it to be Roman Catholic or Calvinistic or Dutch Reformed or Lutheran? It proved impossible to realise the ideal of the orthodox Protestant members of Parliament, and, in order to find a way out, they proposed that the coming Government should offer a Bill concerning this Faculty within three years. The argument is of a purely artificial nature. In every university dogmatics are taught by the professors appointed by the various churches that desire their students to be educated at the universities. These professors are extraordinary members of the Faculty and Senate of the University. Even if what seems to be impossible should happen, and the various parties agreed upon the sort of dogmatics to be taught in the Faculty, the only difference would be that this professor would be an ordinary member of the Faculty instead of an extraordinary one. If the old Sacred Theology is to be restored by so slight a difference, the present state of affairs cannot be very bad. A strange thing is also that the present Liberal Government is compelled to offer a Bill for a revision of the Faculty it does not desire. In the meantime, the Synod of the Dutch Reformed Church that is practically most interested in the matter, all the theological students at the State Universities being Dutch Reformed (with a very few exceptions), proved to be pretty well satisfied with the present conditions. So it is to be expected that the compulsory revision will be merely a matter of form, if a Bill is offered at all.

Last year saw a good deal of improvement in the Liberal organisation within the Dutch Reformed Church. It is remarkable how difficult it is to organise Liberal thinking people. Long since it became evident that a union of the Liberal elements within the Dutch Reformed Church was necessary if these elements were not to be expelled by their orthodox antagonists, but several efforts to unite the scattered elements into a strong body failed. The Protestantbond appeared not the right body for this organisation. Then the Evangelical Union was founded, and tried to gain the sympathy of the more conservative Evangelicals, and at the same time of the "Moderns." It had no success. But now provincial organisations have sprung up and they seem able to awaken the necessary interest. The first Provincial Union was founded in Friesland under most promising circumstances: The Frisians have a sort of national feeling for their province, and if anything specially "Frisian" is established, it may be sure to interest a good many. Their Union quickly proved a success, and much good work has already been done. The example of Friesland was followed in other provinces, and though some of these unions are rather weak, it seems that this way of organisation will strengthen the cause of Liberalism in a very helpful manner. Lately a Central Committee has been appointed by the various provincial unions, and we hope that this committee will be able to help those Liberal congregations that are situated in a province in which the number of Liberal communities is so unimportant, that it is not practicable for them to form a union of their own for mutual aid. The work done by these Unions consists of giving grants to Liberal communities for increasing the salary of the minister, giving stipends to Liberal theological students, lecturing, preaching, and religious teaching in places in which no liberal minister resides. In the Synod there is now a considerable orthodox majority. Last year they began thinking about measures against the Liberal candidates for the ministry. They have at present to subscribe a declaration that they are willing to preach the Gospel of Jesus Christ. This year's Synod proposes to the lower committee (that have to vote the proposals of the Synod before they can become law) to read these words: To preach the Gospel of Jesus Christ, according to the Scriptures of the Old and New Testament. No difficulty will arise if this proposal is accepted, the additions being perfectly harmless for Liberal preachers. But it is evident that some day the Synod may try to add to this declaration some words a Liberal candidate might not be able to subscribe to. In this case only the opposition of a strong and well-organised minority could prevent the local committee voting the proposed formula. In this way, about thirty years ago, some 400 ministers compelled the Synod to withdraw a proposal they declared to be unacceptable. The benefit of the present harmless orthodox action is that the Liberals in the church, who were pretty well asleep years ago, are now stirred up.

Last month gave us a new instance of the old truth that antipathy against brethren is often greater than aversion to strangers. Tribes of the same offspring often are great enemies, and nations of wholly different character more easily make friends than nations which are closely related. One of the Reformed ministers of the Hague used to be an ardent opponent of Liberal religious thinking, of what is called in Holland "Modernism." Nevertheless he and some of his colleagues in the ministry at the Hague have defended the right of the higher criticism in meetings of ministers on various occasions. As they did not allude to their critical opinions in their sermons, the members of the congregations did not know about these things. It even was a dogma among ministers of a Moderate orthodoxy that it was not allowable to teach their pupils things that did not conform to the common orthodox opinion, whatever might be the private opinion of the teacher. In the Hague this method is now given up, and in consequence of this there has been much trouble in orthodox circles. In a recent sermon Dr. Cramer confessed himself to belong to the defenders of higher criticism; he showed his audience that their talk about the Confessions and Inspiration and Satisfaction was very like the ways of the Pharisees, and suggested that the real Spirit of Christ was not to be found in current orthodoxy. Since this sermon a good many of the congregations call him a "Modern." And now the strange thing is that Dr. Cramer maintains that he is Orthodox. And many so-called ethical Orthodox professors and ministers are doing the same thing. If they would only tell in plain words what they believe, very soon the number of Liberal ministers would be doubled, but the majority of them like to keep up appearances. There is a Dutch proverb, "The blood creeps where it cannot go," and we are glad of the progress of Liberal religious thought in Orthodox circles, even if people are afraid to acknowledge the real character of their belief. I think I am not mistaken in supposing the Liberals in the Established Church to be in the same condition with regard to Unitarianism.

Professor Oort, the author of the "Bible for Learners," was lately 70 years of age. This means a serious loss for the Leiden University. He is a professor of Hebrew in the Faculty of Letters, and has now to retire at the end of the present academic year. He has held the chair for Hebrew since 1875, and hundreds of theological students have attended his lectures in the first year of their studies, when preparing themselves for the Hebrew examination by which they are to be admitted to the theological studies. Professor Oort studied the older Rabbinical literature with care, and his knowledge of later Judaism proved to be of great importance for Hebrew antiquities, on which he has also lectured. His book on the last centuries of Israel as a nation (De laatste eeuwen van Israëls volksbestaan, 1877) is a valuable contribution to our knowledge of that people's life. His chief interest has been in the theological side of his studies, but as a thorough Hebrew scholar he has written many articles on subjects of higher criticism. He understands how to speak on scientific topics in a very clear way, and is the right man for University extension. He is also greatly interested in public Liberal religious life and social work. We are glad to see him in good health. The law compels him to retire as a professor, but we hope that he may be able to strengthen our cause by his studies for many years.

The Protestantbond has done much good work during the past year. The annual meetings, held in Groningen, were very successful. They were exceedingly well attended. We had some good speeches, on the Theosophical movement and Elementary Education.

The Dutch public school is undenominational, and religious teaching is given one hour a week by the ministers of the various churches. Now many people are not contented with the results of the teaching in the public schools with regard to religious ideas. Many of the teachers seem to be on bad terms with religion, being socialists or atheists, and the religious teaching of the minister is not sufficient to break the influence of the master. They want, therefore, private Liberal religious schools. But it is not probable that they will be able to manage this, the number of the discontented not being strong enough to pay the expenses.

The number of the members of the Protestantbond is slightly increased.

B. D. EERDMANS.

Leiden, January 8, 1907.

ORTHODOXY IN SOUTH AFRICA.

It happened during my stay at the Cape that the various denominations held their annual congresses. Among these the Dutch Reformed Church (the D.R.C. as it is familiarly designated) held a Synod lasting twenty-four days. This is the most influential religious sect in South Africa, for its members comprise 51 per cent. of the European population, and its position resembles that of the Anglican fold at home. But we have nothing in England corresponding to this denominational Parliament, except in a distant way. Holding the congress only costs about £150 a day, but the length of the session makes it a matter of considerable expense, and one speaker pleaded excuse for the brevity of his speech on the ground that it burdened the treasury to the extent of ten shillings per minute.

They meet together to discuss and decide the affairs of their schools, their orphanages, their missions, their theological colleges, and other institutions or agencies affecting the welfare of the denomination. The Synod mainly consists of the mother church of the Cape Colony, with a delegate from the Transvaal and the Orange River Colony. Sub-committees reduce the intricate detail of the work, but final decision, of course, rests with the chief assembly. Among the business was the consideration of a petition from a congregation against having its name changed from Rhodes to Rossville, an instance how politics creep into ecclesiastic economy; while among the decreta was the fixing of the price of a baptismal certificate at four shillings.

It will thus be seen that the transactions are sometimes somewhat parochial and petty, and the general spirit of the conference strikes me as rather domestic and narrow, and not altogether abounding in the "large manner." Not that there were not very important matters on the tapis. There was, in sooth, a proposal to ask the Government to subsidise their denominational schools; and though the motion was lost, it served to testify to the growing expression of the demand with which our own powerful Established Church in England has made us too familiar. It would seem that sectarian power everywhere strives to keep itself alive by asking for more, and that here, too, appetite grows by what it feeds upon. The same love of power was manifested by the curt refusal with which a request on the part of the churches of Rhodesia to have partial self-government was met. There is no established church or state religion in South Africa; but if there were, and it proved to be the D.R.C., this country would be as bad a place for the heretic as Geneva was once to Servetus.

An interesting episode of the Synod was an attempt on the part of the Presbyterian Church to amalgamate with the D.R.C. The effort at union proved premature, and issued in a nasty rebuff to the wooer. During the war the Presbyterians made themselves rather conspicuous by their zeal in kindling animosity against the Dutch in their rampant jingoism and praying for their utter destruction—and memory is still too sore to be healed by the flattering and fulsome compliments paid upon the occasion of the plea for union.

In connection with the status of orthodoxy in South Africa, as represented by the D.R.C., two things strike the student of ecclesiastical history. First, its abnormally large congregations; secondly, its intellectual unprogressiveness. One would suppose that it is, after all, true that the popularity of a church is in direct proportion to its backwardness.

In the Orange River Colony there are 42 congregations with a membership of 40,000. And these figures are typical of other regions. The result is that pastoral work is rather difficult. Yet one could wish that the ministers were thus happily engaged in looking after their own people, for they seem to have ample leisure to proselytise among liberals, and if there is a Unitarian sick or on his death bed they crowd around the place like vultures around their prey. Part of the duties of a liberal minister in South Africa is to play moral police against these impudent pests of Calvinism.

If success were a guarantee of truth the D.R.C. could establish a claim to its possession. In the Transvaal during twenty years, the number of congregations has doubled, and the income increased six-fold. It is characteristic of the Transvaal temper that it is the latter circumstance which was construed at the Synod as a proof of special favour from above.

Prevalent theology is a branch of the study of antiquities. It is older than the old oaks in the avenue. For the D.R.C. assumes that Reform was fully, finally, and fixedly accomplished three and a half centuries ago, and that further reform is unnecessary. At one time, when its students for the ministry went to Holland for their theological training, they brought back the leaven of liberalism, and the guardians of orthodoxy took fright. Since 1859 it has had a theological seminary of its own, and students are allowed to proceed to Holland or Scotland only after proper inoculation. The result of thus cutting itself adrift from European progress and the modern spirit of inquiry, has been a mental stagnation for Boer theology. During the twenty-four days of the Synod's existence there was no token given that its deliberating members were aware, except as a vague fear, of what has taken place during the last two generations in the theological outlook of the orthodox churches of Holland, Germany, and England.

When a report was made that a D.R.C. minister had attended the Reformed Church of Holland as a representative during his visit to Europe, he repudiated so base an allegation, averring that the Reformed Church of Holland was no sister of the D.R.C. of South Africa. So clear would they be from the taint of liberalism: Upon the closing day there was also a little outburst against the attempts of the "so-called higher criticism supported by the alleged results of the new science, to injure our church." Any modification of the Augsburg confession is a personal affront.

Some of the members are, however, awake. There was a cry against leaving the appointment of the theological professors to the synodical committee. Recognition was made that competition with other churches was becoming keener. Appeal was heard for more teachers, presumably to fill the place of those dismissed for teaching facts of geology which contradicted the date 4,004 B.C. given in the Dutch Bible as the date of creation, inscribed by the Holy Ghost.

In turning to the proceedings of the other sects one understands the nature of the competition complained of. The Moderator of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church of South Africa, having extolled his church to the skies, attributed its wonderful progress to the fact that it had continuously stood for spiritual liberty and for intelligent progress, and had always appealed to the intelligence of this country, and that its ministers were the best educated in the world. (Shade of Robertson Smith—do they really believe it!)

The Congregationalists of South Africa, again, at their annual meetings, vied with any liberal community in their boast of freedom. They said: "We have no creed and no prayer book. We do not meet a candidate for church membership with a demand for a statement of belief. Nor do we place a catechism before him." They were proud to know that the creeds had lost their hold, and that in their own churches the love of liberty was ingrained in the very fibre of their life. It is, indeed, not incredible that the Congregational Churches have among their ranks some of the most intelligent and liberal members of the community, and that upon their progress largely rests the hope of the cause of liberal religious thought.

Meanwhile the single Unitarian Church in the whole of the sub-continent of South Africa is able to exercise an influence which in range and depth it is difficult to credit, and performs a kind of work which (in face of the tremendous antagonism it has aroused against itself, yea, perhaps largely because of this antagonism) makes it one of the most important outposts in the wide empire. No wonder that the heavy burden of responsibility and the nervous tension of the position has permanently disabled the first minister and temporarily disabled his successor. But the future liberal church of South Africa will have good reason to feel grateful to the Rev. D. P. Fauré, the founder of the church, and the Rev. R. Balmforth, his intrepid henchman, who by their speech and writings and arduous labours have accomplished so courageous and necessary a pioneer reform.

MR. R. J. CAMPBELL'S THEOLOGY.

SIR,—The desire to be at peace with our brethren and a wish for Christian reunion should not make us forgetful of an aim that is even more important than either of these things, viz., the progressive development of Christian thought. Now that there is a disposition among the churches to welcome change, there is a temptation to facile and meaningless compromises—compromises too often of a merely verbal nature. It is necessary to point out that we have a duty to perform to the liberalising "orthodox." We are so glad to see them "coming our way," that we forget that we ought to warn them from coming too much our way. They have stood for Life, and we have stood for Truth. And our long travail of thought and self-criticism has issued, with us, in a conviction that the great spiritual realities require a finer and profounder expression than any formulas which our own liberal tradition has transmitted to us; and we are now, hopefully it may be, feeling our way to something better. If, then, there is to be any genuine rapprochement, it must be at some point that is at present ahead of both parties, and to this we may hope to converge. We have to warn our semi-orthodox brethren not to cast away lightly the kernel of religious truth which their husk of old dogma has so well preserved. To take two examples.

(1) Mr. Campbell has an article in the current Hibbert on "Atonement." His view is sufficiently enlightened to alarm the older schools. But is it sufficiently true to satisfy us, who fear no conclusions, and ask only that a doctrine shall fully represent the religious facts in question? Is it for this smooth result, is it over such an indifferent matter, that we have fought for three hundred years? Mr. Campbell gets his result, his explanation of "atonement," by eliminating to a great degree the ethical element, the connection with sin, in that doctrine. Atonement is an offering to God, in the way of normal pleasant human existence. That is, the "sting" of the whole idea is taken out. All that Christianity has had to say on the tremendous subject of sin is just brushed aside. We are simply landed back in the pre-Christian thought of men, who (according to Mr. Campbell's view) had a religion into which, as religion, moral perceptions did not deeply and constructively penetrate. Liberal Christians will demand that, if Atonement is to be explained as "life in the whole," as contrasted with life for self, it must carry with it a deeper and not a feeble consciousness of moral distinctions than the older views. We can only be at one with God and man when we have conquered sin; whereas Mr. Campbell thinks that the question of sin need only enter into the subject after the meaning of Atonement has been fixed. There is no useful result to be gained by speaking of God, and oneness with God, as if these might possibly be unmoral or indifferent mystical sensations or experiences deprived of all the meaning which our struggle with sin gives to them. Indeed, the pith of the whole subject will be better reached from the human side and man's relations with man rather than from their relation to God. "God" is too easily introduced in these discussions, as an x from some No Man's Land, for the summary despatch of difficulties. We find God best when we best fulfil our human, especially our ethical ideals; and the law by which we do this is that law of vicarious suffering and achievement, that solidarity of good and evil among men which seems to be the real inwardness of "atonement."

(2) Another point on which there seems to be too much haste among us to compromise is Mr. Campbell's explanation of "Incarnation," which, as I have recently tried to show in these columns, is not very helpful. The uniqueness of Jesus is in no way illustrated or enforced by saying that he is an incarnation of God in the same way as we, only more so. It whittles down a great old idea, and introduces no new one. It puts Jesus into a relative scale just when and where we want to see him as absolute. It encourages one of our rationalist superstitions—that the religion of Jesus is relative and temporary, while Theism, of which it is a variant, is absolute and permanent; whereas, of course, one is no more absolute, in the history of religion than the other. Once more, what we want is to approach the matter from the human side, and see Jesus in the actual organic relations which he holds in the structure of our religious consciousness.

CHANNING HOUSE SCHOOL.

SIR,—It is now some years since you were good enough to publish for me an appeal to your readers on behalf of the Channing House School Presentation Fund, an appeal which met with most generous support at the time, and has enabled the Committee to grant the scholarships of fifteen guineas per year to a large number of those daughters of our ministers who would otherwise have been unable to obtain such an extension of their education. Unfortunately, death has lately removed several of our oldest subscribers, some of whom gave annually to the Fund the full fifteen guineas required for a scholarship.

At the same time, the benefits of the education given at Channing House have been so greatly appreciated that the number of applications has steadily increased, until this year the Committee find themselves faced with a possible deficit of between £60 and £70.

In view of the very poor return we are able to make to most of our ministers for a life spent in devotion to the cause of others, it is most earnestly to be desired that this means of assisting in the education of their daughters should not be allowed to suffer from lack of support.

The subscriptions, vary from 10s. 6d. to fifteen guineas, and any amount will be thankfully received and acknowledged by me as Treasurer to the Fund. Also I shall be particularly glad to receive the names of any who are willing to become annual subscribers.

MARTINEAU'S "ENDEAVOURS."

SIR,—In your extremely interesting article on the new and cheap editions of Dr. Martineau's "Endeavours after the Christian Life," you refer to the sixpenny edition in paper covers published by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, the edition published by Messrs. Longmans at eighteen pence, and the edition published by the Association at the same price, and you add "readers have now a choice of which they need make no complaint." This is quite true for those who have an opportunity of seeing the three and judging for themselves, but those who have no such opportunity may have a difficulty in deciding which to order, and if they merely ask their bookseller to get the new cheap edition, he will probably get the one most familiar to the trade. I have carefully examined both, and I have no hesitation in recommending intending purchasers to see that they get the edition published by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, which is the better print, on better paper, in far better binding, and contains an excellent reproduction of the very interesting portrait of 1847.

FRANCIS H. JONES.

MANCHESTER DOMESTIC MISSION.

SIR,—I trust you will allow me to offer a remark upon your correspondent's "Report on Christmas at the Manchester Domestic Missions," which appeared in your paper of the 12th inst.

I am afraid that the gentleman was not familiar enough with the actual position of what he calls "the Missions" here. The Society of the Domestic Mission (which will shortly issue its 73rd report) was founded and long conducted upon the simple pattern of Dr. Tuckerman's "Ministry to the Poor." It has of late years largely developed its operations on what are called "Institutional" plans, and certainly not least effectively under the guidance of the Rev. J. W. Bishop and the Rev. A. W. Timmis, in connection with their fine chapels in Willert-street and Renshaw-street. About ten years ago it pleased the Mission Committee, under some singular misapprehension and consequent prejudice, hastily, and, as some of us thought, singularly unjustly, to eject the Rev. Benjamin Walker from his charge in Willert-street, an office in which he had served with most Christian love and devotion for many years.

Upon that ejection certain warm friends of the Rev. Mr. Walker immediately joined to support him in his devoted consecration to the simpler efficiency of the "Ministry to the Poor," amongst whom he had so long lived and taught like his Master.

From that date, it is too sad to relate, the old "Domestic Mission," or its successive committees, drew up its skirts, passed by on the other side, and declined all association with Mr. Walker and his plans, and all contribution towards his support and expenditure. These have been faithfully supplied by some friends who have felt it an honour to furnish all such resources to their deeply respected friend, and to maintain his poor little meeting-room, where he has continuously met a small society of his "Poorest of the Poor," old and young. I myself have never joined in any meeting in which I have been so moved for Christian love and worship as in that poor little place in Goulden-street.

I think you will not wonder if, under the circumstances, which are absolutely within my own knowledge, your correspondent's too imperfect, if not contemptuous reference to my honoured friend's labours and their scene has seemed to call from me this remonstrance. R. D. DARBISHIRE.

Manchester, January 15, 1907.

[We are certain that there was no shadow of contempt in the reference of our Manchester correspondent last week to the work at Goulden-street.—ED. INQ.]

THE INDIAN DEMAND FOR SELF-GOVERNMENT.

SIR,—In my letter to you of last week there is a sentence which stands in print as follows:—"There is a real difficulty in reconciling the need of Islam—not only with popular government but with good government of any kind." The apparently unmeaning dash is the tell-tale relic of a lost parenthesis:—"as commonly understood and practised." Whether the omission was my fault or the printer's I cannot say; most likely it was mine. But the qualification meant to be expressed is important. The art of bringing an old religion up to date by a free handling of the historic sources is by no means confined to our own Broad Churchmen, and it seems quite likely that we may hear a good deal in the near future, under some name or other, of a Broad Church of Islam standing for quite modern and even democratic ideas. Personally, I have little faith in such attempts, but I did not mean to ignore them. R. K. WILSON.

SUFFOLK VILLAGE MISSION EXTENSION.

SIR,—Just twelve years ago the Central Postal Mission, with the generous help of many friends from various parts of England, erected a little iron building in the remote village of Bedfield (Suffolk), to serve as a Sunday-school, a place of Unitarian worship, and as a pleasant place of meeting for the villagers during the week. There was literally no other resort except the public-house: there were three of these within easy reach, working their usual baleful influence on the youths and men of the neighbourhood. A Men's Social Club and Reading Room was at once started, and the building has ever since been in constant use on Sundays, and also on week-nights for such purposes as lantern lectures, flower shows, musical band practices, &c. In fact, it has quite justified its existence. The little group of worshippers, chiefly agricultural labourers and their families, have kept firmly together through many difficulties, and the agencies gathering round the chapel have decidedly raised the moral and religious tone of the village. The total cost of erection, including purchase of land, was a little under £175, and the building (held in trust by members of the Central Postal Mission) was opened free of debt in 1895.

There is now a strong desire on the part of the villagers for an additional room, for the expansion of the Men's Club and to facilitate the serving of refreshments on the premises, the holding of the Women's Sewing Meeting, Sunday-school teachers' gatherings, &c. The Central Postal Mission have decided on the erection of this additional room as they are convinced it will be of real service, and will tend to the uplifting of the people and the strengthening of the Unitarian cause, which has much to suffer through the petty persecution of the Established Church and of orthodox dissent.

A sum of from £20 to £30 will be needed, and if any of our kind friends and supporters are willing to help in this good object, they are asked to send direct to the hon. treasurer of the Central Postal Mission, Miss Ethel C. Lake, Alaska, Sutton, Surrey, or to me, 9, Heath-street, Hampstead, N.W.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

THE OUTLOOK IN SCOTLAND.

THE sectarian division which has absorbed attention in Scotland for two years is now finally settled, and the severed bodies know where they stand, materially and spiritually.

Each of the two bodies has a traditional title which is actually a misnomer. The new sect with the old name, "The Free Church of Scotland," is not free intellectually. It perpetuates the bonds voluntarily put on by its ancestors at the Disruption in 1843. It has taken upon itself afresh "The Confession of Faith" and all the Standards. It stands for Calvinism, unaltered in any particular. It is mainly Highland, and will cease with the passing of the Celtic tongue. The other sect, wearing the newer name, "The United Free Church of Scotland," has lost the sense of unity, and has not got the sense of freedom. It suffers from the rending, and is hampered by its Standards. How to make the Standards represent its living faith is the problem before it.

The death of Principal Rainy is at once a deprivation and a deliverance to it. He was the man for its diplomatic management, and marked the stage of political placement. His influence was the main power in shaping it as an organisation and in permeating it with intention.

But the edge of another stage has for some time shown itself, that of spiritual adjustment. Other things than the Church saw at its formation have appeared with portentous mien: Natural science, with its declaration of evolution; the Higher Criticism, with its obligation of reform of faith; the development of the Moral Spirit, with its insistence on consideration of economics and ethics, have come as apparitions to the religious consciousness requiring hospitality. The Church has at length recognised them as angels of God, and is considering how to make cakes upon the hearth for them.

Rainy himself saw the new situation, but circumstances prevented the full facing of it. The internal rupture came and took attention away from it. Now that the separation is settled and Rainy has departed, the ground is clear for the other work, and the other man. The work is obvious; the man is not. Amongst the last utterances of the great ecclesiastic was this: "I believe that a new spirit will arise when the older men have passed away. The Church has lost some of her theological fetters. To-day, as a consequence of the judgment, she is much more free than she has ever been before. She has shaken off some of the trammels that clogged her intellectual progress and the liberation has manifested a freedom, which must prove of great value in the future."² The passing of the older men is a matter of a brief time, and if with them will pass the diplomatic temper and method, the change in the Church will be great. Liberals, like Dr. Marcus Dods, who have almost entirely emerged from the fetters of the Standards, have been subdued by the diplomatic spirit and have halted and trimmed. Whether the younger men will have the courage of their new learning (which Rainy almost with his last breath, invited them to have) and will make for an unconditional openmindedness and a real freedom remains to be seen. Though now is their opportunity, no leader that way is visible. At present, the Church is practically without a head. For some time to come, it would appear as if it would suffer for lack of men for the needed advance.

The Established Church is perplexed about the restatement of its faith, which has become inevitable. Probably it will be rent in the act. The Episcopal Church is endeavouring to make itself popular, but finds itself obliged to relinquish its day schools. It and the other Churches have now practically lost control of Teachers' Training Colleges, and thus almost the last relic of sectarian management of education ceases to exist in Scotland. The Congregational Churches have suffered much by the constant drain made on them by English churches. This, and the comparatively small number of students at the Theological Hall, is giving cause for anxiety. The recent progress has not been great, but the churches are regarding "with obvious sympathy the new ideas and the new methods which invariably characterise a new time."

Our own cause is in dire want of men. Two of our congregations, Kirkcaldy and Kilmarnock, seem likely to go down through lack of ministers. The situation for both is very grave. The need of strong preachers never was so great. The shaking of Presbyterianism has produced thought on matters pertaining to religion, and the thinking has brought the conviction that not in Calvinism does the philosophy lie which is acceptable to the Scottish mind. There is an outlook, a wistfulness and a readiness for religious advance, such as has not been manifested in these regions before. These constitute an opportunity for the faith of Reason and Love, to avail ourselves of which should be our joy; but, alas! we have no apostles available for the emergency. The lack probably proceeds from our want of central capacity and enthusiasm.

I write what is in my own mind, and feel called upon to say that our fundamental want is an Association capable of rallying and inspiring our congregations for the openings around them. The Scottish Unitarian Association, by its recent constitution, cut itself off from congregations, and (as I think) dissolved itself. It has lost a precious year already, and still does not seem able to make any effective endeavour. An appeal on behalf of our unmanned congregations should have been made long ere this. It may now be too late to save them. I cannot view without shameful regret the resolution to unhouse the Kilmarnock congregation. I am well aware of the difficulties of the case; I faced them at the beginning of our connection with the congregation, and did what I could to clear off the pressing debt. If the present church must be sold, immediate steps should be taken to secure a house and a minister for the congregation. Surely there is some power of compassion among Scottish Unitarians to rehabilitate a loyal congregation.*

I believe that, even yet, an earnest appeal made to our members in Scotland would produce the needed help. Without such an appeal it cannot be said that all has been done that might or should. It will be a perpetual disgrace to let the only instance of free theological development in Scotland be sacrificed ruthlessly.

The Kirkcaldy congregation has suffered pitifully for want of a minister, and something of a regenerative nature will have to be done on its behalf. The town is an important one; it is the heart of Fife, and has many liberal traditions. To supply the needed means of life, the Scottish Unitarian Association should set itself enthusiastically. Upon it rests the natural responsibility of maintaining the existing congregations. This I urge, knowing full well the various difficulties of administration. The McQuaker Trustees have control of the money available for Scotland, but I am confident that they are willing to respond to local fervour, and to work through the readiest channels.

I am aware of the poverty and comparative smallness of our several congregations. I know that each has its own burden, and is continually worried over it. But I know also that there is a desire for closer fraternity and more intelligent sympathy among the congregations; and I feel sure that, if that desire were worked up, help would be forthcoming for pressing needs. At present there is no circulation of information among the congregations; they do not know each other's circumstances, and the feeling of isolation is thereby intensified. Some means of mutual knowledge and help is required. The sense of solidarity needs to be established.

The St. Vincent-street congregation, Glasgow, has experienced a touch of re-animation in the celebration of its Jubilee. A successful bazaar has brought a considerable sum into its treasury.

Ross-street Church, Glasgow, continues a courageous life, and no doubt, as a daughter, shares in the stirring of the mother.

St. Mark's congregation, Edinburgh, is surrounded with active orthodox bodies, and finds it difficult to attract attention.

The Dundee congregation manifests a hopeful vigour, and is to be congratulated on having its buildings repaired and redecorated.

* On the very day on which Mr. Webster was writing this letter we heard that the Kilmarnock congregation had practically ceased to exist.—ED. INQ.

The past year has been the most eventful in our history at Aberdeen, by reason of the opening of our new church. The possession of a building so well adapted for work and worship has given us fresh enthusiasm. We have not yet fully used all its resources, but are gradually feeling our way to complete use. The attendance at the Sunday services up till Nov. 11, averaged: forenoon, 204.6; evening, 284.3. At the service conducted by the Rev. John Hunter (Wednesday, October 3) there were 420 present. During the unusually severe wintry weather the average of attendance has gone down, but still it is relatively high. Our membership roll shows an accession of fifty members. The Sunday-school has an increase of twenty-seven. Our newly formed Guild of Endeavour is lively in several efforts of study and culture. The Ladies' Working Party promotes a monthly "at Home" which is popular. On December 22 and 23, we held our annual sale of work. The new hall lent itself kindly to stall-spaces, and the result was a net gain of £44. This, coming in a dull time, and after heavy drains for the building fund, we reckon very satisfactory.

We have realised in our new church a wide fraternal sympathy. Dr. Glasse, in his preaching, brought us into touch with the ministry of the Established Church; Dr. Hunter and the Rev. W. Wood came with the sympathy of Congregationalism; and the Rev. R. C. Fillingham made us realise affinities with the Church of England.

The McQuaker Lectures proved the suitability of our new hall for public meetings, and the five lectures with which I followed these showed that we have got the ear of a thoughtful class willing to hear what can be said for Spiritual Theism.

With fervour, wisdom, and patience we hope to be worthy of our high calling and sharers in a Scottish rising into lofty religious life.

NOTE.—I preached at Kirkcaldy twice on Sunday, January 13th, spoke in the Sunday-school, and attended the annual meeting of the congregation. I was impressed by the loyalty of those present, and with the zeal of the officials and workers. They are determined to keep church and school open. Their unfortunate experience with the Rev. C. Sneddon has made them almost despair of having a suitable minister. The town deserves one, and it is to be hoped that ere long a capable man will be found for the important post. ALEX. WEBSTER.

Aberdeen, Jan. 9, 1907.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Cardiff.—At a special meeting of the West Grove congregation on Friday, January 4, the resignation of the Rev. W. Whitaker having been received, the following resolution was passed: "That this meeting of the congregation of the West Grove Unitarian (Free Christian) Church receives with great regret the Rev. W. Whitaker's resignation of his ministry there, and desires to place upon record its deep sense of the devotion with which Mr. Whitaker has served the congregation during the past three years. The congregation further desires to convey to Mr. and Mrs. Whitaker their most sincere wishes that every success and happiness may attend them in the new sphere of work to which they have been called." Mr. Whitaker terminates his ministry at West Grove on Sunday, January 27.

Coalville.—Services to celebrate the second anniversary of the Coalville Unitarian Society were held on Sunday last in the new Adult School Hall, the preacher for the day being the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, of London. A good band led the singing. The evening congregation numbered 120. Literature was distributed, and it was a cheerful and encouraging day.

Framlingham.—The Rev. Richard Newell, who completes four years' ministry this month, called the members together on the 7th inst. to a tea and social meeting. A programme of music was rendered by various members, and the minister and the Rev. Wm. Birks, of Diss, addressed the meeting. The subject of church membership was referred to, and it was proposed to enrol all present, with others who desired to be identified as members, subscribing an annual amount, and accepting a simple declaration to worship together and support the cause in connection with the Old Meeting House.

Ilminster.—On Thursday, January 10, the annual New Year's tea was held in the school-room adjoining the "Old Meeting," after which a welcome meeting to the Rev. R. Finnerty (who began his ministry here on January 6) was held in the chapel. The chair was taken by Colonel M. L. Blake, who was supported by Revs. Rudolf Davis, H. S. Solly, Messrs. M. B. Baker, Robert Blake, and others. Letters of regret for absence were read from Revs. C. C. Coe A. N. Blatchford, A. Sutcliffe, and F. Homer. The speeches were interspersed with music from the choir and Taunton friends. The meeting was well attended, and a very pleasant evening was spent.

Leeds: Holbeck.—The work of the recent successful bazaar having been brought to an end, the regular activities in connection with the congregation and school are being resumed, and meetings of the Sewing Society, the congregational "At Homes," the Guild, the Literary Society, and the Y.P. Socials will be held as hitherto.

London: Hackney.—Last week was one of exceptional interest, and of very arduous work on the part of the minister and his wife. On Monday and Tuesday dramatic entertainments were given for the parents of the Sunday-school scholars. The rendering of two of Miss Lucy Whitehead's plays by actors drawn from the junior members' guild was a special interest. The Christmas treat for the scholars followed on Thursday and Friday, the occasion being the triennial Christmas tree—this year being two trees, with a pyramid between them, on which were arranged the toys and useful articles to be given to the children. The only drawback to the proceedings was the unavoidable absence of Miss Green, the school secretary. A memorial tablet of white marble and simple and artistic design has been placed in the New Gravel Pit Church by the family of the late Mr. and Mrs. C. E. Green, bearing the inscription, "To the memory of Charles Empson Green, born December 15, 1832; died June 11, 1899; and his wife, Elizabeth Mary Green, born April 28, 1839; died December 22, 1905; who were both members of and earnest workers in this church." At the close of the morning service last Sunday the Rev. H. Rawlings made feeling reference to the memorial. An important event of the near future in connection with the Hackney church is the bazaar to be held at the King's Hall, Holborn, next June, in aid of the guarantee fund, and it is hoped many friends will give a helping hand.

London: Mansford-street.—On Saturday, Jan. 12, the members of the Mansford-street Guild entertained a party of cripples from the neighbouring County Council school. The hosts and guests were soon on the best of terms with one another, and spent a merry evening together. After tea, the visitors were filled with wonder and delight at the performance of the Sunday-school children's play, "Red Riding Hood," and with some irresistibly droll action songs given by other scholars. They then treated us to some songs and recitations and a sketch from "Pickwick," the evening ended happily and with mutual good will.

Manchester District Association.—At a meeting of the governing body, held on December 4 last, a resolution of congratulation to the Rev. S. Alfred Steinthal, on the attainment of his eightieth birthday was passed, and directed to be suitably engrossed for presentation. The President had previously sent greetings to Mr. Steinthal by telegram on his birthday, on behalf of the Association. As congratulations from various societies had already been conveyed to Mr. Steinthal at a public meeting held in the Memorial Hall, under the auspices of the Provincial Assembly, it was arranged in consultation with him, and with his approval, that the presentation of the Association's resolution should be made at his home, in order that the strain of a further public ceremony might be avoided. Accordingly, a deputation waited upon Mr. Steinthal on Friday last, consisting of Mr. T. Fletcher Robinson (president), Revs. P. M. Higginson and Dendy Agate (vice-presidents), Mr. G. W. Rayner Wood (treasurer), and the Rev. N. Anderton and Mr. O. H. Heys (hon. secretaries), when the resolution given below was presented by the president and acknowledged with kindly appreciation by Mr. Steinthal:—"The members of the governing body of the Manchester District Association of Presbyterian and Unitarian Churches offer to the Rev. S. Alfred Steinthal their hearty and respectful congratulations on his recent completion of his eightieth year. They recognise the advantage which the Association and its predecessor, the Manchester District Unitarian Association, have derived from Mr. Steinthal's chairmanship of the old Association in 1887, 1888, and his presidency of the existing Association in 1892, from his presence and counsel for many years, and from his service on various sub-committees. They remember, also, with gratitude his chairmanship of the Association Fund and Bazaar Committee in 1896 and 1897. They know how dear to Mr. Steinthal have been the principles which animate the Association and the churches which constitute it; and they pray that in the long evening of his life, while fully enjoying well-earned rest and quiet hours at home, he may continue to aid the members of the governing body and other fellow workers by the counsel and sympathy on which they have been able to rely so confidently in bygone years."

Manchester: Pendleton.—A crowded audience attended the schoolroom on Monday evening, the 14th, to hear a lecture given by Alderman F. S. Phillips, J.P., on "Life in Salford Between 300 and 400 Years Ago." The Mayor of Salford occupied the chair, and was supported by a large number of members of the Salford Council. The lecture was arranged from materials acquired by the Museum Committee, and was of great interest. The lecturer gave a very interesting account of the history of Salford, of its surprising development from the rural peace of 400 years ago, and through its industrial beginning of later centuries to the borough as it exists to-day. The lecture was illustrated by lantern views made from photographs, drawings, &c., in the possession of the Museum Committee, also by the exhibition of the various articles and weapons used in the old days. The proceeds of the lecture will be devoted to the purchase of a lantern and outfit for use at Cross-lane. A vote of thanks to the lecturer and to the Mayor for presiding was moved by the Rev. N. Anderton and seconded by Mr. T. Fletcher Robinson, and was enthusiastically carried.

North End Mission, Bond-street, Liverpool.—The Senior Scholars' party on January 9 finished our Christmas festivities: 38 young men and 18 young women, total 56, present. The previous Sunday had marked a record attendance of elder scholars, particularly in Mr. Reynolds' own class; he had 32 young men and six young women, total 38. Of these six young men, between 16 and 18 years of age, now form another class. The Juniors' party on January 2 had 36 present, whose joy was increased by a Christmas tree, kindly given by Rev. T. Lloyd Jones, and furnished with toys by friends. There had been 52 present at a Watch Night service.

Pontypridd.—On Sunday, January 13, seven new members were welcomed into the fellowship of this church by the minister, Rev. Simon Jones. The service was a dedicatory one, the address being based on G. F. Watts' motto, "My Utmost for the Highest," which has been adopted as the motto of membership in our church.

Suffolk Village Mission: Bedfield.—At a social meeting, on January 2, the fourth anniversary of the settlement of the Rev. R. Newell, occasion was taken to complete the church roll of members. On the following Wednesday the children's Christmas tree and meeting was held. Miss E. M. Smith distributed gifts from the tree, and Mrs. Newell presented the prizes. Although the register contains fewer names than last year, owing to material influences operating from the Church of England, during the past six months especially, yet the record shows a better average attendance, and more prizes are gained this year than previously.

Swinton.—At the annual scholars' party on New Year's Day, when about 300 scholars, teachers, and friends were present, the prizes were given by Mrs. W. E. George, and among them a gold medal to Mr. Frank Pollitt for his 26th prize in succession at the same school. It will be remembered that two years ago his brother, Mr. George Pollitt, was likewise presented with a gold medal on his leaving the district, that being the occasion of his 24th prize in succession. Many others in the same school have attained good records in this respect, one scholar having obtained his 22nd prize this year, other scholars having obtained their 12th and 14th prizes respectively.

In his own life a man is not to expect happiness, only to profit by it gladly when it shall arise; he is on duty here.—R. L. Stevenson.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

WE hear with the greatest interest and satisfaction that the Rev. R. J. Campbell, M.A., of the City Temple, has accepted the invitation of the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association to deliver this year's Essex Hall Lecture, on May 21, the Tuesday of Whit-week. The Committee, in giving this invitation had, we need hardly say, no desire to identify Mr. Campbell in any way with the Unitarian denomination. The Essex Hall Lecture was founded to offer a free platform to eminent men, who might thus have an opportunity of presenting their thoughts on some of the great problems of religion and theology. Mr. Augustine Birrell, Professor Henry Jones of Glasgow, Professor H. H. Wendt of Jena, Mrs. Humphry Ward, and Mr. Stopford Brooke, have been among the lecturers in past years.

A REPORT of the annual meeting of the trustees of the Manchester College, Oxford, will be found in our present issue. At the services in the College Chapel during the present term, opened last Sunday by Dr. Carpenter, the Principal, to-morrow and for the three following Sundays the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke is to be the preacher, to be followed on February 24 for three Sundays by Dr. Hunter, the Rev. L. P. Jacks concluding on March 17 the Sundays of Term. From February 17 to March 10 inclusive Dr. Hunter is also to give a series of Sunday evening addresses on the moral and religious teaching of some great poems, beginning with Goethe's "Faust," and concluding with Browning's "Saul."

OF the lectures in Manchester College this term, three courses are announced as open to the public: Six lectures by Professor Henry Jones on "The Religion of Idealism," beginning on Monday next at 5 p.m.; six lectures by Dr. Carpenter on "Buddhist and Christian Parallels: Are they Related?" beginning on Wednesday, January 30, at 5 p.m.; and six lectures by Dr. Hunter on "The Liberal Religious Movement in Scotland in the Nineteenth Century: Some of its Pioneers and Leaders and their Influence on English Theological Thought," beginning on Tuesday, February 19, at 5 p.m.

THE news from Jamaica last week was so conflicting that we cherished the hope that the magnitude of the disaster which had befallen Kingston would prove to have been greatly exaggerated; but now, unhappily, it is no longer possible to doubt that the loss of life from the destructive earthquake and consequent fire has been very great. To the appeals for help for the sufferers there has been generous response, and there appears to be no longer any fear of famine. The assistance of America, so promptly rendered when the need was greatest, met, most unfortunately, with a rude rebuff from the Governor, which was keenly felt in this country, and can only be accounted for, if the circumstances and the terms of the Governor's letter are correctly reported, by over-wrought nerves at a time of painful crisis. Happily the incident has been estimated at its true worth by our generous kinsfolk across the Atlantic. As to the disaster as a whole, the one gleam of satisfaction is that after the sufferings of the moment a better Kingston may now arise upon the ruins of the old city.

MRS. MOTTRAM reports this week the decision of the Martineau Memorial Committee at Norwich to adhere to the published plans, in spite of the fact that the Octagon congregation will thus be faced for the moment with a debt of close upon £1,000. It has seemed, however, fair to the earnestness of those who have already given, as well as to the strong desire of the congregation for a worthy memorial, that this grave and courageous step should be taken. We must hope that before the building is completed further gifts will have covered the whole cost.

A LETTER of cordial greeting to all friends of liberal religion reaches us from Mr. Matthias Jochumsson, dated Akureyri, Dec. 20. From this we are very glad to learn that the fire of last October did not prove so disastrous as that of five years ago, and that our friends in Iceland can meet the need without foreign aid. Mr. Jochumsson, though advanced in years, is still vigorous in spirit, as a poet should be, and "always young for liberty." It would be a great happiness to him, he writes, if it should prove possible for him this year to come over with his son, who is a doctor in Reykjavik, to be present at our Whitsuntide meetings.

THREE Congregational ministers, who are closely associated with the "New Theology" movement, have issued the following letter to define their own position :—

Sir,—So many misunderstandings exist with regard to the "New Theology" that we, the undersigned, desire to approximately define our own position. We wish it to be clearly known that this is not a statement authorised by the league, but an expression of our own personal opinion:

The "New Theology" is a question of attitude rather than of detail. We have no wish to hurt the religious feelings of any earnest man, but desire to commend this theology as a reasonable attempt to restate, in the light of modern thought, the saving truths which Jesus Christ brought to men.

The term "New Theology" may be unfortunate, but it has been thrust upon us, and we therefore accept it.

The ultimate reality and the one hope for man is the holy love of God, Who, though transcendent, is immanent in nature and humanity, but supremely in Jesus Christ.

God is the Father of all men, and all men are implicitly His children, made in His image and at unrest till they live for Him alone. The germ of divine life is in every soul. The story of the Fall is, in Dr. Dale's words, "an inspired myth," conveying a vital religious truth: By man's sin he has strayed from God, but even the prodigal is still God's child: His very remorse is "the sign of the inextinguishable divinity within his soul."

The Bible is the record of God's progressive revelation, but it has a human element, and all its parts have not equal spiritual significance.

Jesus Christ was God incarnate in the flesh: The question of the Virgin Birth does not touch the fundamental position of Evangelical Theology—our theory of the process cannot affect the fact of the Incarnation: Seeing Christ we see the Father: The whole life of Christ was a divine self-sacrifice to awaken and develop the latent divinity of man:

The Atonement is an eternal process, and is set forth in all its fulness in the life and death of Our Lord: "All who love and suffer so as to lift men to God are helping to fill up that which is lacking in the sufferings of Christ."—Yours, &c.,

A. W. ANDERSON.

ARTHUR PRINGLE.

GILBERT T. SADLER.

As to his own belief concerning Jesus, this is what Mr. Campbell said, as reported in the Daily Mail interview of January 12:

"The New Theology holds that human nature should be interpreted in terms of its own highest, and therefore it reverences Jesus Christ: It looks upon Jesus as the perfect example of what humanity ought to be, the life which perfectly expresses God in our limited human experience: : : Every man is a potential Christ, or rather, a manifestation of the eternal Christ, that side of the nature of God from which all humanity has come forth: Humanity is fundamentally one, and all true living is the effort to realise that oneness: This is the truth that underlies all noble effort for the common good in the world to-day. : : We believe that Jesus is and was divine, but so are we. His mission was to make us realise our divinity, and our oneness with God. And we are called to live the life which He lived."

THE Christian World last week recalled an earlier statement made by Mr. Campbell in connection with an address he gave last September to the London Congregational ministers:—

The Person of Jesus. What popular theology says of Jesus is true of the ideal humanity which is ever in the heart of the Father: Jesus was and is divine, but so are we; His mission was to make us realise our divinity; that is our oneness with God: The life to which we are called is the life He lived: His uniqueness consists in the fact that in Him that life was manifested for the world to see: Faith in Him is faith in God, faith in love, faith in the ideal within ourselves, and faith in the great atonement of the race with God:

To these statements it is interesting to add the following passages from the Daily Chronicle's report of Mr. Campbell's sermon in the City Temple last Sunday evening: The sermon was on the secret of the rest which Jesus promised to his disciples:—

The soul of Jesus was at rest, and He knew how to impart his secret to others. It was not difficult to find out what was the secret of Jesus: There was nothing magical about it:

"It was," said Mr. Campbell, "a simple quiet trust in the goodwill of our Heavenly Father; it was faith in the fundamental oneness of God and man; it was, and is, a calm realisation of the unity which we call God as manifested through every one of us, and that nothing matters except to be in harmony with that: It was a sense of tranquillity and quietude derived from the sense that God was within us and that nothing can or ever does separate us from Him:

"Get that experience and you become master of your fate: Come weal, come woe, no evil can permanently affect the man who is at one with God: This is the real thing. I know it myself. I believe I know for a certainty what Jesus meant. He meant that the life He was living was the life He wanted every simple, earnest soul to live. You do not need to be a good man in order to begin it: Goodness is such a slippery term: It is often made to stand for something insipid and invertebrate, with no bones or blood: The one supreme qualification to enter upon the life that Jesus lived was not goodness, but just a humble sincerity joined with a desire for God."

"This truth," added Mr. Campbell, "is long enough, deep enough, strong enough to reach anybody, and it may be preached by Unitarian, Trinitarian, Catholic, or Protestant."

"Is not the 'New Theology' as old as Christendom?" is a question the Rev. J. Collins Odgers is about to answer in a course of five Sunday evening lectures at Ullet-road Church, Liverpool. The lecture to-morrow evening is on the Simple Humanity of Jesus, "a Soul inspired by God." The second lecture is thus announced:—

II. Mr. Campbell believes in the Immanence of God—in the Universe and in the Souls of his offspring. So did Paul:—

1 Cor. iii. 16: "Know ye not that ye are the temple of God, and that the spirit of God dwelleth in you?"

Acts xvii. 28: "In Him we live and move and have our being."

And Mr. Odgers concludes in the announcement of his lectures that Mr. Campbell's views are "not new, but a rediscovery of truths and principles long held and taught by various Christian Churches."

THE newspaper controversy on "The New Theology" and its relation to modern Unitarianism has greatly increased the work of the Secretary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association and his office and book-room at Essex Hall. During the first four days of this week nearly two hundred applications were received from all sorts and conditions of men and women desirous of obtaining information about the religious teachings of Unitarians. The inquiries have come from people living in all parts of the country, as well as in London. It is gratifying to know that there is such widespread interest in the deeper problems of religious thought and life.

THE question of doctrinal trust deeds, brought very prominently to notice by the Rev. R. J. Campbell's position at the City Temple, suggests the parallel difficulty of the Prayer Book of the Church of England. In the Spectator of January 12 a courageous Worcestershire clergyman wrote a letter strongly urging the need of Prayer-book revision: From an experience of twenty years he declares that want of adaptation of the formularies to present intellectual conditions is largely responsible for the admitted failure of the Church to hold the people as it ought, and particularly for the unwillingness of the best type of young men to take orders

"We have overwhelming evidence that the most highly educated young men show an increasing indisposition to take Holy Orders, and the inevitable consequence is a want of intellectual thoroughness and of straight thinking on the part of the clergy. Anyone who will take pains to inform himself on the subject will easily discover that the growth of extreme ritualism and sacerdotalism is due to no lack of educated Protestants, but to the fact that the most strenuous and intellectually forceful Protestants consider themselves debarred by their 'broad views' from taking Holy Orders. If this state of things is to continue, the ministry of the Church of England will be more and more abandoned to sacerdotalism and the extravagances of ritual, and will more and more completely lose touch with the national life."

THE Editor of the Spectator, while strongly sympathising with this view, fears that any attempt at revision at the present time would lead to a narrowing rather than a widening of the Church, and adds: "We must not forget that men so high-minded and so scrupulous as Jowett, Stanley, Maurice, Kingsley, and Colenso felt able to remain in the Church in spite of the technical and pedantic objections raised to their Churchmanship." Has the Editor of the Spectator forgotten what Jowett wrote to Stanley after signing the Articles again, when accused of heresy on his appointment to the Greek professorship at Oxford, that he had chosen the meaner part, and signed? We cannot feel that the objection to the Broad Church position is simply "technical and pedantic." It is a serious moral problem, and has been painfully felt as such by many earnest Churchmen:

ANOTHER correspondent writes in last week's Spectator on this subject:—"You set a strong array of authorities against the judgment of the late Professor Sidgwick (Spectator, January 12). Yet many, while deeply sympathising with men like Maurice, who felt themselves justified, nay, bound, to retain their communion with a Church based on broad principles and consecrated to noble ends, yet feel that the present crisis has assumed a different character, and that to leave things as they are constitutes a real and immediate danger: It is impossible perhaps even to guess at the number of men who are deterred from taking Holy Orders by the latest results of the higher criticism, but ultimately it seems clear that the main body of ordinands will in effect have made up their minds to accept the authority of the Church as sufficient and to put all rebellious questionings aside. (Even in the Roman Communion this is becoming increasingly difficult). What influence will such a body of men have on the more thoughtful and instructed laity? If the laymen of the Church of England care at all for the maintenance of the English Church, as handed down to us by the Reformers, they will help the clergy to be rid of the chains which, being old, may not gall so much as new ones. But what need is there of any chains at all? The yoke of Christ should be sufficient, and He is the sole teacher. His yoke is not the yoke of the bondman, but that which helps the ploughman to make a straight furrow."

THIS is the Jubilee year of the Atlantic Monthly, which in November will duly celebrate that event. Oliver Wendell Holmes, Lowell, and Whittier were closely identified with the Atlantic in its vigorous youth, and it played a great part in the intellectual and moral advancement of that period. While now there are many more such forces in the field than 50 years ago, the Atlantic is still vigorous and true to its old ideal. The December number had another delightful article by Dr. Crothers, on "Christmas and the Literature of Disillusion." "What makes the book so cross?" asked the youngest listener, who had for a few minutes, for lack of anything better to do, been paying some slight attention to the reading that was intended for her elders." So the article begins. Get it and read the rest. Houghton, Mifflin & Co. still publish the Atlantic in Boston and New York, and now in London Archibald Constable & Co. The price is 1s. net and 4d. for postage.

In the January Review of Reviews Mr. Stead has a character sketch of the Right Hon. James Bryce, who is going to America as British Ambassador at Washington. In the same number there is a portrait of the late Mrs. Josephine Butler, of whom Mr. Stead writes:—"Only those who, like myself, had the honour and privilege of serving her humbly in the long and arduous fight which we waged against the powers of darkness in high places can appreciate the agony of soul, the long martyrdom of passionate pity, through which she, our leader, passed unshrinking and undismayed. . . . The sacred contagion of her example spread far beyond these islands, and there are few countries in the world where she is not mourned to-day."

LOVERS of Mrs. Gaskell, who are rejoicing in the complete "Knutsford" edition of her works, should by no means miss the delightful "Blackstick" paper by Mrs. Richmond Ritchie in the December Cornhill. Mrs. Ritchie recalls a memory of a visit Mrs. Gaskell paid to her father very shortly before his death. "I can just remember her talking to him in the big dining-room at Palace Green, looking up laughing, inquiring, responding, gay, yet definite, such is the impression I have of her presence." It was in 1863 that Thackeray "laid the weary pen aside"; two years later, Mrs. Gaskell was suddenly called away, when she had all but finished "the last most mature and lovable of all her books." But she, says Mrs. Ritchie, "did not seem weary; she was at work and at play almost to the last, and living her full life, with all its cares and joys, its achievements, and anxieties, and labours for others." "To people of an elder generation re-reading 'Wives and Daughters' now, strong, gentle, and full of fun and wisdom, all youth seems to be in it, it is rest to live again in the merry touching pages."

MRS. RITCHIE tells of a conversation she had not long ago with a friend concerning Mrs. Gaskell. "Few people have ever more deserved to be remembered," said the friend, and went on to speak of her Manchester life, where as wife of a Unitarian minister she had lived among the troubles of his people and shared them with him; and she told especially of what they and their girls had done in the cotton famine of 1862. Further on, in the same paper, Mrs. Ritchie writes:—"Mrs. Gaskell put herself into her stories; her emotions, her amusements all poured out from a full heart, and she retold the experience of her own loyal work among the poor, of her play-time among the well-to-do. And as she knew more and more she told better and better what she had lived through: . . . Another fact about her is that she faced the many hard problems of her life's experience—faced them boldly, and set the example of writing to the point. It has been followed by how many with half her knowledge and insight, and without her generous purpose, taking grim subjects for art's sake, rather than for humanity's sake, as she did."

Mr. F. J. Gould, author of the "Children's Book of Moral Lessons," is to give a specimen moral lesson at 28, Buckingham-street, Strand, W.C., on Monday evening at 7 o'clock. This is one of a series of such lessons arranged by the Moral Instruction League, given on the second and fourth Mondays of the month, freely open to teachers and other interested persons. On February 25th Rev. J. H. Wicksteed, M.A., is to lecture on "Sympathy."

THE Rev. J. Tyssul Davis is back from Cape Town, and preached again at Chatham last Sunday. We are glad to hear that he left the Rev. R. Balmforth in good spirits and still enjoying his summer rest. When he begins to preach again in March, we trust that Mr. Balmforth's health will be fully restored.

ERRATA.—In last week's INQUIRER, p. 40, second column of leading article, line 7, end of quotation from Mr. Campbell, read "We do not need the names." Page 44, second column, in Sir Roland Wilson's letter, line 4, read: "reconciling the creed of Islam."

HARNACK ON THE AUTHORSHIP OF THE THIRD GOSPEL AND ACTS.

PROFESSOR HARNACK has recently published a work defending the traditional account of the authorship of the third Gospel and the Acts of the Apostles. He is not only far too eminent a scholar, but also too well-known for his independence of the "apologetic" interest, to be dismissed with a self-satisfied sneer because he forms his own judgment of the evidence, instead of bowing submissively to the critical dogmatism of the day. Yet he is obviously a little apprehensive of the reception which may be accorded to his thesis, and has a somewhat apologetic tone, as though he felt it to be a hazardous thing to acknowledge himself unconvinced by arguments which for more than half a century have asserted themselves with such a pompous display of candour and authority; and, indeed, it is not improbable that some of the votaries of modern hypotheses will stare as though he had denied the Copernican theory of the solar system. But others, it is to be hoped, will think that arguments, however old, which have satisfied Harnack deserve a candid and respectful examination.

In his first chapter, Harnack presents a sketch of the traditional account and the prima facie reasons for thinking that it may be correct. The tradition briefly is that the two works in question were written by the same author, and that that author was a man named Luke, who was a native of Antioch in Syria, a Greek by race, a physician by profession, and for some time a companion of Paul's. It is now pretty generally admitted that there is this much truth in the tradition, that certain sections of Acts, known as the "We-passages" (because in them the first person plural is used) are really derived from a document written by Luke. It is contended, however, that the works as a whole are the composition of some unknown author, who adopted Luke's document, and either from carelessness, or a wish to mislead, allowed the first person plural to remain in his own narrative. The evidence, therefore, turns largely on an examination of the "We-passages." If these are a borrowed document, or a "source" used by the author, we should expect this to be made evident by a careful examination of their vocabulary and style. But if our examination only proves more and more conclusively the identity of language and style with the rest of the work in which they are embedded, the first impression of the ordinary reader, that they must have proceeded from the author of the entire book, and that he was present on the occasions where the first person plural occurs, becomes increasingly probable. For if that view be not correct, then the writer who made use of the document did not simply copy it, but employed it as material for a narrative written in his own style, and the presence of the "we" cannot be explained by carelessness, and must be due to a dishonest trick. The whole tone and character of the author make the latter supposition improbable.

Before entering on a detailed examination of the We-passages, Harnack points out several phenomena of the Gospel and Acts which, to say the least, are consistent with the traditional view. Of these, the most striking and conclusive are found in the evidence that the author was a physician. The material bearing on this subject was collected with an almost superabundant completeness by Dr. Hobart, and published in 1882. His learned and important volume failed of its due effect, because, according to Harnack, some of the proofs went too far, and much that was indifferent was mingled with the decisive evidence. This criticism would, I think, be just if Dr. Hobart had aimed only at demonstrating the medical qualifications of the author; but in fairness to him it should be remembered that he was also presenting the evidence that the Gospel and Acts were by the same author, and for this purpose a complete collection of words familiar to the medical profession, which are characteristic of Luke and Acts in the New Testament, and occur with greater or less profusion in every chapter of both works, is highly important, even though many of these terms might be used by literary men who were not physicians. Harnack himself maintains that a thorough study of Hobart's work makes it impossible to resist the conclusion. In an appendix he presents a selection of the most striking examples. He endeavours to prove that the whole style of narrative is determined by a medical point of view. Cases of healing are related with marked predilection. The language is distinguished by technical terms, and medical figures of speech. These he admits might be due to the subject; but when it appears further that the description of particular diseases indicates medical observation and knowledge, that the language, even when it is not concerned with medical affairs, has nevertheless, a medical colouring; and that where the author speaks as an eye-witness, the medical style is particularly conspicuous, he thinks the proof complete that the author was a physician. For the details the reader must consult the work itself.

A large portion of the treatise is devoted to the examination of the We-passages. The agreement of these with the rest of the book in vocabulary, syntax, and style has been amply proved by the researches of various scholars, notably, in this country by Sir J. C. Hawkins, in his Horae Synopticae. Harnack, however, is careful to point out that this agreement does not preclude the use of written sources by the author. We know, from an examination of the Gospel, that he used the Gospel of Mark as a source for his evangelical narrative, and in this undoubted instance we can observe his method of dealing with his sources. A comparison may be made also with certain sections of Matthew. It appears from this investigation that although the author of the third Gospel makes a free use of his sources, nevertheless his narrative is coloured by their style, their syntax, and even their vocabulary. But nothing of the kind is apparent in the We-passages, and the only trace of a source is to be found in the retention of the word "We." This conclusion depends, of course, on a multitude of minute observations, and it is impossible to do more in this brief article than indicate the conclusion which appears to Harnack to be firmly established.

The arguments against Luke's authorship necessarily come under discussion. These are mainly of three kinds, resting on historical inaccuracies, on the legendary character of the earlier portions of the narrative, and on the portraiture of Paul. The first two points are fully conceded, and Harnack is very far from regarding Luke as practically an infallible historian. Indeed he speaks of his "colossal credulity and theological superficiality"; and he distinguishes very clearly between the question of authorship and that concerning the authenticity of the contents. There is really no reason why Luke should have been incapable of making historical blunders because he was for a time associated with Paul. Even eye-witnesses can make mistakes, and the notion that Luke must have been raised above the possibility of oversight can be only a lingering prejudice, founded on an untenable idea of inspiration. The presence of legendary material is of rather a different kind. But we know that religious legend requires but little time for its formation. Further, it is probable that Luke wrote his narrative at least half a century after the beginning of Christianity, and though he had an opportunity of gathering material in Palestine, and may be supposed to have gained correct information as to the general course of events, we do not know who were his informants, and it is not impossible that he himself may have been sometimes too willing to accept narratives from men who were not the best witnesses. The representation of Paul may seem to present a more serious difficulty. It may be granted at once that if we formed our idea of Paul exclusively from Acts, and then exclusively from the Epistles, the two pictures would not be identical, and that the former would give us but little conception of the spiritual depth and power of the Apostle. But Paul himself suggests the source of the contrariety. If we derived our impression of Paul from daily intercourse with him, as he worked at his tent-making, and noticed the feeble bodily presence and the contemptible speech which his adversaries mocked, we might indeed discover, as the author of Acts evidently did, that hidden behind this ordinary exterior there was a commanding soul, and he was worthy to be exalted as a great missionary; and yet we might have little appreciation of his profound thoughts, and might be more attracted by their practical results than by their place in the world of religious speculation. I believe, however, that the contrast has been exaggerated, and that the Paul of the critics is sometimes more remote from the real man than the Paul of Acts. But setting this aside, it is not a necessary part of the nature of things that a young Greek physician, however amiable and devoted, should have been able to fathom all the spiritual depths in that great Apostle, whose companion he was permitted to be on two or three momentous journeys, and to some unknown extent, during the imprisonment in Rome.

The concluding chapter on "Consequences" sums up what little is known of Luke's life, and contains interesting remarks on the origin and relations of the Synoptical Gospels, and the probable sources of the writers' information. Some of the suggestions, though well worthy of attention, can hardly be said to rise above the level of plausible conjecture. But we must not trespass further on the reader's patience; and we close this imperfect notice by cordially commending Harnack's work to the careful study of those who desire further insight into the origin of the early literary monuments of Christianity.

JAMES DRUMMOND.

DR. McTAGGART ON THEISM.*

ANYONE wishing to bring vividly before his mind the changes in critical thought upon religion during the last thirty years, might well make a comparison of G. J. Romanes' early anti-Theistic writings and Dr. McTaggart's recent book. It is true that the former was at most a clever amateur, while the latter is a skilled master in philosophy; still, the comparison is suggestive. They both arrive at what would generally be called negative conclusions. While Romanes, however, is cast into utter gloom by his findings, Dr. McTaggart calmly sets about to make the best of it, and more than hints at reconstruction. Indeed, while Romanes is obsessed by the notion that science has reduced the universe to a "mindless evolution" (and therefore the whole attack on Theism is directed towards showing that natural causation excludes a directing mind), Dr. McTaggart is frankly Idealist, and makes short work of the pretensions of science to give us the truth about the ultimate nature of things. Neither writer finds reason for believing in God; but in the one case it is because he cannot find evidence for a mind controlling the universe; in the other it is because there exists nothing else but minds or persons, none of which need be God. It used to be tacitly assumed both by Theists and by their opponents that if the spiritual nature of the universe could be made out, the case for Theism was established. Now, however, it is just the thoroughgoing spiritual interpretation of all existence that is held to have given Theism its quietus. It will be seen from this illustration how much bolder is the speculation of the later thinker. His examination of the theistic argument is also more searching and minute, for it is now a conflict not between materialism and spiritualism, but between rival forms of spiritualism. All this gain in thoroughness and boldness, however, is paid for by a greater remoteness in Dr. McTaggart's book from the real interests and concerns of the religious consciousness itself; for Romanes was really concerned with religious doubts and religious affirmations, whereas Dr. McTaggart is half the time fighting men of straw. Indeed, one does not know whether more to admire his ingenuity in pushing to their utmost limits the refinements of criticism as exercised on mere intellectualism in religion, or to wonder at his want of religious perception. Many of the arguments in the book are irrelevant to religion, and even to the "dogmas of religion." Thus the case is gravely debated, whether it might be prudent to flatter God in order to avoid torture (p. 215). One fails to discover a liberal comprehension of the meaning which religion puts into its intellectual expressions or doctrines ("dogmas" is our author's word.)

* "Some Dogmas of Religion." By J. M. E. McTaggart. (E. Arnold, 1906.)

Perhaps the trouble arises from the very hard and fast relation in which religion, which is said to be an "emotion," stands to doctrines or dogmas. It is said to "rest" upon a certain "conviction" which takes various dogmatic forms. But from this harmless looking commencement the writer proceeds at once to select certain dogmas and examine them simply as intellectual propositions, stripped of the "emotion" which alone can make them religious. There is no recognition of religion as a living experience which strives to express itself with varying success, now in ritual, now in conduct, now in doctrine, and ever returns upon itself in order to correct and renew these its imperfect embodiments. The dogma ("upon" which, according to a misleading metaphor, religion is said to be "based") is taken as a perfectly adequate representation of what religion means. And then, of course, in the hands of a past master of dialectical tierce and quart, there is no wonder that the poor thing makes such a sorry show. Take the treatment of the doctrine of an omnipotent God. One of the great words of old religion is "The Almighty." It had its origin, not in careful scientific thinking, but in a conviction of men's minds that the Being upon whom their trust was laid was the most Absolute Fact in existence. Our author takes this idea out of the context of religious experience which alone can give it any meaning, and treats it as a metaphysical proposition claiming validity in its own right. The result is that "omnipotence" is shattered. The following quotation will illustrate the author's method: "Again, is there any meaning in the supposition that God could create a man who was not a man, or that He could create a being who was neither man nor not man? But, if He could not, then He is bound by the law of Contradiction and the law of Excluded Middle, and, once more, He is not omnipotent" (p. 203). We see what happens when a religious conviction has to stand its trial in a borrowed character and plead to an alien court. It is not permitted to retain its conception of "the Almighty" unless it will go the length of saying that contradiction in terms is lawful and that the impossible can be. No doubt religion used a notion that refuses to be thought out; but it was a notion that also necessarily underlies such habits of thought as the laws of Contradiction and Excluded Middle. This notion was that of a sum of things, a whole of being, the world in its completeness, or the "nature of things," or Reality. God was thought of as being adequate to this complete world. He could do "all things"; and "all things" fell within this whole or sum of being. Now, of course, the notion of such a whole is not completely coherent or self-consistent, if you insist on metaphysics. A sum of things implies a limit. But this suggests a Beyond; there can be no limit to the All, to the "nature of things." A metaphysician of rigour and vigour will, therefore, find no difficulty in showing the incompleteness of any doctrine resting upon such a notion as a "sum of things," or the "nature of things." Nevertheless, this is a necessary mode of thought if we are to think about the world at all. And we find that the laws of Contradiction and

Excluded Middle themselves rest upon the notion of the "nature of things," which in this case, just as much as in the other, refuses to be thought out; so that it is clearly illegitimate to use these laws, as Dr. McTaggart does, to destroy the doctrine of omnipotence. To say that God is not omnipotent unless He can go behind these laws is to deny the practical validity of the ideas of a sum of things and a nature of things; and this is virtually to deny the laws of Contradiction and Excluded Middle themselves. The whole mistake arises when Dr. McTaggart denies to religion the right to use a working conception ("omnipotence") the problems connected with which our minds are not at present able to solve. According to this working conception God can do all things that fall within the "nature of things." "Can" and "able" are only legitimate when they are used of Him in this connection. If, then, Dr. McTaggart insists that, for consistency's sake, they must be applicable also outside the nature of things, he (and not his opponents) throws to the winds the laws of Contradiction, &c., and then it becomes possible to make any proposition whatever, e.g., that God "could" both be and not be: a reductio ad absurdum, be it observed, not of omnipotence, but of the argument by which Dr. McTaggart tried to overthrow that doctrine.

Similarly, it is not too much to say that the writer misses the whole point of the religious consciousness when it posits a God who creates. The notion of a creation taking place at a certain moment of time is clearly only pictorial, a working conception rather than a metaphysical position. Its purpose is to show the creatures as beings that have substantial reality and act; it is in particular a way of insisting on the selfhood of created spirits; whereas Dr. McTaggart argues as if Theism only allowed reality and initiative to God. For our author the only alternatives seem to be, either that God does everything or that God does nothing (see pp. 221-234). In that case, of course, it is easy to show that the latter is the preferable alternative; for at any rate it does not ascribe the evils of the world to a good God. But this kind of simplification is, after all, a mere despairing abandonment of the task of thought, and Dr. McTaggart shares it with Pantheism and Materialism, and all such short and easy ways out of the difficulty. Theism may have its difficulties, but it at least does more justice to the rich and complex nature of the facts of the case.

Perhaps the most disappointing feature of the book is that it has no appreciation of the teaching of the immanence of God. And yet the whole of Dr. McTaggart's own positive theory, that Reality is a world of spirits whose unity is as real as its differentiations, seems to provide a very good basis for a spiritual Theism. A spiritual unity, which is as real as the individual spirits it unites, comes much nearer to the Theist's idea of God than most of the representations of Theism Dr. McTaggart has been attacking. Here again, however, the author has not gone to the true source of religious doctrine, viz., religion. He has no idea of God as interpenetrating other spirits: He dismisses with scant consideration the idea that (as he awkwardly puts it) "one person can be part of another." Again, even the support given to the doctrine of human immortality reveals how far his "dogmas" are from being "dogmas of religion"; he has no recognition of the religious teaching that immortality gets its real meaning only when it is viewed as "life in God, and union there." THE KNUTSFORD GASKELL.

ONE of the most welcome publications of last year was the Knutsford edition of the works of Mrs. Gaskell, issued in eight volumes by Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co. (4s. 6d. net each volume). It is pleasant in all outward attributes of type, binding, and paper, the lightness of which is by no means the least welcome of its qualities; and the illustrations add greatly to its value as a personal memorial. The frontispiece of the first volume is a beautiful reproduction of Richmond's portrait of Mrs. Gaskell in 1851, and other volumes have the portrait of Samuel Laurence of 1864-5 and the much earlier bust by Dunbar. The portrait of Mr. Gaskell presents him by no means as the dignified minister of Cross-street Chapel, but decidedly at ease, in quite unclerical attire. There is also a charming picture of the drawing-room at Plymouth-grove, Manchester, so long the Gaskells' home; and the last volume, which contains the not quite completed best of all the stories—"Wives and Daughters"—has a sad reminiscence in the picture of the country house near Alton, in Hampshire, which Mrs. Gaskell had bought, and was about to give as a surprise to her husband, when the swift summons came.

This edition has had the advantage of the editorship of Dr. A. W. Ward, the Master of Peterhouse, Cambridge, and formerly for many years of Owens College, Manchester. His introductions to the several volumes are of great interest and value. It is only a pity that in this definitive memorial edition the biographical introduction, which is enlarged from the article on Mrs. Gaskell contributed by Dr. Ward to the Dictionary of National Biography, should show any signs of haste or insufficient care. This is most to be regretted in page xli. of the Introduction. On page xli. George Henry Lewes's name is misspelt.

Mrs. Gaskell was born in 1810, six years before Charlotte Brontë, nine years before George Eliot. Dr. Ward, at the close of his Biographical Introduction, quotes George Sand's saying to Lord Houghton—"Mrs. Gaskell has done what neither I nor other female writers in France can accomplish: she has written novels which excite the deepest interest in men of the world, and yet which every girl will be the better for reading." And Dr. Ward adds: "Though this is high praise, it is not from this point of view that I should, primarily at least, care to compare her with either Charlotte Brontë or George Eliot, the two great English authoresses of whom she was the contemporary, and—though not in the same degree in each case—the friend. If she lacks the intense individuality of her earlier, and the wide intellectual and moral horizon of her later fellow-writer, she is the equal of both the one and the other in her power of understanding and reproducing the varieties of human character within the range of her observation. And a distinctive quality of her own—it may be called a literary quality, because alike in her graver and in her gayer moods she was able to give literary expression to it—is her sweet serenity of soul.”

TEACHING THE LAWS OF HEALTH.

SIR,—We were all touched by Mr. Lummis's earnest pleading in his letter of October 13. He must not draw a wrong inference from the silence of INQUIRER readers, and imagine that they do not recognise the duty of teaching the laws of health to the young people whose lives they touch and hope to influence. The duty, rather, is so manifest that there seems little need to urge it. In Sunday-schools and Women's Friendly Societies and mothers' meetings, to say nothing of precept and practice in our families, the necessity and the reasons for the necessity of temperance, fresh air, sunshine, and cleanliness are frequent themes. In our own communion we have a most devoted and effective advocate and apostle of right living in Mrs. Crompton, of Rivington, whose services are freely given to those schools and congregations which are wise enough to ask for them.

I agree with Mr. Lummis that “an ill-ventilated Sunday-school is a crime.” Our schools were built, for the most part, many years ago, and it is difficult, no doubt, to secure their right ventilation; but authorities are not sufficiently bent on securing this—not sufficiently awake to the need of oxygen for the brains and bodies of the young creatures who are in their care. The children come warmly clad into heated air, without enough inrush of fresh air; and it is no wonder that they often grow weary and inattentive, and are physically the worse for their school attendance.

SCOTTISH UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

SIR,—In your last issue you inserted a letter from my friend Mr. Webster of Aberdeen. Unfortunately, that letter contains statements that are not correct. Mr. Webster may be an authority on the Frees and the United Frees, but certainly he is not an authority that can be relied on for giving correct information about Unitarian work in Scotland. He says: “The Scottish Unitarian Association has cut itself adrift from the Churches.” The S.U.A. has done nothing of the kind. Its Constitution says, “The Association shall consist of . . . (b) Churches and kindred Associations that join the Association and make an annual contribution to its funds of at least £1 1s.” Since the new Constitution the Aberdeen Church has withdrawn from the Association, but other Churches remain with it. Soon after I was appointed secretary I wrote to Mr. Webster and begged of him to rejoin us and to persuade his Church to do the same. He has not seen his way to do this. Our Association is not able to make large grants to any of the Churches; if it were, I feel confident Aberdeen would be connected with us.

Mr. Webster seems to be utterly ignorant of what our Association has done for Kilmarnock. According to the Year Book, he was minister there from 1891 to 1895, but he is not in a position to know much about that Church for the last ten years. Mr. Webster was a member of the Committee of the S.U.A., but I do not think he has attended a single Committee meeting since the Association took over the Kilmarnock Church four or five years ago. Now, if a gentleman is a member of a Committee and does not attend for four or five years, he has no right to complain of what that Committee does, and we can hardly look upon him as an authority able to speak of the work of that Committee. I have attended the Committee meetings; I hold the minute book, and also most of the letters; and though I have often voted with the minority, I am sure the Association is not to blame for what has taken place at Kilmarnock. Neither is it to blame for Kirkcaldy. If Mr. Webster knew a way out of the difficulties, why did he not attend the Committee meetings and show us that way? He can complain through your paper, but when I wanted a man in the Committee to show us another course of action he was not there. I was willing for the Association to spend its last penny for Kilmarnock; Mr. Webster never supported me. I am very sorry to have to write this, for I respect Mr. Webster very much, and I believe he works hard in Aberdeen; but I do think your correspondents should supply reliable information.

MANCHESTER DOMESTIC MISSION.

SIR,—I am quite aware that my brief account of the Manchester Missions was very imperfect and inadequate. May I, however, assure Mr. Darbishire that it was based on first hand knowledge. I am only sorry that considerations of space made it impossible to give anything like a full or worthy account of the work at any one of the three missions:

CHARLES PEACH.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

A MEETING of the Committee was held at the Memorial Hall, Manchester, on Thursday, January 17. In the absence of the President from illness, the chair was taken by the Rev. Dr. J. E. Carpenter, and 26 members were present. Apologies were reported from 10 others, who were unable to attend.

The result of the further appeal to congregations and District Associations for the working expenses of the Conference was reported, and it was agreed to advertise the sums paid or promised for the current year.

The Treasurer presented his statement of accounts to date.

The Secretary reported that he was arranging with certain District Associations to receive visits from the President as outlined at the last meeting.

In response to an invitation to send representatives to the International Conference at Boston next September, Mr. W. B. Bowring (one of the Vice-Presidents) and the Secretary were appointed. A report relating to the supply of students for the ministry was considered and, with some minor alterations, approved. It was resolved that a copy of the scheme for the appointment of a Board, with a statement of its objects and powers, be sent to Manchester College, the Home Missionary College, and Carmarthen College, with a request for their sympathy and co-operation.

A draft circular, with questions referring to Advisory Committees and a suggested Ministerial Board, was approved, with a few amendments of detail, and ordered to be sent to the present Advisory Committees and to the Committees of all Provincial Assemblies and District Associations in England, Wales, and Scotland, and of corresponding bodies in Ireland, of the three Colleges, of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, of the Ministerial Fellowship, and of the Ministers' Benevolent, Stipend Augmentation and Substantiation Funds. It was further resolved that the sub-committee, which had prepared the circular, should be re-appointed, with the addition of Mr. W. Byng Kenrick, to collate the replies from the above bodies and to prepare a scheme for the consideration of the Committee.

A motion of sympathy with the President in his illness, and expressing hope for his speedy recovery, was cordially adopted.

It was agreed that the next meeting of the Committee be held in London in Whit-week.

PAST AND PRESENT IN THE LIFE OF THE SOUL.

THE problem of our past life with its failures and sins presents to most of us many difficulties in the right ordering of the present, and the ultimate good of the future. How should we regard our past, and how can we best use it to help us to make the present better? For, if we rightly regard our past and rightly act in the present, our future, whether our earthly term be long or short, will be, assuredly, worthy of our highest ideal.

When Dryden wrote “Not even heaven itself over our past has power,” he stated only half a truth. If thoughts be as has been maintained, things, then we have power over our past, and the way in which we think about it determines its value to us.

One thing is certain, we cannot rightly ignore our past, or pretend that it is not ours. Those who do so build their present on a false foundation. We are in every sense the result of what has gone before. Every act and every thought has contributed something to make us what we are. “The child is father to the man.”

Dr. Martineau puts, in one of his sermons, with a terrible insistence, the fact that we cannot cancel any of our desires or thoughts when they are once formed. “No power,” he says, “within the circuit of God's providence can blot out an idea from the pages of the secret heart or cancel a force of desire that has once gone forth. How vain, then, is the effort of thought to fly from the deed of sin the moment it is finished—the hurry of conscience to reach a place of greater peace, the eager whisper of self love that says the lapse is over and a firmer march of duty may be forthwith begun. If the foul thing were cemented to the hour that witnessed its commission you might escape it; but being in the mind, you have it with you still, however fast you fly, or however little you look behind."²

In looking back over a past which contains wrong doing, the fact that we do frankly recognise that it does contain actions and thoughts which we regret, and are heartily ashamed of, is in some sense an expiation. What other expiation we may have to give in the future, either in the absence of enjoyment (for punishment is sometimes not the less real because it is not always recognised as punishment and may consist in the absence of some mental or moral quality, which we have allowed to dwindle into decay from want of use), or in objective suffering, we know not, and dare not say.

Nathaniel Hawthorne tells the story of one who, by the concealment of an act which was in itself justifiable, imparted to it the secret effect of guilt. The story is of a young man who, with an old one, had escaped from a skirmish with Indians, and both being wounded and far spent, was seeking a way to help and shelter through the wilderness. The older man, being too weak to go farther, persuades the younger to go forward alone. He does so, and is ultimately rescued, in a state of unconsciousness, from his sufferings and privations. When he has recovered, inquiry is made of him as to the fate of his companion, and instead of speaking the truth, he lets it be understood that the old man had died before he left him, and that he had dug a grave for him in the wilderness. He ultimately marries the daughter of the old man, who bears him a son. But the deception he has practised makes life wretched, and he is continually haunted with the idea that his father-in-law was yet waiting in the wilderness for the assistance he had promised to bring. Years after, when the son had grown a comely lad, the family resolve to take to the forest and seek subsistence there, and on the fifth day of their march the boy is accidentally shot by his father, on the very spot where, years ago, his father-in-law had been left. Hawthorne's method is very subtle, but the sin of Reuben Bourne lay in the concealment of the truth. In effect, he refused to face his past. We do not always receive such poetic justice as this, but we do always suffer if we are untrue.

Maeterlinck, in one of his essays, suggests that when we have made confession of a fault to one we love, we have overcome it, and that "it is not we, but a stranger, that stands in the place where we committed the fault." There is a truth in this, although when he goes on to suggest that we are then no longer responsible for the past fault, any more than the mirror is responsible for the reflection that passes across it, or the good soil for the ill weed, we can but reply that the image is, alas! our own reflection, and the ill weed is of our own sowing.

Perhaps the thought that is most helpful is that contained in Mr. Philip Wicksteed's "Religion of Time and of Eternity," where he points out that the seeming irrevocability of the past is, after all, an illusion, and that "it is a fragment that awaits its interpretation, nay, awaits its full being, its true creation, from the whole."³ If this be so, and "the past shall be what we shall make it," let us make it hopeful and brave. Let us not extenuate its faults or failures, but seek out their reason and meaning, and let us not let the faults blot out all the goodness of the past. After all, the past was not wholly bad. The veil between the soul and the eternal soul was not always there. Let us pray that we may yet live to see the veil wholly withdrawn.

R. M. RANDS.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

LET'S PRETEND!

How many happy games begin that way! How much we enjoy playing at being somebody else! How much better we like our toys and our furniture when we can turn them into something quite different from what they seem!

A rug becomes a bear's coat; a bit of carpet is turned into a field or Robinson Crusoe's island; a tablecloth makes the roof of a tent or a king's mantle. Chairs can be used for a boat, a train, a tram, or a motor-car. I remember a most convenient cupboard door with a hook for a fastening, and it could serve as the door of a house, of a tent, of an omnibus, of a pulpit, or of a pew, just according to our arrangement of the table and chairs. Indeed, it would serve as anything except just what it was—a cupboard door.

In the same way we would play at being anybody except just ourselves. Some children who are very fond of animals, like animal games best. I know two little girls who will be dogs for hours together, and will remember to speak no word, but only show their meaning dog-fashion and only play dog games, and only answer to their dog names.

Another little girl said that the happiest day she could remember was one she spent with a cousin and a friend playing at horses. They made their reins, arranged their stable, and made up games from the story of "Black Beauty."

But I think most children play at being grown-up. For they want to be older and to do as the older folk do.

Have you ever noticed how difficult it is to get anyone to take a child's part in a game?

It is the tiny ones, who do not yet go to school, that like to play at going off to school with a bag for their books. Those who go to school each day do not care to play at that, except for the fun of being teacher.

A girl likes to be a nurse, or a mother, or a school-mistress, to keep a shop, or be mistress of a house:

A boy wants to ride a horse, or drive a cab or a motor, or he wants to go to business, or to be a study-man, or a doctor, or a soldier.

We play at what we think we should like to be when we are grown up. Or we play at being what we know we can never be in real life—animals, or Red American Indians, or kings and queens.

We make-believe in order to get what is beyond our reach, now or for always. Or we make-believe just for the delight in making up, inventing.

Did you ever make games of your favourite nursery rhymes, fairy tales, Bible stories, and stories from English history—The House that Jack Built, Jack the Giant Killer, David and Goliath, King Alfred?

In all these happy games of make-believe, we pretend to be somebody else: We know it is a game, and other people know it is a game. It is just the playing at being somebody else that is the pleasure.

As we read more and play less, we do more of our make-believe in our own minds. We make our pictures inside our minds, instead of outside. Instead of pretending to be somebody else, we just feel like somebody else, and seem to see what they would see.

As we read of other people and other places, we picture it all to ourselves, see it with our mind's eye.

Now what do we call this power of making pictures in our minds, of seeing things with our mind's eye?

Another name for a sort of picture is image. When we imitate anything we make what is called an image of it. We may make an image of a person in snow, in stone, in plaster, or in wood.

The power by which we make pictures or images in our minds is called imagination. We can make images or imitations in our minds of real things we have really seen, of real things that we have not seen, things in books something like real ones, or of things in stories that are not real at all, like a fairy, a mermaid, or a dragon.

We can imagine a bear we saw in the street. We can imagine Johnnie Bear who lived in the Yellowstone Park in America, and we can imagine the Three Bears of the fairy story, or the Bear Prince. We can imagine a whole world of stories—and as we grow older we shall find that the world of make-believe grows too, till it includes all the beautiful stories that have been written in all past times.

We may fill our minds with ugly images or with beautiful ones. If we use our imagination well, it helps us in many ways to make our lives more happy and useful.

When as children we play at being horses or dogs, we imagine what it must feel like to be a horse or a dog. It is only a game. But there is a part of the game that we can carry with us all through our lives. Feeling with others is sympathy. Feeling with horses and dogs and other dumb creatures is sympathy. Imagination helps us to feel with them, to understand their lives, their needs, to share something of their life.

Imagination helps us to understand and share the life of wild animals in nature and in story books.

Imagination also helps us to understand the lives of other people round about us—to put ourselves in their places and feel sympathy with them:

When we give up playing at postmen, tram conductors, engine drivers, and soldiers, we can still make pictures in our minds of their work, and the sort of lives they lead. If you watch people at work, you will be surprised to find how interesting it is; you can see much for yourself, and your imagination will help to fill up the picture. Imagination will help you to understand other lives and to feel sympathy with them: Your life and theirs may be the better for that:

THEOLOGY IN FREE CHURCHES.

OUR columns this week reflect a good deal of the widespread interest aroused by the Rev. R. J. CAMPBELL's exposition of the "New Theology," as witnessed by the daily press for the past fortnight; and as we write on Thursday we find a new aspect of Mr. CAMPBELL's hope for a better religious future reflected in a further interview, in Wednesday's Daily Mail. He again denies responsibility for the term "New Theology." "It is not of my making or of my choice." The doctrine of the Divine Immanence (the starting point of those who take the New Theology attitude) he declares to be certainly not new, but "it ought to be placed in the foreground of Christian thought." "Of one thing I am quite sure: this is only incidentally a theological movement. It is far more a moral and spiritual movement. It is a religious quickening; it is rising spontaneously in every church in Christendom, and sooner or later it will call the whole of the civilised world back to God. It will put an end to the alienation of the masses on the one hand and the intellectual classes on the other from religion. It is the gospel of the humanity of God and of the divinity of Man."

This will be the final test of Mr. CAMPBELL's as of all other teaching. Does it make for truer and better life? Does it stand the test of experience? Orthodox theologians are, of course, telling Mr. CAMPBELL that he is faithless to the Gospel, and is denying every essential truth vindicated by the experience of centuries. Now he and his church, and those who stand in the same line of progressive thought, have to prove what is the vital power of their faith. They speak of the immanence of God, the divinity of man; is there then in their worship the moving power of prayer, in the felt presence of the living God, and in the spirit of their daily life the power of a pure self-sacrificing love such as they recognise in JESUS, and declare to be within the reach of all, as at one with God? We are not sure that we understand the whole of Mr. CAMPBELL's thought on the subject of the identity of nature in God and man. Very likely that thought needs to be more clearly defined, and brought to the test of the profoundest human experience; but certainly its power is to be tested in religious fellowship, in prayer, and single-hearted labour for the kingdom of God, and therein we are entirely at one with him.

This, in the midst of which he finds himself, is a world-wide movement by no means to be confined to a section of Congregational churches. The new spirit of humanism is stirring in all the churches—certainly among progressive thinkers in the Church of England, in the hearts of liberals in the Roman Catholic Church, as witness the religion of BENEDETTO in FOGAZZARO's novel, "The Saint," and in wide circles of Protestant Europe. There are many forms of interpretation, but the fundamental spiritual facts are the same: Life with God in the world, in human fellowship with CHRIST, to perfect brotherhood in universal love. Is it a working faith, with power to overcome evil and advance the Kingdom? Does it avail for the deepest joy in life, and victorious hope? We believe that it does, where men are true to the light, and realise that herein God is leading us into a better future. And that being so, we should hold to the essential things, and work together for them, leaving idle disputings as to who is or is not Christian, or who is or is not Unitarian.

And with the earnestness of that common life, surrendered to the spirit of brotherly love, there will come to us the best help for clear thinking and the advancement of truth.

We are glad that the idea of a "New Theology League" as a militant propagandist society among Congregationalists has been abandoned, and that at a meeting on Wednesday afternoon, over which Mr. CAMPBELL presided, it was unanimously resolved:—

"That there be a society formed for the encouragement of progressive religious thought, and not for propagandist work, as stated in the Press; and that membership be open to all in sympathy with its object, irrespective of denomination."

That surely marks the choice of a better way for the advancement of truth and the vital forces of religious life, and for sincere religious fellowship among the kindred spirits of many churches.

One other word in conclusion. We have headed this article "Theology in Free Churches." Men may now perhaps realise what is meant by a church genuinely free, in which there is room to grow. The members of the City Temple Church may ignore their Trust Deed, because to attempt to fulfil its terms would lead to an impossible position. If the present controversy should bring legal liberation to such fettered churches, Mr. CAMPBELL's courage would have had one other good result, for which many earnest men would have reason to give thanks.

REV. R. J. CAMPBELL'S PHILOSOPHY OF RELIGION.

IN the leading article of last week's INQUIRER, referring to a statement attributed to the Rev. R. J. Campbell, and corrected by him, that Unitarians made "a great gulf" between God and man, we said that of eighteenth century Deism, and of what is commonly described as the "Unitarianism of Priestley and Belsham," it might be true, but certainly not of Unitarians who were followers of Channing and Martineau. Then in Saturday's Daily Chronicle we found the following statement in the course of an interview made by Dr. Fairbairn, Principal of Mansfield College, Oxford:—

"I do not care for the term Unitarian; I prefer the word Socinian. As to the alleged gulf, if ever there was a man who believed in the Divine Immanence, it was the most distinguished Socinian of the eighteenth century—Joseph Priestley. Certainly, Unitarianism is not and never has been Deism." To Dr. Fairbairn's taste in the matter of "Unitarian" or "Socinian" we need make no objection, but we were anxious to inquire whether we had seriously misunderstood Priestley's religious position in the suggestion of the above sentence, and therefore placed the two apparently contradictory views before Professor Upton. He has been good enough to make the following response.—
ED. INQUIRER.

My impression is that the opposition between the opinion of Principal Fairbairn and that of the INQUIRER leader in reference to Priestley's philosophy is only apparent, and that it arises mainly from the different senses in which the writers use the phrase "immanence of God." In one sense of these words Priestley was an intense believer in Divine Immanence, for he believed that God is present through all space, and that it is to His incessant activity that the origin and continuance in existence of all matter, and therefore of all souls, is due. In his view our self-consciousness is a property of the material atoms of the body which manifests itself when those atoms are organically arranged. God, then, must be immanent and active within us in every moment of our life.

But I apprehend that the word "immanent," as applied to God in recent philosophy, means much more than this; it means, mainly, that God, in manifesting Himself in our self-consciousness, enables us in a measure to rise above our own finiteness and to participate in His essence, so that by this inner self-revelation of the Eternal and Infinite One we reach ideas and ideals which have in them elements of self-existence, eternity, and infinity, and which could not possibly be attained by a being such as Priestley conceived man to be—a being wholly finite, and who has only his own finite and individual experiences as a basis for his reasonings. A thinker who so regards man must, I believe conclude that God, however near to him locally, must, as regards His essence, be separated from his apprehension by an impassable chasm. Now, it is perfectly true that Priestley had a most vivid sense of the presence of God and his personal communion with God. His writings most clearly show that he was one of the most devout and religious of men; but his philosophical opponents maintained that his philosophy furnished no adequate rationale of the possibility of such communion with God. In his view man is a material being, while God is immaterial; and he wholly denied the validity of that faculty of intuition upon which most religious philosophers mainly base their insight into the nature of God. On these grounds I venture to conclude that there is no fundamental disagreement between the above estimates of Priestley's philosophy of religion.

These remarks suggest the far more important question of what the Rev. R. J. Campbell really means by that "essential oneness of God and man" which forms the basal truth of ethics and religion, and about which, in his opinion, both Unitarians and Trinitarians in the past have had such wholly inadequate ideas. So far as I can judge from a fairly careful reading of many of Mr. Campbell's utterances, neither Unitarian nor Trinitarian, unless he has had the advantage of attending Oxford class-rooms, or has in some other way been initiated into absolute idealism, can, in his view, possibly possess the key to the profound truths involved in these words, "oneness with God." The meaning which Mr. Campbell attaches to this expression cannot, I believe, be discovered in either the Old or the New Testament; but, if I mistake not, it is very elaborately enunciated in the late T. H. Green's Prolegomena to Ethics. Mr. Bowie showed keen philosophical discernment when, in reply to his interviewer, he said, "I detect in Mr. Campbell's teaching the note of that Neo-Hegelianism about which there is, of course, considerable difference of opinion among philosophical thinkers belonging to various schools of theology."

The characteristic feature of this Neo-Hegelianism is, as Green expresses it, that in man the eternal self-consciousness of God manifests or reproduces itself under the limiting conditions of our particular physical organisms. Each human soul is in absolute and entire union with God, so that whatever a man says or does, it is not the individual man alone that expresses himself in the act; for in the act God and man are inseparably blended. The ordinary Unitarian or Trinitarian supposes that, though he and all men every moment depend upon the will of God for their existence and their faculties, and are all united by their common relation to and dependence on the one Eternal Father; nevertheless each rational soul has delegated to it a certain distinct individuality, a certain measure of independent and free causality, whereby it is open to it in seasons of temptation to freely choose between two equally possible alternatives; between, on the one hand, gratifying its own sensual or selfish craving, or, on the other hand, of identifying itself with that Eternal God, that Eternal Love which reveals itself in the inner life, and in virtue of its felt divinity claims each man's allegiance. As the ordinary man interprets his consciousness it appears to him that in all the higher experiences of the soul two wills are present; there is the will of the immanent God which expresses itself in man's ethical and spiritual ideals, and there is the will of the individual which in moments of temptation may either obey or resist the claims of the higher will. As Professor Pringle-Pattison well expresses it: "In our wills we feel a principle of self-hood which separates us even from the Being who is the ground of our existence. 'Our wills are ours to make them Thine,' as the poet finely puts it. But they must be really ours if there is to be any ethical value in the surrender, if there is to be any meaning in the process at all."

If Green's analysis of man's moral and spiritual consciousness is correct, it follows that it is an utter mistake to suppose that the will of man can ever really conflict with or resist the will of God, or to say, as Professor Pattison does, that "our wills can separate us even from the Being who is the ground of our existence." Now, does Mr. Campbell really agree with Green here? If he does, he virtually denies to man any real free will, and is quite justified in declaring that, in his view, the ordinary Unitarian and Trinitarian put in an unreal separation between God and man. But the puzzling feature in the business is that while it is constantly evident in Mr. Campbell's writings, and especially in his treatment of sin, that so far as he has any consistent philosophy at all it is the same as Green's, he not infrequently uses language which implies an entirely different theory. No doubt the casual hearer of his sermons takes for granted that the preacher believes that it was possible for the sinner not to have committed the sins for which he reproaches himself; and the preacher does not enlighten his flock on the question of free will and moral responsibility. It is only when he begins to talk about sin that it becomes evident to the reflective hearer or reader that the preacher's inspiration hails from Oxford rather than from Palestine.

The Daily Mail, recording an interview with Mr. Campbell, said he appeared to deny to man free will. As Mr. Campbell corrects some statements in the newspaper's report, but says nothing about this one, we may infer that he admits its truth. Of course, in the absence of free will, sin becomes simply a necessary phase in the evolution of human character—a phase which brings painful consequences, which consequences, in the long run, give rise to motives strong enough to prevent such sinful decisions in the future. In this conception of sin, as Mr. Whitaker says in the last number of the INQUIRER, "all that Christianity has had to say on this tremendous subject is just brushed aside."

It is true that Mr. Campbell sometimes speaks as if he viewed sin as the ordinary Theist or Unitarian views it, for he says, "Sin is simply selfishness; it is an offence against the God within." This looks as if he thought that the soul could have abstained from offending the God within; but in a preceding passage he says, "We believe there is no real distinction between humanity and Deity. Our being is the same as God's, though our consciousness of it is limited." This is exactly Green's view; but how our being can be identical with God's and yet God be offended with some of our moral decisions, remains a mystery on which Mr. Campbell's utterances throw no light. I am not surprised to learn from the Christian World that some of Mr. Campbell's followers in New Theology tracks differ from him on the doctrine of sin and make no secret of this difference."

But while it seems to me that the Hegelian element in Mr. Campbell's thought introduces occasional inconsistencies into his sermons, I most gratefully acknowledge that these eloquent discourses are as rich in ideas as they are beautiful in form, and that the good they are doing in rationalising and liberalising theological conceptions is incalculably great.

CHARLES B. UPTON.

MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD:

ANNUAL MEETING:

THE Annual Meeting of Manchester College was held on Thursday afternoon, January 17, at the Memorial Hall, Manchester. The President, the Rev. S. A. Steinthal, was not well enough to be there, and the chair was taken by Mr. Charles W. Jones, the treasurer. The other Trustees present were Dr. Carpenter, the Principal, the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed (Visitor), Mrs. T. B. Evans, Miss Elizabeth Greg, Miss H. M. Johnson, Mrs. John Harwood, Mrs. F. Taylor, Mrs. A. H. Worthington; the Revs. Dendy Agate, A. Bennett, V. D. Davis, T. B. Evans, F. K. Freeston, W. E. George, C. Hargrove, J. Harwood, R. T. Herford, P. M. Higginson, T. Lloyd Jones, J. C. Odgers, T. Robinson, C. J. Street, J. C. Street, J. M. Lloyd Thomas, and B. Walker; Messrs. W. B. Bowring, R. D. Darbishire, John Dendy, John Harrison, R. Harrop, John Harwood, Thomas Harwood, G. H. Leigh, I. S. Lister, William Long, A. Nicholson, Richard Robinson, J. W. Scott, A. E. Steinthal, Egbert Steinthal, Grosvenor Talbot, G. W. Rayner Wood, S. B. Worthington, Thomas Worthington, A. H. Worthington (hon. secretary), and E. W. Marshall (assistant secretary).

THE CHAIRMAN, in opening the proceedings, said how much they regretted that the President was unable to be with them: The minutes of the last meeting of Trustees in June, and the catch-words of the minutes of subsequent meetings of the committee were read and confirmed.

MR. WILLIAM LONG then moved:—

"That the Trustees of Manchester College, in public meeting assembled, tender to the President of the College, the Rev. Samuel Alfred Steinthal, their heartfelt congratulations on his attaining the age of eighty years, and welcome this opportunity of acknowledging with deep gratitude the great and varied services rendered by him to the College for more than half a century. Entering the College as a student in 1849, a Trustee since 1853, Visitor from 1895 to 1903, senior member of the committee and for many years its Chairman, and for the past three years President, he has always been devoted to the principles of the College and never spared himself in its service: The Trustees ask Mr. Steinthal to accept this resolution as a token of their affectionate goodwill and gratitude."

Nothing that he could add, Mr. Long said, could strengthen what was so well expressed in that resolution; it would meet, he was sure, with their warm approval, and he had the utmost satisfaction in moving it.

Dr. CARPENTER, who seconded the resolution, said it was an honour to join in such a tribute of sympathy. No one who looked back over the last forty years of College work but must recall again and again the strong and gracious figure of Mr. Steinthal, as one of the centres of its management and the best exponents of its principles. He had the advantage of being trained originally in the College, and had again and again borne witness to his affectionate reverence for its teachers, and the benefits received from their instructions. Throughout his life as a minister, Mr. Steinthal had shown a profound sympathy with young men who were dedicating themselves to the profession which he adorned and were passing through the College. Then he had a singularly firm grasp of the actual business details of the College; as chairman of the committee his presence had been of the greatest value, singularly impartial, perfectly firm and courteous. It was well that such a man should be honoured among the churches, with a large experience of life behind him, and they trusted that his remaining days among them might yet be many, brightened by the sense of the honour, affection, and reverence in which he was held.

The CHAIRMAN announced that the resolution, which was unanimously adopted, had been engrossed for presentation to Mr. Steinthal.

He then, as TREASURER, presented the accounts. He regretted the disappearance of the Oxford Renewals Fund, now merged in the general account, and also the fact that the expenditure on exhibitions for students was less than last year. He would like to see that doubled. The most serious item was the continuous falling off of subscriptions, through the death of large subscribers; but even if that were not so, it was a wretched thing that they got only £1,000 a year. The seeming finality of the £22s. subscription was a misfortune. They wanted some more £25 subscriptions. The work of the College ought to command them.

On the motion of Mr. J. W. Scott, seconded by Mr. Egbert Steinthal (who delivered a message from his father to the meeting), the accounts were adopted.

On the motion of the Rev. C. HARGROVE, seconded by Mr. W. B. BOWRING, it was agreed that the address and accounts should be printed and circulated. Mr. Hargrove called attention to the last paragraph of the address (which was printed in last week's INQUIRER), and said the committee was awake to the needs of the time.

The Rev. J. HARWOOD called attention to the absence in the address of any record of the meeting of the National Conference in Oxford last year, and it was understood that a paragraph would be added.

On the motion of the CHAIRMAN, seconded by Mr. JOHN DENDY, the Right Hon. William Kenrick was elected President of the College.

On the motion of Mr. I. S. LISTER, seconded by the Rev. DENDY AGATE, the Revs. Dr. Drummond and S. A. Steinthal were elected Vice-Presidents.

The committee was elected as follows, the names standing in the order of length of service:—Rev. S. A. Steinthal, Rev. H. E.

Dowson, Rev. C. T. Poynting, Rev. P. M. Higginson, Mr. G. W. Rayner Wood, Mr. R. Harrop, Mr. S. B. Worthington, Mr. Russell Scott, Mr. A. H. Worthington, Rev. V. D. Davis, Mr. Charles W. Jones, Mr. H. P. Greg, Rev. C. Hargrove, Mr. W. Long, Rev. Henry Gow, Mr. G. H. Leigh, Mr. Grosvenor Talbot, Rev. F. K. Freeston, Rev. R. T. Herford, Mr. J. W. Scott, Mr. A. E. Steinthal, Mr. F. W. Monks, Mr. John Dendy, Rev. Joseph Wood, Mr. John Harrison, and Dr. Carpenter.

Mr. Charles W. Jones was re-elected treasurer and Mr. A. H. Worthington and the Rev. H. Gow, secretaries; Messrs. F. Nicholson and Egbert Steinthal, auditors, and the deputy treasurers.

The CHAIRMAN moved the resolution, postponed from the previous annual meeting, of which notice had been given on behalf of the committee:—"That, from and after the year 1907, the January Meeting of the Trustees shall be discontinued, and there shall be held only one Annual Meeting of the Trustees, viz.: in June, at Oxford."

He felt strongly that the annual meeting should be held at Oxford, where the work of the College was done, and that they should concentrate interest in one annual meeting. It was good that people should go to Oxford and see what was being done there.

Mr. G. H. LEIGH seconded the resolution. He had felt for some years, he said, that that change ought to be made, and they should realise that the College at Oxford was the centre of all their operations. If they had only the one annual meeting, more effort would be made to attend.

Mr. JOHN HARWOOD suggested that as the Trustees lived in all parts of the country, it might be well, before a decision was come to, to ask the opinion of the whole body.

Mr. LISTER said the difficulties of travelling were being constantly diminished.

Mr. A. NICHOLSON regretted that the motion had been brought forward again, and repeated the objection he made a year ago, that they would thereby lose the interest and support of Trustees in the Manchester district, and would not get an adequate meeting in Oxford.

Mr. JOHN DENDY pointed to the attendance at that meeting as proof that the desire among Trustees in the north to keep the annual meeting in Manchester was not very keen.

The Rev. V. D. DAVIS said that the College at Oxford was clearly the right place for the annual meeting; but that in order to maintain the interest of supporters they ought to hold special meetings as well, not in Manchester only, but in all their chief centres; at such meetings, held for that special purpose, the Principal and other trusted representatives of the College should have the opportunity of speaking of the ideal of the College and its work, and thus bring it into close touch with our people throughout the country.

The Rev. C. J. STREET said that in that matter at least he was conservative, and felt that something ought to be allowed to sentiment. He thought that the annual meeting should continue to be held in the city where the College was originally founded. If in future there was only one annual meeting of Trustees instead of two, when the administration of the College could be revised, it would concentrate still more power in the hands of a few. If that change were made he knew they would lose subscriptions.

The Rev. P. H. WICKSTEED said that it was far better to have one annual meeting for an effective checking of the administration of the College, because then they would make a more determined effort to be present and they would all be together at the one meeting, whereas when there were two, forces were divided, and often it was not possible to attend both meetings.

The Rev. C. HARGROVE supported the motion, and the CHAIRMAN, in putting it, said that as treasurer he was not in the least afraid. He thought better of the Trustees than to suppose that any of them would withdraw their subscriptions on such a ground.

The resolution was passed by 27 to 13.

A vote of thanks to the chairman brought the meeting to a close.

THE MARTINEAU MEMORIAL.

SIR,—We feel sure that your readers, so many of whom have shown deep interest in the Norwich Martineau Memorial, will like to know the result of the postponed meeting of the Octagon Chapel Committee last evening.

A most difficult task confronted them: It will be seen by the subscription list given on another page, that £877 of the £1,300 appealed for in your issue of December 1, 1906, has now been subscribed, leaving £423 of that sum still uncontributed. In arriving at a decision, the Committee felt bound to look at this uncontributed sum as a temporary addition to the £500 which the congregation has recently undertaken to raise, which addition, until contributed, would saddle the congregation with a total debt of £923, plus architect's fees.

They had therefore before them, on the one hand, the fear of crushing the spirit of the congregation by a too-long-lasting effort to pay off their debt, with the current interest thereon; and on the other, the intense discouragement to all concerned, but especially to Sunday School teachers and scholars, which abandonment of the present plans would mean. They had also to take into account the emphatically expressed desire of a large number of those who have contributed since the appeal of December 1 (many of these sending gifts or promises for the second, third, and even fourth and fifth times) that the present plans should be adhered to.

This, then, being their position, the Committee felt themselves justified in hoping that there still remains a sufficiently large fund of unexhausted generosity to warrant their decision to carry out the published plans. This decision they are accordingly commending to the congregation. They trust that in so doing they are showing, not only their sense of the widespread sympathy hitherto shown by contributors with their earnest desire to carry on the work inaugurated by Dr. Martineau, but also their desire to preserve the character of the buildings as a Martineau memorial.

TOWARDS SOCIAL REFORM.

COLLECTIVE OWNERSHIP—ITS ETHICAL SIGNIFICANCE.

THE facts upon which Mr. Richard Robinson bases his hopes of ethical advance resulting from the extension of Socialism cannot be disputed. The public ownership of certain public services has developed among us, as he truly says, "the capacity for ethical influence of a refining kind" which may reach even the humblest municipal worker.

The outcome of further developments may, however, be legitimately disputed; and Mr. Richard Simon has placed before your readers, in a forcible and concentrated form, the criticisms of collectivism which, curiously enough, are made by the representatives of Benthamism in common with the Liberty and Property Defence League. Exception may be taken to many of the criticisms of Mr. Simon on the ground that they are unsupported assertions. Such phrases as "The bureaucrat is, necessarily, sterile," are found, when tested by experience, to be untrue; and "Only in the free air of individual competition can the mind and work of man grow" is a sentence springing doubtless from the heart of the writer, rather than from his reasoning faculty. To contradict the bald assertion of the "sterility" of municipal and national servants, one has but to point to the multitude of improvements in telegraphy made by the operators in the Government service; and to the numerous devices for safety in the municipal tramway service adopted during the last year or two, mainly invented by municipal officials. (Two of these have been adopted in Liverpool since the beginning of the present year.) Numerous similar instances of the fertility of the "bureaucrat" can be cited. To invalidate the sonorous proclamation of the unique growing powers of the "free air of individual competition," it is only necessary to show that the air of competition is by no means fresh or free, but fetid and stifling to the last degree. The atmosphere of "free competition" is the atmosphere of the shambles and the battle-field; the carcases of those who have failed and fallen pollute the air; their blood cries out to us for a better order of society. Competition undoubtedly develops the heroes of the cotton exchange and the stock-market, but Mr. Simon will surely not contend that these are the highest types of humanity! It is arguable that the qualities of mind and heart which render success in competition impossible—unselfishness, generosity, altruism—are qualities which the religious man is bound to respect. In "business" we dismiss them from our thoughts, we shrug our shoulders, we call the man who possesses them a fool, and we repeat that parrot-like formula, which at once excuses and condemns our lower morality—"Business is business."

A large part of Mr. Simon's article is an indictment of representative government, and one is bound to admit that that institution is by no means perfect. It is, however, an advance upon absolute monarchy and upon oligarchy. By and by we may discover something better. Meantime, if representative government is admittedly an improvement, it is difficult to see the force of Mr. Simon's plea for the retention of absolutism in industry. Individual ownership and control in the world of material production and distribution are analogous to absolutism in political government. Socialism or collectivism advances the type of industrial organisation, and brings it into line with representative political government.

Mr. Simon suggests that the State "annexes" an undertaking when it has been brought to a certain pitch of financial success by private enterprise. Precisely the opposite of this is the fact.

If Mr. Simon will examine the records he will find that the State has, in most cases, come to the rescue of a drowning undertaking and saved its life. We have, especially in the earlier instances, nationalised and municipalised in despair of obtaining a service reasonably cheap and efficient from private enterprise. This was the case in the "annexing" of the telegraphs, of the water supplies, of the making of roads and sewers, of the building of workmen's dwellings, and other enterprises. It is the chief argument to-day in favour of national railways.

But a comparison of the respective "incentives to industry" under the two systems should give us a ready test of their relative ethical qualities. Neither can be wholly bad or wholly good; but a calm comparison of the advantages and disadvantages of the two should help us to decide whether the transition should be retarded or welcomed. We have now so many examples in this country of the collectivist method, that a comparison with private enterprise is reasonably possible, and we may with safety proceed to deduce from the operations going on about us the general ethical principle underlying each form of industrial and commercial organisation. On the one hand we have "personal gain" as the outstanding motive which keeps the organism going; on the other hand the corresponding motive is "public service." It is personal gain that leads, under individualism, to the establishment of an industry, to the building of ships, to the making of railways, to the running to and fro of men and women busy in the production of wealth. We do not ask or expect people to embark upon any enterprise which will not "pay." The burden of every prospectus is the probability of a return to those who may adventure their money in a new concern. So certain were the old economists that personal gain was the one supreme incentive to production, that they placed it first in order of importance in the elementary propositions of the science of political economy: "That every man desires to obtain additional wealth with as little sacrifice as possible" (Senior's "Political Economy," page 26). This principle, practically triumphant in our present society, exalts the making of wealth to the chief place among human duties and responsibilities. One after another the restraints of Christian teaching have been thrown aside, until we have gradually come to tolerate the evils resulting from the struggle for commercial existence and supremacy. The discharge of large numbers of workmen in times of depression is not condemned, because we all recognise that to retain them in employment at a loss to the employer is unbusiness-like and leads to bankruptcy. A device for the saving of life in mines or factories, or on the railways or ships, depends for its adoption not upon its efficacy, but upon its cheapness and non-interference with the profit-making efficiency of the undertaking. The proof of this lies in the fact that such devices need to be forced upon "private enterprise" by legal enactment, inspection, and heavy penalties. The ethics of private enterprise permit us to purchase the labour of our fellow-creatures at the lowest market rate without regard to their comfort, health, or character, and equally without regard to social consequences. The market takes its upward or downward course utterly regardless of the desolated homes of factory operatives or coal-miners. The human factor counts for little with the "bulls" and "bears." In some vague and only half understood way the public good may be occasionally subserved by private enterprise. Nothing can be wholly bad. But the "spring of action," the causing and directing principle stands forth plainly revealed as the self-regarding motive, "personal gain." Whatever of good has issued from the war of conflicting private interests must be regarded as incidental and secondary.

The ethical basis of collectivism, on the contrary, regards the personal gain of the individual as an incidental and secondary good. It aims only indirectly (if I may say so) at the benefit of the individual. "Socialism maintains that industrial operations should be made subservient to human good; and that the moral law should control the relations of business and the whole field of human action every day in the week" (Kirkup's "Inquiry into Socialism," page 132). Should the collectivist motive, the public welfare, ultimately triumph, it must obviously operate to remove many economic evils which now oppress us. It cares more for efficiency of service than for the accumulation of huge fortunes; It regards "unemployment" as a social waste instead of a temporary saving of expenditure; low wages become under it a social loss, destructive of well-being, instead of a means to larger profit. The collectivist is able to point, in confirmation of these expectations, to the acknowledged greater efficiency of public undertakings over private businesses of similar character; to the greater security of employment, and the advantages of wages, hours, holidays, medical attendance and pensions, which public service affords, and to the deeper sense of public duty which the rapid extension of collectivist industry has undoubtedly created.

Most of these contentions are admitted by Mr. Simon when he speaks of the pride of our officials in the work they have accomplished, and when he suggests that the better wages and conditions of public service have attracted a better class of men. I need not fill your space with instances in support of the argument. I am concerned in proving the contention that the failure of private enterprise to provide a satisfactory social construction, and the admitted superiority of collectivism in this respect, are not mere accidents or unconnected circumstances. They are due to the disparity of the ethical motives animating the respective systems. From a society based on personal gain we may expect poorer ethical results, than from a social order founded upon the higher motive of public well-being.

"Considered as a principle and theory of social and economic life, Socialism," says Thomas Kirkup in the work already quoted, "is marked by the entire harmony and even identity of its moral spirit with that of Christianity."

Liverpool.

JOHN EDWARDS.

SIR,—If the good motives of its advocates were a guarantee of the soundness of its claims, Collective Ownership would be justified. "State" ownership of all the instruments of production, distribution, and exchange involves State ownership of person as well as property. Make the minority so far dependent on the State—a dependence only to be avoided by starvation or emigration—and one can easily conceive some of the consequences that would inevitably follow. Those who had not aggressed on the equal liberty of others would be reduced from the ranks of men to the position of tools. Conformity would be at a premium and dissent at a terrible discount. Those appointed by the majority to rule would possess enormous power; but the minority would, in the same degree, suffer the loss of self-direction. And yet those ruled, those denied the ownership of a printing machine, must labour for their oppressors! Why should such a relationship, so pregnant with mischief, so prolific of party strife, so destructive of ability, so favourable to stagnation—be set up between one party and another in the community? Poverty is no justification of compulsory collectivism. "Force is no remedy," but Christianity is. Not by making us all dependent on the State, but by the increase of self-rule, and voluntary association will social reform produce social betterment.

UNION FOR SOCIAL SERVICE.

THE public meeting held in the Memorial Hall, Manchester (in one of the lower rooms) on Wednesday evening, January 16, by the National Conference Union for Social Service, made, as the President, the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed said, a quiet and modest beginning in the work to which the Union has set itself. The meeting cannot have numbered more than 60 or 70, and certainly was not fully representative of the strength of the churches in the Manchester district: It was, however, amply justified by the spirit which pervaded the gathering and the earnest purpose of all that was said.

The PRESIDENT having expressed the great regret of the Rev. Joseph Wood, President of the National Conference, that illness prevented him from being present as he had hoped, made a statement as to the purpose of their Union.

No churches, he said, drawn together for religious fellowship and the strengthening of religious life, could now ignore social claims: The conception of the church as not only primarily but exclusively concerned with a man's own personal attitude to eternal things and his own personal morality, was one impossible for any reflecting being to hold to-day; the conception of society as an organism had sunk too deeply into their consciousness for that. It was more and more felt that the life of any church or spiritual fellowship, not only might, but must bear directly upon those larger questions of collective responsibility which so vitally affected the well-being of the people. Indeed, this was really involved in the personal conception of religion itself; for the primary function of the church and of religion must be to adjust the perspective of life and impress on men the relative importance of things, which under the stress of practical life were apt to fall into the background. Practical life impressed on us the urgency of bread-winning and of family claims; the Church declared that other things were even more important, and tried to make us feel that they were more urgent also. If it succeeded, it would, by the same act, lift us above the personal and into the social conception of life, and make the claims of social duty and social love as urgent as those of commercial success.

The churches had always recognised this in a measure, and in this social Union he thought they should begin by seeing how far they could be helpful to the churches in the things they were already doing. Wherever they were to end, they must begin where they were. In the Sunday school, in Bands of Hope and Mercy, for instance, all should feel a stimulating and directing power from that Union representing the collective force of the churches. But there were also many other ways in which they might help. He knew from his own experience that both in town and country, people were often brought into contact with evils provided against by law, and because they did not know the law, and by what means it could be set in action, were inclined, under the plea of ignorance, to let things alone. They as a society might be able to help people who were ready to move in such cases and take away the excuse of ignorance from others.

Further, they should encourage study of the housing question, and drink and other matters, and make the churches quiet, unassuming educative influences; preparing an enlightened public opinion to guide, to criticise, and to support the efforts of statesmen. Their organisation, though not sectarian, was domestic, but their goal was public.

If they could make themselves effective in supporting and helping people in what they already wanted to do, they would soon become influential in extending both the will and the power to do social work; but they could not guide, stimulate, and awake public opinion unless they were themselves already felt as an effective power in well-doing. They must build up for themselves a representative position, getting into connection at every point with the churches, meeting the demands for help, and then developing the work still further.

Then, in time, they might find that their body of churches was doing some kind of pioneer work in social, public, and moral reform, worthy of the noble traditions and opportunities which their freedom from official restraint, their heritage of liberty and love of truth ought to put within their reach:

The Rev. H. D. ROBERTS, of Liverpool, told of the work which had been done by the Hope-street Church Social Study Circle. For a year they had taken Hobson's "Social Problem" as their subject of study, and then felt they must do something. The result had been the public meeting on the Sweated Labour of Women and Girls, a report of which recently appeared in these columns. Since then, Mr. Roberts said, it had taken him an hour a day to answer the letters which came in, either making inquiries or giving information on the subject of their meeting. That showed that they had really succeeded in moving public opinion, and other results had followed.

Miss M. C. GITTINS answered the objection that in trying to better social conditions they were weakening character. That objection surely showed a want of faith in the Divine government, and in the divinity of man, which should be the guiding principle of their church life. She told of the experience of a holiday school they had organised at Leicester, and how some of the sceptics had been astonished by the amount of natural goodness displayed by the children: They had tried in that school to let the children have the joy of work; and that was what they should try for in the wider field, for all men and women, to make and not to mar noble character. On the subject of labour, she urged them to read the report of the Belgian Government on the sweating in the clothing industries, which showed how impossible was any true and noble life under such conditions. They must not relax their efforts to educate people in such subjects. They must be awakened to the needs of others and the desire for some means to satisfy them, so that when the time came, as come it must in this generation or the next, when they would have to share their inheritance with the disinherited, they would be ready to do it gladly and not grudgingly.

Miss H. M. JOHNSON spoke of the great importance of temperance work as affecting the health and happiness of the people. She dwelt especially on the enormous economic waste of their present drinking habits, and urged serious attention to this. It was not only the drink bill, as marking a stupendous unproductive expenditure, and all the waste of crime and lunacy and death which resulted, which people ought to be made to realise, but there was also the sober man's drink bill to be reckoned out, what he had to pay in the heavy burden of rates, due to excessive police and prison requirements and other things the great proportion of which was solely due to the evils of drink. She spoke with warm commendation of Miss Catherine Drummond's pamphlet, "An Outline of the Temperance Question," published (for 3d.) by the C.E.T.S., and urged its study by all who desired reliable information and guidance in this matter.

The Rev. CHARLES PEACH said there could be no question of greater importance than that Miss Johnson had spoken of, for if they had a sober manhood they could appeal with hope to the people, and they would settle the other questions for themselves: Some of them thought that the kindred subject of vegetarianism went no less to the root of social progress. Even in that season of prosperous trade they had evidence that there was really a body of the unemployed in their midst, when on Christmas Day when the snow came, 1,000 men were found ready to turn out in the night to sweep the snow at 5d. an hour, while on Boxing Day there were 3,000 so engaged; and he pictured by way of contrast a city in which, under such circumstances, appeal could be made to the young men of the community, and they would turn out and do that work, for love of their city. They had yet to learn what might be done by collective power in a great city, to make it beautiful and noble, with a large common life.

Mr. COUNCILLOR WIGLEY also spoke, emphasising the great opportunity there was in Sunday-school work, and a vote of thanks to the President, moved by Mr. Fletcher Robinson and seconded by Mr. Richard Robinson, brought the meeting to a close.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

NORTH MIDLANDS.

THE "New Theology" has interested the North Midlands no less than other districts. The attitude of certain men towards this movement seems to be taking curious and incalculable forms. From unexpected quarters some cheap and unworthy gibes have been directed against it. But Dr. Forsyth's attitude could have been easily anticipated. As might have been expected, he pontificates at large, and, in the name of a "theology of grace," writes many ungracious things.

From the Olympian heights of theological superiority he condescends to instruct the readers of the Tribune in its issue of last Tuesday. As an illustration of the scorn and pride of the expert, it would be difficult, if not impossible, to find anything to match his concluding paragraph. Here it is: "Finally, I think we should, in the main, agree that theologians are entitled to be heard on questions of theology. And I will allow myself to add that some popular attempts at theology are like a bad photograph—under-developed and over-exposed."

And I will "allow myself" further to add that although you may be able to refute an argument you cannot refute a sneer; and, indeed, the Principal of Hackney Theological College seems to be well aware of this.

It is to be regretted that a few Unitarians—not the most representative, I believe—are lending themselves to small-minded abuse of the movement, which is entirely on liberal and progressive lines. It must be admitted that there has been no small amount of irritating provocation. The "Anerley men" have shown a touching and affecting solicitude to patent or copyright the movement (of which we are judiciously informed a certain paper is the organ) and to repudiate all connection with Unitarianism. This has led to some strained attempts to make artificial distinctions between the New Theology and the Liberal Christianity of our own churches. The consequence has been that more than once in the course of this controversy writers and speakers have misrepresented and caricatured Unitarianism. Mr. Campbell himself, to his honour be it said, does not seem to have had any hand in this. So far as my observation goes—and I have tried to watch the movement closely—his own undistorted references to Unitarianism have been scrupulously just; and if this be so, it ought to be generously acknowledged by us. After all, it cannot be easy for him to be perfectly fair to us, when attempts are being made on all hands to prejudice the public against his views by calling them Unitarian. He has been candid and courageous enough to say that from his point of view "the old issue between Unitarianism and Trinitarianism simply ceases to exist; we do not need the names." What more can we reasonably expect him to say? For my own part, I heartily agree with him on this particular point, and so do many Unitarians who prefer to call themselves Free Christians or Free Catholics. If the name Trinitarian is definitely abandoned we may consent to drop the name Unitarian; and whatever merely doctrinal differences still remain between us, we may unite forces in a Free Catholic Christianity and let the dead of all the sects bury their dead while we preach the larger and more comprehensive Gospel. I earnestly hope that Mr. Campbell will resolutely refuse to be driven from this position by uncharitable remarks, whether made by Unitarians or Trinitarians.

What concerns me far more is another issue. I fear that the rock on which the New Theology may split is the moral question. I do not think it is consistent with the highest ethics for representatives of this movement to remain in doctrinally trust-bound chapels. If they plead justification, it seems to me the Broad Churchmen in the Anglican Communion and the Liberal Catholics in the Roman Communion must be held innocent. The difficulties from our point of view must not, however, be minimised. Some Continental (and indeed some English) theologians who have appeared on the platform of our International Conference are entangled in the meshes of the same ethical problem, but we have hitherto refrained from passing censure upon them: We should be at least equally lenient with the New Theology men: But, even so, I hope that the more heroic part will before long be taken by all these representatives of the broader faith and that they will seek for themselves a really free pulpit: The "unrest in the Churches"—and outside the Churches—not only gives us our opportunity, but lays upon us a special charge. Dr. Harald Höffding, in his remarkable "Philosophy of Religion," has said that "the importance which, notwithstanding all historical, philosophical and ethical criticism, the Church persists in attaching to dogma brings her into opposition with herself, in her mission as a great educational and philanthropic spiritual force: For it is an illusion to believe that she can maintain any lasting predominance over the masses when once the true state of the case as to the basis of the development and the practical significance of dogmas has become a matter of general knowledge: It often looks to a spectator as though the Church was staking her all in a game which is already and obviously lost: The intellectual discord brought about by dogmatic beliefs is making itself felt in increasingly larger circles." The emergence of the New Theology is a capital instance of the truth of this observation: But a mere theology, new or old, is impotent to remove this difficulty: We need a sterner sense of the obligations of honour and veracity: As the same distinguished philosopher says, "There is here only one natural solution. : : : viz., absolute freedom of teaching, so that personal integrity and intellectual honesty may come by their own rights: The laity will then have to choose for themselves and will divide on the lines of this choice. Freedom of teaching, the right of which is at present only admitted by the highest scientific institutions, must be extended to all places and to all institutions where men are addressed on spiritual matters: What we want is opportunity to see with our own eyes, and to make our own experiences: But how is this to be attained if such opportunity is not even afforded to the teacher?"

Here, then, we must still find a distinctive and important mission that ought to challenge our best enthusiasm:

In the North Midland district we are, I believe, alive to this opportunity: Our churches are quite as vigorous as they have ever been at any time within the half-a-dozen years of my acquaintance with them: It is true that this is not saying much; but when one hears public laments among some of the great orthodox bodies that they are actually losing ground, it is some comfort to be able to say that we are at least not going back. In one case a distinct advance may be recorded: An interesting movement has been organised at Coalville—a colliery district between Leicester and Burton: I visited the place last Sunday. The group of friends there are prominently associated with the Adult School, are animated by a fine spirit, and have already done much to educate the thought of the town: If only they can sustain their efforts for a few years their enterprise ought to be rewarded by the building of a new church:

The Rev. W. H. Burgess is doing splendid work, not only as minister of Loughborough and Ilkeston, but as the Hon. Sec. of the Lay Preachers' Union: It is impossible to praise too highly the services of the lay preachers who are giving ungrudging and acceptable assistance to many of our congregations.

Our district has recently welcomed a small invasion of new ministers—the Rev. Hermann Thomas at Leicester, the Rev. Hugon S. Tayler at Chesterfield, the Rev. F. Heming Vaughan at Mansfield, and the Rev. Ellison A. Voysey at Northampton: Christ Church (Nottingham) and Newark are still vacant: Lincoln, to the regret of all who have our cause most deeply at heart, remains closed: The local trustees, who are in a majority, refuse to move in the matter until accumulations from the large endowment enable them to pay off a debt on the chapel: Their action is deplored by the Association and by the non-resident trustees, and is far from being in accordance with what those who opportunely intervened in certain local difficulties anticipated would be the reward of their good offices:

Both congregations at Leicester now provide Pleasant Evenings for Women, and these efforts, from all that one hears, are extraordinarily successful and might happily be repeated elsewhere.

The Friar Gate congregation at Derby has recently gone to considerable expense in extending and improving their premises, and a successful bazaar was recently held to clear off the debt incurred. The proceedings were, however, overshadowed by the death of Mr. S. D. Hall, whose loss is profoundly felt not only in Derby but throughout our whole district.

Here, at the High Pavement, we are in excellent spirits. Thanks to the great generosity and deep attachment of our members, the "Cathedral of the North Midlands" has recently adorned herself in many beautiful ways, and looks more handsome than ever. We keep adding a few fresh names to our membership, and altogether we have every reason to be in good heart.

I will conclude by inviting visitors to Nottingham to come and see Mr. Henry Holiday's small but exquisitely lovely window in commemoration of the Centenary of the Sunday-school and Mr. Nelson Dawson's beautifully executed memorial to Richard Acland Armstrong.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Bootle.—The Rev. J. Morley Mills preached on Sunday week, in the Free Church, an earnest sermon on the subject of infant mortality, of which a full summary appeared in the Bootle Times of January 18. Mr. Mills pointed to the more effective means taken for the care of children in such German cities as Leipzig and Elberfeld, and referred in conclusion to the Social Problem Circle, which meets on Sunday afternoon in the lower hall of his church for the study of such questions.

Brighton.—The annual scholars' party was held on January 16. The lecture hall was filled by children and their parents and friends, when, after tea and games, the prizes were distributed, and a performance admirably given by some of the scholars, under the direction of their teachers. Miss Boys, who distributed the prizes, spoke with feeling of her retirement from the active work of teaching in the Sunday-school, after more than twenty-two years of continuous service. A presentation was made to her by one of the elder girls of her class, on behalf of the scholars and teachers of the school, as a small token of regard, and of remembrance of her long and faithful devotion to the welfare of the school. Mr. Thompson, her oldest fellow-teacher, and the Rev. Priestley Prime, the minister of the church, expressed the regret of all concerned at the loss of Miss Boys' services as teacher, appreciation of her long and earnest service, and satisfaction that she had consented to retain the offices of secretary and treasurer.

Cardiff (West Grove).—The annual Christmas treat for the Sunday-school children was held on Wednesday, January 9. After tea, which was ably superintended by Mrs. Moore, the children were entertained by some very interesting limelight views, Mr. J. E. Barnard and Mr. E. Baker manipulating the lantern, whilst Mrs. Barnard gave descriptive readings. During intervals the children gave recitations, songs, and duets. Mrs. Whitaker kindly presented the scholars with prizes for good attendance and conduct. Everyone present was presented with a motto card for 1907.

Chatham.—The Rev. J. Tyssul Davis returned home last Saturday, landing at Southampton from the R.M.S. Briton, after a pleasant voyage from Cape Town. He preached on Sunday, and on Thursday there was a congregational meeting to welcome him home.

Horsham.—The children of the Free Christian Church School had their annual winter party on Thursday, January 10. They assembled in the chapel at 6 o'clock, sang their New Year hymns, and listened to a brief address from the Rev. J. J. Martin; and the prizes for regular attendance and good conduct, of which there was a record number (24), were distributed by Mrs. Martin. In the course of the evening a dramatic performance of "The Unambitious Queen," by the Rev. H. W. Hawkes, was successfully given.

Liverpool: Ullet-road.—At a meeting of the Rathbone Literary Club on January 17, Mr. Harding A. Roberts gave a lecture on Edmund Burke, and, after a brief biographical introduction, dealt with three of the leading features of Burke's public policy, the American Colonies, the impeachment of Warren Hastings, and the French Revolution. Posterity had fully justified Burke's policy regarding America and India, but not so fully regarding France. The Rev. J. Collins Odgers presided, and a cordial vote of thanks was passed to the lecturer.

London: Bermondsey.—The thirteenth anniversary meeting of the Band of Hope and Mercy was held on Thursday, the 17th inst., when 84 children and 34 parents and friends were present. The Superintendent (Mr. A. W. Harris) presided, and was able to report steady progress during 1906, especially in the interest shown by the children in the meetings, and the good discipline maintained. Brief addresses of congratulation and encouragement were given by Mr. R. T. Berdinner (Southwark B. H. Union), Mr. J. C. Pain (a past president), Mr. Neil L. Henry (U.K.B.H.U.), Rev. Frederic Allen (Chairman N.U.T.A.), Mr. W. J. Noel (Stratford), Mr. Jesse Hipperson (minister and president), and Mrs. R. Whitmore Cox, who also distributed 44 medals and prizes won for regular attendance and good conduct. Hymns and melodies were heartily sung, and solos and recitations given by members during the evening.

London: Brixton.—Several pleasant gatherings have marked the opening of the New Year. On Thursday, January 10, tea and entertainment were given to the senior Sunday scholars. On the following evening the younger scholars were entertained. The annual prize distribution took place on Sunday afternoon, January 13, in the church. The service was conducted by the Rev. F. W. Stanley, after which Mr. John Harrison gave the prizes gained by good marks for conduct and attendance to thirty-four scholars. Mr. Harrison and Mr. Abraham (superintendent) briefly addressed the young people. At the conclusion of the service Mr. Harrison kindly presented each of the teachers with a copy of the new edition of the Sunday-school code book. On the following evening Mrs. Stanley's mothers' meeting had its New Year's party.

London: Limehouse.—The annual New Year parties of the Sunday-schools were held at Durning Hall, on Thursday and Friday, January 10 and 11. On both evenings the hall was filled with merry, expectant children, who thoroughly enjoyed their substantial tea, and later the distribution of medals and prizes for punctuality and regular attendance. Miss Shawcross, representing Lady Durning Lawrence, came down on Thursday, the principal evening, and presented the medals and prizes.

Manchester: Heaton Moor.—On Friday week the Rev. T. P. Spedding delivered an illustrated lecture, entitled "With the Unitarian Van: The Story of a Summer Campaign in 1906." The lecture was illustrated with between sixty and seventy specially prepared lantern slides, consisting of views gathered on the journey, and a number of special photographs of the van.

Newcastle-on-Tyne.—On Wednesday, Jan. 9, the following note appeared in the Newcastle Daily Chronicle:—"Many Novocastrians have heard of the resignation of the Rev. Frank Walters, the eloquent minister of the Church of the Divine Unity in New Bridge-street, with genuine regret. His ministry will terminate in April, the end of the 22nd year of his pastorate in Newcastle. Mr. Walters has been a real educational force in our city. He has been much more than a minister of religion. By his lectures on Shakespeare and other literary subjects he has done much to develop an interest in elevating studies, and his pulpit teaching has been of the sort which appealed not only to Unitarians but to the adherents of other religious denominations, and, indeed, to all who are engaged in the serious quest of truth. In short, Newcastle and the neighbourhood are under a deep obligation to Mr. Walters, who, though its growth may not have been obtrusively obvious, has doubtless sown much seed that has borne good fruit."

Newport, Mon.—A well attended social gathering of members and friends was held on Thursday evening, January 17, in the Charles-street Church. An excellent musical programme was much enjoyed, and a series of electrical experiments by Mr. G. H. Llewellyn were followed with great interest. Everybody present agreed that the Social was the most successful yet held by the Church.

North Cheshire Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The quarterly meeting was held at Denton, on Saturday last, about 130 persons being present. After tea Miss Dorman, the vice-president, took the chair, the president, Rev. B. C. Constable, being absent through illness. Rev. Jenkyn Thomas, the newly settled minister at Glossop, was welcomed into the Union. Miss Dorman then called upon the Rev. W. Harrison to present to Mr. Slater, in recognition of the completion of twenty years' service as hon. secretary, during which he had never missed a meeting, an illuminated address, bound in album form, and containing a list of the present officers of the affiliated schools, and a list of the officers of the union from its commencement. The address was accompanied by a splendid fish set, in an oak case. After the presentation and acknowledgment, an interesting paper was read by Rev. H. E. Perry, of Denton, on "The Personal Element in Sunday-schools and Theological Teaching," followed by a discussion, in which part was taken by Revs. W. Harrison, H. B. Smith, W. G. Price, E. C. Evans, and Messrs. R. Firth and W. Woodall. Mr. Perry replied, and votes of thanks to the reader, to the Denton friends, and to Miss Dorman responded to, and followed by the Evening Hymn and benediction, closed the evening.

Norwich.—The Octagon Chapel was almost full on Sunday evening last—over 400 adults being present—when the Rev. Alfred Hall preached on the New Theology. During the months of November and December Mr. Hall delivered a course of five sermons on Unitarian doctrine, when the average attendance was 300. On Thursday, the 17th inst., Mr. and Mrs. A. M. Stevens invited the Sunday-school teachers to a party at the institute. Through the generous hospitality displayed and careful preparation of the programme a capital evening was spent. The occasion was taken to bid farewell to Mr. C. Finch, the secretary of the boys' school, and Mr. H. May, treasurer of the schools, who are about to sail for Western Australia. Mr. H. F. Euren, a faithful member of the Octagon, has just retired from his position as editor of the Norwich Mercury, one of the oldest papers in the country. He has been connected with the paper 43 years, and has been editor 33 years.

Portsmouth.—A musical and dramatic entertainment was given on Wednesday afternoon, January 16, in the Sandringham Hall, Southsea, in aid of the funds of the John Pounds Girls' Home, by some well known Southsea amateurs. The hall was crowded, and the entertainment a great success. It is hoped that about £15 will be handed over to the treasurer. Since last March thirty girls have been received into the Home, and afterwards placed out in service.

Trowbridge.—On Monday evening, in the Conigre Chapel schoolroom, the Rev. W. G. Tarrant commenced his lecturing tour in the West of England. The subject was "The Land Jesus Lived in," illustrated by lime-light views. Nearly 80 slides were presented, giving very beautiful pictures of the familiar scenes in the life, teachings, and wanderings of Christ, which were described by the lecturer in a simple, graphic manner, much to the interest of all present. A hearty vote of thanks was accorded the lecturer on the motion of the Rev. J. Wain, seconded by Mr. E. Taylor. There were over 200 people present.

Wakefield.—On Sunday week about ninety prizes for good conduct and regular attendance were distributed to the scholars connected with the Westgate Chapel Unitarian Sunday-schools, by Mr. Fred. Clayton, of the Mill Hill Sunday-schools, Leeds. It was a source of regret that the Rev. A. Chalmers was absent through indisposition, the service being conducted by Mr. Watkins, a student at the H.M.C., Manchester.

York.—The Rev. Frank Ballard has been giving three lectures in York under the auspices of the Evangelical Free Church Council, and local ministers were invited to be present and to discuss the lectures. But all that was allowed was that questions might be handed up on paper to the lecturer, to be answered. On Sunday last the Rev. R. H. Greaves preached to a crowded congregation in St. Saviour-gate Chapel, criticising Mr. Ballard's first lecture, and he is to continue the process for two more Sunday evenings.

Yorkshire Unitarian Club.—The next meeting of the club will be held on Saturday February 2, 1907, in the Chapel-lane Schools, Town Hall-square, Bradford. The afternoon business meeting will be followed by tea, and then at seven o'clock there will be a joint meeting of the club and the Chapel-lane congregation, at which the Rev. T. P. Spedding, founder of the Van Mission and the newly appointed field agent of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, will deliver the "Van Lecture" with lantern illustrations.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Supplement to this week's INQUIRER will be found to contain much interesting information as to the coming meeting in Boston, Mass. (Sept. 22-27), of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers.

WE are desirous to warn our readers against responding to appeals for money emanating from the Khasi Hills and also from Madras. Before making any response, inquiries should be addressed to the Foreign Mission Sub-Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

Two events have been looming before those who are interested in the course of politics in other countries. One of these, the Transvaal election, is still undecided; the other, the election for the German Reichstag will not, it is true, be completed until the second ballots have taken place, but the results so far to hand are sufficient to enable us to perceive its general significance. The elections of Friday week provided a dramatic surprise. Everybody anticipated that the Social Democrats would certainly hold their own, and probably increase their membership. They have done neither, but on the contrary have lost heavily, and it seems impossible that they can return with more than two-thirds of their eighty-one representatives in the late Reichstag. This is the first set-back the "Reds" have suffered since they became a large political party. At the same time, it does not appear that they have to any extent lost votes in the country. It is their relative position that is altered.

THE altered composition of the Reichstag gives rise to several reflections. The Centre or Catholic party has fully maintained its position, and will still more than heretofore be the most powerful single group. At present the Kaiser's Government is sharply hostile to the Catholics, but votes are votes, and though they do not count for very much in Germany—still they count. Before long we may expect the church political to obtain its revenge in a stricter hold over the German Court. The result of the election, again, is a sanction for "spirited foreign policy." The Social Democrats were a peace party, and consistently opposed the excessive military and naval armaments of the Empire. This restraining influence was not very great, for the Kaiser is his own war lord; such as it is it has been weakened. The result may be felt at the new Hague Conference, which is shortly to assemble.

IN the widespread interest excited by Rev. J. R. Campbell's "New Theology," less attention than it deserves has been given to his recent sermon on "Christianity and Collectivism," which is fully reported in the British Congregationalist of January 17, and which has given rise to two notable articles in the Labour Leader by Mr. Keir Hardie, M.P., and Mr. Campbell respectively. Mr. Campbell's condemnation of the competitive system is perhaps ampler and more definite than the enunciation of his positive doctrine of a Christian collectivism; although, in the course of the sermon, he suggested that he had had promptings to join hands with the labour men in their political battle. So much is this so, that only a sense of having his life work already marked out for him holds him back from throwing in his lot with these "Pioneers of the Golden Age." What he pleads for is the realisation of the Christian ideal as it has existed from the first, and specifically, some form of collectivism in the place of competition; a new ordering of society, not to be suddenly imposed from without, but a natural development from within, which shall truly express the spirit of brotherhood among men.

THE wisest, and, to our mind, the noblest thing that has been written in connection with the "New Theology" controversy, is this letter of Dr. Horton's, which appeared in last Saturday's Daily News :—

Sir,—I should personally have been glad if this subject had not been thrown into the cauldron of newspaper controversy; but the eminence of my friend Mr. Campbell compels public attention, and, no doubt, justifies the course which journals are taking. And it is no small debt that the Church owes to Mr. Campbell, that he has managed to make the whole country, and the Press, secular and religious, take an interest in the ultimate problems of theology.

When most of us are conscious how we speak and preach and write without causing a ripple of interest on the smooth waters of the society in which we live, we ought to be thankful for the gifted soul and the eloquent mouth which can at least make a nation turn its head and ask what is going on in the Church. For it must be remembered that Mr. Campbell has not attracted attention by announcing a new theology, but his new theology has attracted attention because it was his.

Now, what I beg leave to say in your columns is this: Whatever may be the final value of Mr. Campbell's teaching, he is himself so fresh, so candid, so earnest, so convinced, that he may justly claim the patience and attention of his brethren in the ministry. All that is best and wisest in Congregationalism will accord him a sympathy and forbearance which may enable him to develop his thought without the distortions of controversy. If he were a Catholic, he would, no doubt, be taken to task; if he were a Presbyterian or a Methodist, he would be judged, and possibly condemned. But he is a Congregationalist, and the whole genius of that system is liberty and patience, and the undying conviction that "the Lord has yet more light and truth to break forth from His Word." We are not going to preclude our new light and truth by the ignorant prejudice and clamour which always try to silence or to persecute the original voices, the fresh truths which are God's new Messiahs. If Mr. Campbell is wrong, free ventilation of his views, brotherly sympathy with him, and affectionate prayer for him will bring him right. If he is right, if he is coming, like Amos from the fields and the herds, untrammelled with the theology of the schools, to speak the new truth which Christendom is failing and fainting for, what more terrible mistake could Christian men make than to discourage, wound, and perhaps kill, this man of God, as the Pharisees killed Our Lord?

One thing is clear to me. Mr. Campbell gets the ear of that large class of thoughtful and educated English people who do not go to church or hear preaching: These unsatisfied souls recognise in him an original preacher who is making the Christian Gospel credible to this age. If I were able to help these men and women—if I could honestly say that I meet their needs, and draw them to my church—I should feel justified in criticising my friend. But when I see that he is doing what I cannot do, reaching those whom I cannot reach, and bringing to Christ hundreds who will not listen to me, I can only pray God to bless him, and suspend my judgment in all humility upon the novel statement of the old truths until I have had time to examine and test it.

I deprecate with all my soul, not only the clamour against Mr. Campbell, but the party spirit and theological sectarianism which would throw us into two hostile camps—the Old Theology and the New. While nothing is harder than to reach truth in the shadowy spiritual realm, into which only fools rush with hasty confidence and dogmatism, nothing is easier than to make parties and schisms, and to excite the ignorant fanaticism of narrow minds. That is the worst and most fatal heresy of all.—Yours, &c.,

ROBERT F. HORTON:

Chesils, Hampstead, January 25, 1907:

“THE Word of God is not Bound” is the title of a sermon preached on Jan. 20, in All Souls’ Church, Belfast, by the Rev. W. H. Drummond, with reference to the Rev. R. J. Campbell and the New Theology, and printed by request of the congregation. An exclusive church and a finished creed, Mr. Drummond says, are “a strange commentary on the New Testament. They have led to the crimes of ecclesiastical persecution and the vices of dogmatic arrogance. But the Word of God is not bound. It ignores the special channels which men create for it, and the sacred limits which they prescribe. It works in individual hearts and small communities, which, according to every ecclesiastical theory, ought to be spiritually barren. The virtues of the heretic and his serene and unshaken trust are a constant challenge to the Church, which claims to possess in its sacraments the sole means of Christian grace, or in its creed a monopoly of Christian truth.” The real significance of the “New Theology” movement, he adds, is simply that another man has discovered that for him the Word of God is not bound, and has had the courage to announce his discovery.

HAVING pointed to the intolerable position of a living Church bound by the dead hand to a creed which thoughtful men can no longer believe, with a resulting atmosphere of unreality, and more than a suspicion of trimming and insincerity, and the happier position of those who belong to a genuinely free church, Mr. Drummond continues:—“Of the sketch of the New Theology that has appeared in the public press I shall not say much. It has far too little detail, it is much too undeveloped, possibly even in the mind of its originator, for clear treatment at present. Its guiding principle, on the positive side, is the immanence of God in the world and the life of God in the soul of man; and on the negative side, a plain disavowal of traditional dogmas, which are in conflict with this supreme truth, or which through lapse of time and progress in religious experience have lost their meaning and become useless. It is just here that Mr. Campbell has struck upon a line of his own and is likely to meet with strong opposition. He states clearly that the new teaching cannot be conveyed through the old forms. He breaks definitely with the attempt to establish a semi-orthodoxy. He proclaims the need of a religious faith which is on the one hand simpler, more human, closer to the realities of experience, and on the other without compromise and double meanings in its acceptance of the facts and methods of science and history. The significant thing is not anything new in the religious doctrines of which he has given us such an imperfect sketch, but the uncompromising challenge, which he has presented to others, to take sides with him in the plain rejection of a whole system of inherited dogmas, which he and they alike know that they no longer believe.”

LOOKING to the future, Mr. Drummond anticipates that when the “New Theology” shall have clearly articulated itself, “it will not be theirs nor ours, but a blending of the two in the higher unity of the Spirit.” And he concludes:—

“Dogmas decay; creeds die; party cries are forgotten. But the Spirit in man is immortal, impelling him ever upward towards clearer vision and nobler goodness. As yet we have grasped but a little of what Christianity is and may become. Fresh light streams forth continually from God’s everlasting revelation of Himself. The Gospel of Jesus Christ is rich in prophecy of growth and progress without limits.

‘These things shall be! a loftier race

Than e’er the world hath known shall rise,

With flame of freedom in their souls

And light of knowledge in their eyes.’

Humbly, gratefully, rejoicingly, let us remember that for us the Word of God is not bound, and let it be our prayer that other men, by whatever way Providence shall appoint for their steps, may enter with us into this glorious birthright of freedom.”

THE following letter from the Rev. J. H. Weatherall, of Bank-street Chapel, Bolton, appeared in the Manchester Guardian, of January 26:—

“In the report of the speech of the Bishop of Manchester which you give to-day one welcomes from him the declaration that ‘there are many things in the Church of England that need to be reformed.’ But the rest of his speech does not suggest that he is at all conscious what the form of reformation ought to be. May I suggest that it should be the organisation of devotion, not of belief? The spreading distrust of the Church of England in these days, and thence outward of all religious organisations, is the result of the conflict of the modern intellectual restatements of the realities of the religious life with the provincial theology of the sixteenth century formularies. The retention of those formularies, the requirement of subscription to them, the compulsion to iterate them in public worship,—these are the sources of unfaithfulness within and suspicion without the Church.

columns lately, is an illustration of the kind of thing that staggers the non-ecclesiastical mind which clings to the faith that religion and truth-speaking go together:—

“The Athanasian Creed has not been said in the ——— Parish Church for some time, but the Bishop of the diocese has given instructions that it shall be said in future, and the vicar (the Rev. ———) in the current parish magazine says he will comply. But he adds:—‘I beg that I personally may be dissociated from all participation in the recitation of the damnatory clauses. I absolutely disbelieve in the statements which they contain. It is not for me to close the open door of Heaven.’

“The Bishop suspects that not all Nonconformist preaching is in accordance with its trust deeds, but he will not make controversial capital out of this fact, if it is true. I am sorry he forbears. Unveracity is as grave a moral fault in a Nonconformist chapel as in a Conformist church, and deserves no mercy. But it is an old wisdom not to throw stones when one lives in a glass house.”

THE termination of Rev. F. B. Meyer’s pastorate at Christ Church, Westminster Bridge-road, which takes place in a few weeks’ time, will be followed by an important function at Leeds, when he is to be designated as special evangelist of the Free Church Council. The appointment is calculated to produce a large extension of the Council’s effectiveness. It will facilitate the process which is taking place towards a smoothing away of the historic differences which mark the great bodies of free churches, with the result of increasing the rather vague but old-fashioned evangelicalism which characterises the Council. Mr. Meyer is exceptionally qualified for the work. About his theology there is nothing “New,” and his message is marked by a warm humanitarianism which aims at moral righteousness and social justice—righteousness of the individual in social relationships, and justice as between the well-to-do and the destitute classes. The appointment is an instructive comment on the “broad” movement among the Congregationalists. They have all along been more free in their theology than the centre of the Council. And we can foresee something in the nature of an unconscious cleavage between the progressive and the evangelical sections. For the latter the Free Church Council is likely to prove increasingly a focus for their zeal and energy.

THE man seeking truth must come as a worshipper. He must deny himself his own prejudices and preferences. He must put aside all pride and worldly passion and ambition. He must not ask for the applause or even for the sympathy of the multitude. His duty is to observe the thing that is, and to allow it to make its own impress upon his mind. Then he is bound to give an absolutely simple report of what he has found. To allow any ulterior motives to influence him would be to profane the altar at which he serves. Even the utility of the truth he discovers is not to him the primary consideration. The question, “Is it true?” must not be confused with any other.—S. M. Crothers:

HENRY SIDGWICK.

SOME years ago it was my good fortune to be present at the annual dinner of a well-known philosophical society, when Sidgwick and Leslie Stephen were among the speakers. Sidgwick made a speech which none who heard it is likely to forget. He was responding, if my memory serves me rightly, for the toast of the study of philosophy, and told in an inimitable manner the story of a recent experience of his. It appeared that not long before he had been visited by an alumnus of one of the smaller "universities" on the other side of the Atlantic. This young man was in difficulties. He was preparing a thesis for a Doctor's degree. The fact that his alma mater was a thoroughly modern and up-to-date institution rendered it useless for him to expend his energies upon the obsolete metaphysics of Aristotle or Spinoza or Kant; he had determined, therefore, to write a dissertation upon the latest thing in the philosophical line—the system, namely, of Professor Henry Sidgwick. He had met, however, with a serious obstacle. Nowhere in the books of Professor Sidgwick he had come across could he discover what exactly was the author's Weltanschauung, and to present to a modern and up-to-date university such as his, a philosophical thesis without a Weltanschauung, would be a hopeless and futile procedure. Would Professor Sidgwick be so kind as to direct him to the works of his from which the needful information could be obtained? 'It was,' said Sidgwick, 'an embarrassing situation, for a Weltanschauung was just one of the things I could not remember having made myself responsible for. But the young man was evidently under the impression that my philosophical reputation was at stake in producing the article in question; so not wishing to discourage him I named certain publications of mine from which I thought he might perhaps obtain suggestions that would help him. A month or two later I received, to my dismay, an epistle from my young friend informing me that he had read the writings I had mentioned, and still had not found the essential requisite for his dissertation. In my perplexity, I gathered together all the pamphlets and reviews of mine I could lay my hands on, and bundled them off to my persistent inquisitor, in the hope that these at least would set his mind at rest. But no, a few more weeks passed, and a further communication arrived with the old plaintive cry that he had perused the last batch of documents, but could get no Weltanschauung out of them. By this time,' continued the speaker, 'I was coming to be rather tired of the business, and wrote what I fear was a somewhat abrupt postcard with the object of putting an end to the correspondence. In due course I received a letter in reply, thanking me profusely for the information I had given him, and saying that now he understood what my Weltanschauung was, and could proceed with his work. Unfortunately,' added Sidgwick, 'I have forgotten the contents of my post-card; and since that young man's treatise has not yet appeared, I am doubtful as to my position in the philosophical world, and am therefore a very unsuitable person to respond to the toast you have been good enough to associate with my name.'

The anecdote was eminently characteristic, and I have been reminded of it several times in reading the altogether delightful volume which has recently been contributed to our library of national biography.* "I find," wrote Sidgwick in 1888, "that there is a widespread feeling in Oxford that the portrait of Green (in 'Robert Elsmere') is something that ought not to have been done. I do not quite know why, for all admit that it is at once faithful and friendly. I have no particular desire for posthumous fame, but I think it would please me rather than otherwise to know that I should be introduced into a novel after death in this kind of way." Certainly there is little occasion now for any aspiring novelist to venture in his case upon a repetition of Mrs. Humphry Ward's experiment. For the story of a great and good man's life could not have been told with greater discrimination and judgment than in the work before us; the narrative, consisting largely of extracts from his own letters, which "sufficiently resemble his talk to bring his personality vividly before those who knew him, and doubtless in some measure before readers who never saw him," maintains its interest from the first page to the last, and reveals a nature of wonderful moral strength, intellectual subtlety, and spiritual discernment. Virtually a history of Cambridge University during the concluding forty years of the nineteenth century—since in every progressive university movement Sidgwick played a leading and conspicuous part—the "Memoir" is also pregnant with suggestiveness relative to the advancement of liberal thought and culture generally.

As to the details of Professor Sidgwick's career, let the barest recital here suffice. Henry Sidgwick was born in 1838, the third son of a clergyman and headmaster of the grammar-school in Skipton, Yorkshire. His father died in 1841, but his mother lived until 1878, and many of the letters from which we have extracts were written to her. The boy was educated first at home, then at school at Blackheath, and later at Rugby. The three Rugby years were marked by the strong influence exerted over him by his cousin, E. W. Benson, afterwards archbishop, but then an assistant master, whose power of using the classical writings to bring the ancient world lifelike and human before the mind was, Sidgwick asserts, unrivalled. With the lapse of years, when Sidgwick's divergence of view from the Church of England became pronounced, their relations changed, but their regard for one another remained.

"It's all very sad and puzzling," Benson wrote at that time, "and yet the one thought I hold fast is that we are but circumnavigating this obscure globe in opposite directions, and shall accomplish the same space in the same time and be ready for a new cruise together when night is past." In 1855, Sidgwick came up to Cambridge and entered Trinity. He had a brilliant college course, gained the Craven and innumerable prizes, and graduated as first in the Classical Tripos and as a Wrangler in the Mathematical Tripos. In 1859 he was elected to a Trinity Fellowship, and soon came to realise that "the deepest bent of his nature was towards the life of thought—thought exercised on the central objects of human life." He had been from boyhood an omnivorous reader, always of an inquiring, reflective disposition, and he turned to a systematic study of philosophy with a mind well equipped for the task. It was not, however, until 1867, that his college arranged that he should lecture for the Moral Science Tripos, and it was not until 1883 that he became Knightsbridge Professor of Moral Philosophy. Profound student though he was, he was never a recluse. His friends speak with one accord of his rare and unique power in conversation, of his kindly wit, of his shrewd practical wisdom. And his friends were men of such diverse temperaments as J. A. Symonds, James Bryce, Roden Noel, G. O. Trevelyan, F. W. H. Myers, Edmund Gurney, and Arthur Balfour—the last three standing towards him in the attitude, as Myers puts it, of "companions of Socrates," and "feeling an essential stimulus to self-development in his intellectual search, his analysing elenchus." As a university reformer he was bold and enthusiastic, a pioneer in the scheme of university extension, and in the remodelling of the Moral Science Tripos, whilst Newnham College is an enduring witness of his activity in the cause of women's education. Notwithstanding his numerous occupations, he found time for writing books which have taken a permanent place in English philosophical literature, and to the last he was a constant contributor to philosophical and other periodicals. Happy in his work, in his marriage, in his friends, he retained to the last a vivacity and freshness of thought, a cheerfulness and courage, an unselfish pleasure in life, for an account of which every reader of the "Memoir" will be grateful.

"I believe," says one of his pupils, Professor Maitland, "that he was a supremely great teacher." And it is not difficult to discover wherein the secret of his power as a teacher lay. In the first place, the search for philosophic truth was with him the predominating and paramount interest of his life; he was himself an original investigator in every department in which he sought to direct the studies of others. His lectures were the direct outcome and expression of his own continuous research, the careful results of his own independent thinking, no mere rehearsal of views and opinions "got up" for the occasion. He spoke as one who had himself wrestled long and arduously with the problems of speculation, and his pupils trusted him, as an experienced guide familiar with the difficulties and perils of the ascent invariably will be trusted. In the second place, he never attempted to employ in philosophical exposition the arts and embellishments of pulpit or platform oratory. "Let us avoid like poison writing for effect," he once exclaimed; and he would have spurned to introduce the devices of rhetoric into a subject which requires all the rigid exactness of a demonstrative science. "I would not if I could, and I could not if I would," he writes, "say anything which would make philosophy popular." He knew that just because philosophical reflection touches so many of the deepest concerns of humanity, it is all the more incumbent to adopt a mode of treatment absolutely devoid of prejudice and linguistic fireworks. He asked of his pupils what he demanded imperatively of himself, strenuous intellectual labour and he won their confidence and gratitude not by trying artificially to "interest" them, but by teaching them how to think, and indicating the questions most worthy of their thought. And so, as the terms went by, they came to look upon those lecture hours as "the best time they had in Cambridge," and in after life "the spirit" of those lectures remained—"a model of perfect work." In the third place, Sidgwick was no advocate of a dogmatic system, Realism, Dualism, Idealism, or what not, but the conscientious toiler at the solution of philosophic problems taken one by one, uncommitted to any foregone conclusion, and scrupulously fair in his criticism of arguments that seemed to him unsound. He sought not to arouse enthusiasm for any one set of opinions or antagonism against any other, but to inspire a genuine love of truth, and to foster a habit of intellectual thoroughness that would be distrustful of Weltanschauungen which could be put on postcards. Philosophy thus pursued becomes the highest of mental disciplines, whilst pursued differently it may easily degenerate into the flimsiest of wordy shows. Fortunate indeed were the successive bands of Cambridge men who were trained by him not to wage warfare with materialism and agnosticism, but patiently and respectfully to understand them.

"I believe," says Professor Maitland again, "that no more truthful man than Sidgwick ever lived," and he is speaking, he reminds us, of "a rare intellectual virtue." Sidgwick's position in reference to religion and the religious consciousness, is one upon which every unbiassed mind would do well to meditate. Early in his career, he had written to a correspondent: "at present I am only a Theist; but I have vowed that it shall not be for want of profound and devoted study, if I do not become a Christian." As a young man, he spent a considerable amount of time in mastering Arabic and Hebrew in order that he might be the better able to come to a decision upon the Old Testament tradition, and his life-long interest in the phenomena of psychical research was largely due to his recognition of the importance of the element of the miraculous in the history of Christian belief. The grounds on which he ultimately felt compelled to sever his connection with the Anglican Church, and in consequence to resign his Fellowship at Trinity, may be gathered from his Correspondence. He had no abstract objection to miracles, but he had come to see that there was no logical reason for treating the marvellous stories of the Gospels differently from the many other marvellous narratives which we meet with in history and biography, and that, granting the credibility of the latter, the Gospel story would have nothing like the unique character about it which ordinary Christians imagine. He doubted the validity of the appeal to the "experience" of Christians that prayers for spiritual help are answered, because of the general resemblance and affinity which such "experience" seemed to him to have to a mass of beliefs entertained by men in different ages and countries and resting on the supposed immediate assurance of enthusiastic "inspired" persons—beliefs which, as mutually inconsistent, must be largely erroneous. As regards Theism, the case, however, seemed to him otherwise. Were he asked whether he believed in a God, he would have to reply, he said, that he did not know—did not know, that is, whether he believed or merely hoped that there was a moral order in this universe, a supreme principle of Wisdom and Benevolence, guiding all things to good ends, and to the happiness of the good. He certainly hoped that this is so, but he did not think it capable of being proved. What he did consider himself justified in asserting was that no rational system of conduct could be constructed, except on the basis of this faith, since all our apparent knowledge of duty falls into chaos without a belief in the moral government of the world. And yet he was constrained to confess that the sceptical attitude had remained his through life. "The revealing visions come and go; when they come we feel that we know; but in the intervals we must pass through states in which all is dark, and in which we can only struggle to hold the conviction that

'Power is with us in the night
Which makes the darkness and the light,
And dwells not in the light alone.'

But "feeling must not usurp the function of Reason. Feeling is not knowing. It is the duty of a rational being to follow truth wherever it leads." We have here before us a profoundly impressive and inspiring lesson—the spectacle, namely, of a noble and penetrative mind, earnestly desiring that its highest ideal might not be illusion, but resolutely refusing to surrender its intellectual birthright by allowing desire to compel belief in what reason had not confirmed. It is an example from which those unorthodox Christians who talk so complacently about the "beautiful simplicity" of their faith have much to learn. The belief in God may rest on grounds more cogent than Sidgwick thought they were, but in any case it is a tremendous affirmation, not lightly to be assumed, and assuredly in every sense the very reverse of "simple." Omnia praeclara tam difficilia quam rara sunt. He who puts out with his barque of religious faith upon the open seas must not expect the winds always to be favourable, nor even refuse to face the danger of shipwreck. Dogmatism, in all its forms, is repugnant to the spirit of reason, and its prevalence amongst unorthodox religious communities drives away hundreds—I believe, thousands—of thoughtful, sincere men and women, whose help in any cause would be to it a very tower of strength.

Many other features of the "Memoir" there are over which one would gladly linger. I note only a few. Sidgwick was a keen politician, and his comments on political situations are always shrewd and suggestive. His liberalism was of the sturdy, independent type; it had no affinity to the spurious counterfeit of the caucus and wirepulling order. His genuine liberality of mind manifests itself, for example, in the consistent support—a support withheld by many who called themselves "liberals"— he gave to the movement for admitting St. Edmund's House, a Roman Catholic seminary, as a public hostel of the University. Another conspicuous trait was his intense love of poetry. "I have never known man or woman," says Myers, who could recite poetry like him"; and the Correspondence is full of illuminating thoughts on the writings of Clough, Tennyson, Browning, and other of his favourite authors. Nor must one fail to mention one other feature of his character—his beautiful and unobtrusive modesty. There was not in him a trace of that repellent spirit of self-advertisement or of masterful self-assertiveness so prevalent in the world to-day. "He never claimed authority," writes Mr. Balfour; "he never sought to impose his views; he never argued for victory." Lastly, the final chapter relates exactly in the way one would wish to have related the events of the few months that followed the day in May, 1900, when, feeling "full of vigour and vitality," he learnt that he was suffering from an incurable disease, and had before him the prospect of almost imminent death. Quietly and unostentatiously, as though nothing unusual had occurred, he fulfilled his outstanding engagements, and then, resigning his professorship and taking leave of his old Cambridge associates, he went to London to undergo an operation from which he could only hope that a period of invalid existence might be extended to him. No worthier close of a life throughout courageous would it be possible to have wished for him; human fortitude could scarcely reach a higher level. On the eve of his departure from Cambridge he was present at a luncheon party, when Swinburne's poem "Super Flumina Babylonis," happened to come up in the course of conversation. "He taught me there," says one of his friends, "how calmly and manfully death and suffering could be faced, as he recited without a break in his voice the lines which I could hardly bear to hear, ending—

'Where the light of the life of him is on all past things,

Death only dies.'

Through the labours of years he had sought for proofs of the soul's immortality, and in the end the one irrefragable proof of it he left us was—himself.

G. DAWES HICKS.

IN THE CROW'S NEST.

TRUE wit, we said, in one of our recent causeries, is always spontaneous. It has another ingredient, too—atticism in the better sense, urbanity. There must be no malice in it. If it shocks, it does not shock by grossness. Its level of refinement seems one grade higher than the occasion demands. An admirable kind is that which depends on—or, better still, hints at from afar—some little point of polite learning. It establishes a secret, scholarly understanding among the initiate, and leaves on the profane the unhappy sense that more is meant than meets the ear. Such is sometimes the force of an apt quotation. No. 404 of the Spectator was made up of letters, with the signatures Sylvia, Canniball, Dorinda, and Cornelius Nepos. The motto added in the second issue—quæ spectator tradit sibi—is merely a confession in a Latin hexameter tag that Steele wrote them all himself, and would be insipid if it did not send the reader's mind to his Horace, flash into a pleasant recollection of the rules of the dramatic art, and flatter him with the notion that the source of the words here used in a second intention is a little secret between him and Sir Richard.

But, whatever may be true of wit κατ' ἐξοχήν, the vulgar idea of wit certainly associates it with malice. No doubt this is partly an accident of the records. A caustic wit is much easier to report with credit than a mild wit. In both its elements, point and shock, it has the advantage over the kindly. Its occasion, the effort to discomfort an opponent, is intelligible to the meanest understanding, and it is much more startling to be taken off our guard by a sting than by a kiss. Some bitter sayings, indeed, which have become witty in report, can hardly have been enjoyed as wit when they were uttered. In the presence of the insulted victim their cruelty must have offended too grossly. Of kindly banter, elegant compliment, the very opposite is true. Its bouquet tends to exhale. To repeat it effectively calls for more skill. But in the actual first utterance, in its moment of gleam and glow, it is the most delightful, captivating, and popular of all modes of talk.

Of insulting epigrams and jeux d'esprit, fondly treasured, there is no lack. The Greek Anthology is full of them. The figure of speech called hyperbole, which under the name of whopper passes in sane circles for a recent American invention, plays a leading part in this kind of literature. Has not Merivale's version of an epigram by Nicarchus the true Yankee ring?

" 'Tis said that certain death awaits
The raven's nightly cry ;

But at the sound of Cyron's voice
The very ravens die."

Or this, from Demodocus ?

" A viper stung a Cappadocian's hide,
And, poisoned by his blood, that instant died."

The same figure is managed with more elegance in the immortal distich by Dr. Evans :

" When Tadlow walks the streets, the pavours cry :
' God bless you, sir ! ' and lay their rammers by."

The sidelong manner of this reflection, the vividness with which the picture is flung upon the canvas—the sighing labourers straighten their backs, pass hand over brow, lean on their superseded instruments to bless the academic Falstaff, who rolls along, stone-heaps before and flat high road behind, the while windows chatter and chairmen scuttle in affright—these qualities of the epigram, together with the whimsical point of view which regards obesity as a λειτουργία, put us off the fact that its point lies in a rude personal reference to a senior member of St. John's. This art of disguising insult beneath a pleasantry superficially courteous is, doubtless, what Dr. Young meant by " politeness."

" As in smooth oil the razor best is whet,
So wit is by politeness sharpest set ;
Their want of edge for their offence is seen,
Both pain us least when exquisitely keen."

It is remarkable how natural it seems to the epigrammatists to conceive wit as a weapon, " which boasts two various powers in one, to cut as well as shine." But why a weapon? Why should it wound? Why not rather a graceful hand, nimble in caresses? Because the finest things are the hardest things, and we are most of us dunces. We have not wit enough to be brilliantly kind, yet we must needs shine, so we catch at the cheap, vulgar, easy expedient of a neatly turned jeer or grimace. Yet everyone who does so proclaims his own dullness, and ranks himself not far above that character in an eighteenth century play, who boasts of having knocked a cripple's two wooden legs from under him.

Shortsighted laziness! If you would perfect a faculty you must employ it in its highest, its hardest tasks. Unkindness impairs wit, and so does insincerity.

" Accept a miracle instead of wit :

See two dull lines by Stanhope's pencil writ."

This album couplet of Dr. Young's is brilliant, is it not? But it misses the finest lustre because it is not sincere. Eight words straight out of the heart of Dicky Steele put all the polite insults and all the hypocritical compliments of his contemporaries to shame.

For mere natural outfit who would compare the Christian Hero, who was laughed out of the House of Commons, with the author of " Gulliver," the friend of Harley and St. John? These two men had different thoughts and feelings with regard to women, and again the advantage, if ill-will could confer it, lay with Swift. Swift wrote " to a very young lady on her marriage " that he could not conceive women " to be human creatures, but a certain sort of species hardly a degree above a monkey; who has more diverting tricks than any of you, is an animal less mischievous and expensive, might in time be a tolerable critic in velvet and brocade, and, for aught I know, would equally become them." Whereas Steele, poor fellow, quite misses this note: " The love of woman is inseparable from some esteem of her; and as she is naturally the object of affection the woman who has your esteem has always some degree of your love." Well, the most famous thing Swift wrote about a woman is the disgraceful inscription " In a Maid of Honour's Prayer-book," which you may turn up if you will, for I shall not copy it out. Then put beside it what Steele wrote of a real woman: " To have loved her was a liberal education."

But why should wit and humour ever have been associated with malignity at all? Why are horse-play, mimicry, caricature amusing, while their benevolent counterparts, such as lending an arm up a hill to an old man, or engravings which flatter their original, do not tickle us at all? Must we ascribe this to human depravity, like La Rochefoucauld? " There is something pleasing to us in the misfortunes of our best friends?" No. Are we never pleased except when we are laughing? The true explanation goes deeper. The sense of humour, as a vital function, is displacing pain. Man is the laughing animal. Only the highest of all organisms has the power of turning to mirth what would otherwise beget simply a dull disgust. How many things lie on the borderland between laughter and tears! In these laughable-pathetic cases it is the finest and strongest intellect that is most touched with the sense of the farcical. Dogberry does not understand this: " Flippancy!" he cries, worships the owl, and degrades the fine old Roman word gravitas to mean a set visage. What! is it a finer stroke of intellect to perceive the ludicrous than the pathetic? Nay, Goodman Dull. To be full of fun is not to be empty of compassion. There was once a saint called Thomas Hood.

In the lower ranges of life Nature brings up her children by the rod. Into the nursery of humanity she admits a gentler nurse, who chaffs and tickles, instead of scolding and flogging. The future of humour is immense. There will come a seraphic stage where our toothaches, wrenchings and writhings will be represented by the flicker and twinkle of lip and eye which tell how a jest is quietly relished. Let us then, with a good conscience, take things—especially our own troubles—on the humorous side; but let us no more tolerate a witty insult or wounding jest than a clever theft. In both rules we shall be serving the Power that makes for happiness.

THE SASIPADA INSTITUTE.

An appeal for books is made on behalf of the Sasipada Institute at Baranagar, Bengal. When Mary Carpenter first went to India in 1866, she made the acquaintance of Sasipada Banerjee, and five years later, after two other visits, when acquaintance had ripened into very warm regard, she arranged for Mr. and Mrs. Banerjee to come to this country, and they spent nearly six months with her at Bristol. She had, from the first, we read in Dr. Carpenter's Memoir, " followed with lively sympathy the earnest efforts he had put forth for the improvement of the working men of his village; and the completeness of his emancipation from the religious and social restraints of his high caste had won her sincere respect."

One result of Mr. Banerjee's widened experience was the establishment of an Institute for the benefit of the young people of his village, which now, warned by advancing years, he has vested in trustees and endowed, so that it may remain a centre of social, educational, and philanthropic work. Baranagar is a centre of mill industry, and the Sasipada Institute, in addition to providing courses of lectures on scientific, technical, and commercial subjects, includes a Girls' School and a Working Men's Club.

Mr. Banerjee has given his own library and museum to the Institute, and it is for further gifts for the library that appeal is now made. Books or gifts to the museum may be sent to the hon. secretary of the National Indian Association, Caxton Hall, Westminster, S.W., who will forward them to the Institute. Papers, magazines, reviews, and reports of educational, social, and philanthropic institutions might be sent direct to the secretary, Sasipada Institute, Baranagar, near Calcutta;

THE HIBBERT JOURNAL

THE January number of the Hibbert Journal might well serve as a manifesto of the "New Theology," understood in a broad and genuinely liberal sense (with no artificial barriers set up against Unitarian thinkers). The foundation is well and truly laid by the veteran Dr. Campbell Fraser, in the first article on "Our Final Venture," which completes the wisdom of the initial venture of our common faith in a physical cosmos.

"The entire spiritual and physical constitution of man, not merely his sensuous embodiment and consequent relations to other bodies, is presupposed in final faith in Omnipotent Goodness, immanent in the heart of the real universe in its whole organic evolution. The spirit latent in man, that inspiration of God which constitutes his knowledge, appears in different degrees of intensity and intelligence, of ethical insight and aesthetic embodiment, in the various religions of the world, speaking through their inspired prophets as organs of what is divine. This inspiration welled forth in its highest and most articulate spiritual form in Palestine, which has thus been the chief factor in the evolution of theistic faith, and the main source of its progressive influence in the lives of men."

On this follows a searching article by Professor A. O. Lovejoy, of Washington University, St. Louis, on "The Entangling Alliance of Religion and History," in which he quotes from Professor G. B. Foster's recent book on "The Finality of the Christian Religion," the following sentence: "One cannot too earnestly asseverate that the principle of Christianity is not to be found among historical data which science can doubt, but in the filial relationship to God, with which science can have nothing whatever to do," and for himself, towards the end of the article, declares: "Christianity ought no longer to let itself be involved in obscure and uncertain issues of historical detail; but it ought still, if it is to be true to its distinctive essence, to proclaim the worth of personal and racial experience under the form of time, and the divineness of the historic order. In this large and general but far from unmeaning postulate lies the inexpugnable residuum of the historical element in Christianity."

With these two articles should be read the Rev. C. S. Patton's on "The New Theism," and Mr. Hugh MacColl's on "Chance or Purpose," with its recognition of the essential unity and mutual helpfulness of honest, truth-seeking religion and honest, truth-seeking science. Those who are inclined to trust Haeckel as a guide in the realm of the philosophy of religion, should especially note this latter article. There must, says Mr. McColl, be no finality or baseless dogmatism on either side. "True religion, founded on pure Theism, must, like science, be progressive, and adapt its tenets to changing conditions and new discoveries. Science, accepting the same pure theism, must, like true religion, tread softly and reverently, and regard Nature as a divine book which it is man's privilege and bounden duty to study."

The Rev. R. J. Campbell's article on "The Christian Doctrine of Atonement, as influenced by Semitic Religious Ideas," leads us to hope that it will not be long before his promised book on the Atonement appears. And there are two other articles to be named in this same connection: the Rev. F. F. Grensted's on "The 'Eternal Now' in Anglican Theology: a Point of Contact between the New Theism and the Old"; and Mr. Boyce Gibson's on "A Peace Policy for Idealists," making for a completer interpretation of the philosophy of religion, as Personal Idealism. This latter article includes a full reference to Professor Henry Jones's Centenary address on Martineau's philosophy of religion.

To M. Paul Sabatier's article in French on the "Religious Crisis in France and Italy" we have already made brief reference. It deals with the liberal Catholic movement in both countries, with confidence in the new stirring of spiritual life within the church, to make the power of religion felt and secure a better future for the people.

Then comes Mr. G. G. Coulton, who tells of "The Failure of the Friars," in the sad and speedy decadence of the Franciscan Order after the death of its founder, while in the region of Church politics Dr. Hastings Rashdall writes on the Ecclesiastical Discipline Report, "A Grave Peril to the Liberty of Churchmen." It is not the strengthening of the law against the self-will of ritualist vagaries that he fears, but the proposal to appoint the bishops and archbishops as a final court of appeal, to decide in cases of dispute what the doctrine of the Church of England really is. Hitherto the decisions of the court of appeal have made broadly for liberality and comprehension in the church, whereas, if the bishops had been judges, it is almost certain that in every case, and certainly in the case of the suspects of "Essays and Reviews," the judgments would have been for exclusion and a narrowing of the Church.

"I have nothing to say," Dr. Rashdall remarks, "against the moderation, the ability, or the statesmanlike qualities of the Commissioners; but, in the first place, I submit that they have been preoccupied with the question of 'putting down ritualism,' and have not bestowed a moment's thought on the question how their scheme will affect a matter of far greater and more far-reaching importance than the suppression of ritualistic vagaries, i.e., the liberty of theological thought and expression in the National Church. They have not asked themselves what effect it will have upon attempts to bring the teaching of the Church of England into harmony with the growth of knowledge and the development of ideas in the community at large. In the second place, there is no indication that this is an object which would have commended itself as particularly important to most of the Commissioners. . . . there is not among the Commissioners one single clergyman or layman who, so far as his opinions are known, can be said to represent in any distinctive way the interests of Broad Churchmanship, of advanced criticism, of free and progressive theological thinking. The most liberal of the clerical members is probably the Primate himself."

Two other articles remain to be mentioned—Mr. Basil de Selincourt's study of Blake, "The Parallelism of Religion and Art," and what many readers will find the most attractive article in the whole number, "The Messianic Idea in Vergil," by Professor R. S. Conway, of Manchester. The baselessness of the old ecclesiastical tradition which found in the Fourth Eclogue, and the child who was to come, a prophetic reference to the coming Christ, is clearly demonstrated, but at the same time the truly prophetic character of much of Vergil's poetry is recognised and beautifully described.

"I believe," says Professor Conway, "that one may and must attribute to Vergil the conscious possession of certain ideas which may be roughly enumerated as follows:—

"(1) That mankind was unbearably guilty and in urgent need of regeneration.

"(2) That the establishment of the Empire was an epoch strangely favourable to some such ethical movement, and intended by Providence to introduce it.

"(3) That it was part of the duty of Rome to attempt the task.

"(4) That one special deliverer would be sent by Providence (or, in the Aeneid, that a deliverer had already been sent) to begin the work.

"(5) That the work would involve suffering and disappointment, and that its essence lay in a new spirit, a new and more humane ideal.

"Now, if we can show that these were among the thoughts which moved Vergil, the admission will surely imply that, in the deepest and truest sense of the word, Vergil did 'prophesy' the coming of Christianity. We should be justified in maintaining that he read the spiritual conditions of his time with profound insight, and with no less profound hope declared that some answer would be sent to the world's need. How much more than these two gifts of insight and faith men may take to be involved in the conception of a prophet we need not consider; for we shall all agree that no great religion will ever be content with less; no mere mechanical foreknowledge has ever been or ever will be enough to make a man a great teacher of his fellows.

"In inquiring, therefore, into Vergil's teaching upon such points as have been suggested, we are not following some curious byway of literary study; we are at the very heart of the central movement of history, and touching the deepest forces that have made and are making mankind."

For the working out of this theme readers must turn to the article itself, but we cannot refrain from quoting one more passage:—

"What, then, was the new ideal? It was the conception of peace by forgiveness, of conciliation instead of punishment—in a word, the ideal of mercy. It was, indeed, for a part of this, that is, for just and humane government, that Cicero had lived and died; and from him Julius Cæsar had learnt, ere the end of his stormy career, the great political secret of forgetting offences; but the deeper ethical note, the human sympathy and tenderness of Vergil's appeal to the world, is all his own."

The discussions which follow the main articles are full of life, and altogether it is evident from this number that the Hibbert is very much alive.

OBITUARY.

MISS LEWIN:

LAST July we had the happiness of joining with many other friends in congratulating Miss Lewin on her ninetieth birthday. Now we have to say, Farewell. About a fortnight ago she went from her home in Birkenhead to rooms in Liverpool, to be near a specialist for eye trouble; but the intense cold of the days which followed touched her, and on Sunday evening, Jan. 27, she quietly passed away. She had been talking as usual a few minutes before. There was no pain, only a little discomfort at the heart, and then a beautiful peace.

Mary Anne Lewin was born July 29, 1816, a daughter of Edmund Lewin, and granddaughter of the Rev. Robert Lewin, who in the year of her birth retired from the pulpit of Renshaw-street Chapel, Liverpool, of which he was the first minister, having also been for many years before 1811 minister of the earlier Bennis Garden Chapel. Miss Lewin was a pupil of Dr. Lant Carpenter and Miss Mary Carpenter at Bristol, and on her return to Liverpool came under the influence of James Martineau, whose lectures she attended for many years. She became a devoted Sunday-school teacher, serving in that capacity and as superintendent of the girls' school for nearly forty years. For nearly thirty-five years she was also a district visitor, and her strong personality, marked by unswerving integrity and fair mindedness, and unfailing sympathy and interest in the true well-being of the people, made a deep impression on old and young alike with whom she was brought into contact.

A memorial service was held at the Ancient Chapel of Toxteth on January 30, after cremation, conducted by the Rev. H. D. Roberts, of Hope-street Church, and the remarkable gathering of old scholars and friends bore witness to the abiding affection Miss Lewin had inspired during her long life of faithful service.

MR. CHARLES HALLAM.

THE congregation of the High-street Church, Shrewsbury, have lost one of their oldest and most honoured members, through the death of Mr. Charles Hallam, who passed away on Saturday morning, Jan. 19, in his eighty-fourth year. Mr. Hallam suffered from a severe fall last September, and never completely recovered from the effects. He had been for nearly half a century on the commercial staff of the Shrewsbury Chronicle, and was later associated with some lead works and with the Shrewsbury Guardian. One of his sons was a house-master at Harrow, and another at a school in Dresden; but after Mrs. Hallam's death, about four years ago, he came home to be with his father. Charles Hallam was an ardent Liberal, but a man of retiring disposition, who declined public office; he did his work with great devotion, but quietly and without ostentation.

At the funeral service on Tuesday week the Rev. J. C. Street paid a warm tribute to the character of his friend, to his blameless life, and loyal citizenship. True, brave, and honourable, he was, said Mr. Street, rich with kindly deeds, sweet and manly graces, lifted up with lofty thoughts, and ennobled by all that constitutes a noble human being.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

THERE are many ways of using our imagination: Making pictures in our minds of how things look to other people is one way: Last week I wrote to you about games of make-believe, and that part of the game which we can carry with us into our more serious life. By trying to imagine ourselves in the place of others, we grow into sympathy with others.

There is yet another way of using our imagination:

Even when we give up our games of pretending to be somebody else, we may still try to be like somebody else:

Instead of making a game by pretending to be King Alfred in disguise in the swineherd's hut, letting the good wife's cakes burn whilst he is lost in plans for defending this poor country from the Danes, we can still try to be like King Alfred. We can imitate King Alfred by loving our country and wanting to make it happier; by serving our country, not just in his way, for times are different; but in some other way suited to our own times:

There are many ways in which we all try to be like somebody else: We try to imitate those we look up to and admire, an older brother or sister, a school companion, our parents, our teachers.

And perhaps we make a picture in our own minds of the sort of person we should like to be, and day by day we try to be better, more like this picture in our minds.

Have we not a picture in our minds of what we would like our home to be, our neighbourhood, our city, our country?

Without pretending that things are different from what they actually are at present, we can, with our imagination, see them different—as they might be. We can imagine our homes as they might be with no cross looks, and try to make them brighter. We can imagine our parks as they might be with no untidy pieces of paper or orange-peel left about, and we perhaps help to keep them tidy.

Someone's imagination perhaps sees a gloomy city graveyard turned into a bright garden and that someone helps to bring about the change: Another sees some open space as it might be, if it were turned into a playground for the children. And before long the playground is there and the children too.

Making pictures of the world, as it might be, and of ourselves as we might be, is another way of using our imagination.

Do you know the words idea and ideal?

An idea is a thought in contrast to a thing. When anyone has "a happy thought," as we call it, we say "what a good idea!" Now, when our thought is of something or somebody as they might be—better than they are—this thought is called an ideal.

So an ideal is just a happy thought of what might be—better than it is already in reality. An ideal home is a home as it might be, an ideal city is a city as it might be, an ideal country is a country that might be. Ideal people are people as they might be:

Most of us have the power of imagining

an ideal, but we do not all know how to use it: We need to exercise our imaginations to keep them in working order, as we need to exercise our limbs to keep them from growing stiff: Let us have some practice. I am sure that each one of you can imagine yourself as still yourself, but different, better; you can think of yourself as you might be if you were less lazy, or less impatient, and more kind and more obedient. Now we have each to try to be that other self, to try to be more like that ideal self that we can each imagine for ourselves:

We never actually reach these ideals of ours, for the ideal is always just the thought of something beyond. It is just the thought of what might be.

The ideal Mary, or Johnnie, or Tom is always better than Mary or Johnnie or Tom is yet: And as they grow better, so the ideal Tom, Johnnie, and Mary go on further and become better still.

Now, sometimes some Johnnie or Mary sits down and cries because the ideal Johnnie or Mary has slipped away and is not to be caught and held fast:

You know how impossible it is to catch your own shadow. Well, it is just as impossible to catch up with your ideal. It is the very nature of an ideal not to be caught like a prisoner, but to be followed like a leader:

Perhaps you may say what is the good of an ideal if you can never reach it: To begin with, it is good to see beautiful things, even if they are out of reach:

Is any colour in any actual thing you can touch as wonderfully beautiful as the colours in the sky sometimes at sunrise or sunset? Is any blue dress you can wear as lovely a blue as the sky on a summer day?

We know that it is a great loss to be near-sighted, only able to see things that are near. It is a great loss not to be able to see away into the distance: Seeing to a great distance, away past all the near things, helps us to imagine an ideal beyond what we can see. Not to be able to imagine an ideal at all is more of a loss than to be near-sighted.

Now, the great good of an ideal is that it always is just beyond—not to be cried for, as a baby might cry for the moon, but to be followed as we follow a guiding star:

Even if we cannot ever reach it, it is good to follow on and on in the direction of a better. That we cannot reach it need not discourage us. It should encourage us to remember that however often we fail, however often we stumble, the ideal will not fail us. It is still there to lead us on:

We have not wings to soar like the birds away from earth up into the clear air and the blue sky. But our imagination can carry us away, lift us up with wings away from ourselves as we are now, away from our world as it is at present, away into an ideal world:

With these imaginations of ours, we can see visions of what might be, and, if we are faithful to these visions, these ideals, they serve as models, patterns for us to copy in our real life. We can try to imitate the images we see in our minds: We can try to bring our real selves, our real world, a little nearer to our ideal—to our happy thought of something better:

THE BOSTON INTERNATIONAL.

WE are sending out as a supplement this week the first of the three Bulletins of the "Boston International Congress of Religious Liberals," of which Mr. WENDTE spoke in his American Notes in THE INQUIRER of January 12. This, it will be seen, is a preliminary announcement, and for the full programme of the meetings we have still to wait. It confirms, however, the impression we got from Mr. WENDTE'S earlier notes, of the splendid enthusiasm which is being thrown into the preparations for the meetings.

The International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers was first organised at Boston in May, 1900, and the significance of the three meetings which have been already held in London, Amsterdam, and Geneva is well known to our readers.

The question how far Europe will be represented at the fourth meeting, next September, on the other side of the Atlantic, remains still to be decided; but it is already evident that the Boston meeting will be conspicuous above all the others hitherto held for the inclusiveness of its membership, gathered from various bodies of religious Liberals in America.

It is with the greatest satisfaction that we note on the Executive Committee the name of the Rev. GEORGE A. GORDON, D.D., of the Old South Congregational Church in Boston, as representative of the liberal Trinitarians of that Connection, while the Universalists and other bodies, as will be seen by the Bulletin, are promising cordial co-operation. We would call special attention to the letter from Mr. H. W. WILBUR, on behalf of the Friends' General Conference: "In your letter," writes Mr. WILBUR, "you refer to us, by implication at least, as 'the progressive Friends.' We have no such title. We call ourselves the Religious Society of Friends. By our so-called orthodox brethren we are known as 'Hicksites,' although we accept no such title. I presume that we could as truthfully be differentiated from the other bodies of Friends by calling us 'Liberal' as by any other word. I may say that by some of us the action of the Conference in deciding to co-operate with the Council was considered a sign of a helpful forward movement, as it is a new departure."

We shall hope that not only the appointed delegates, but many other Friends, will unite with us in the work and the happy fellowship of the Boston week. It will give a special interest to such welcome intercourse, when we call to mind that this year we celebrate the centenary of the birth of JOHN GREENLEAF WHITTIER, who lives in our hearts and theirs, and to whom we owe so much in the hymnody of our churches.

As to the English party, it is by no means too soon to complete arrangements and secure berths on the outward-going boats. Our readers are aware that Messrs. THOS. COOK & SON are appointed official Travel Agents in connection with the meetings, and their promised booklet giving full particulars as to the various steamship lines, and certain tours in America for which arrangements can be made, will be ready, we understand, in a few days.

Application should be now made as soon as possible by all intending visitors through the preliminary paper which has been widely circulated, and is to be returned to Essex Hall, and then the required arrangements will be made as speedily as possible by Messrs. COOK & SON, to whom alone payments are to be made in accordance with the directions which will be found in their booklet.

The first enthusiastic hope that a hundred Unitarian ministers might be enabled to attend the Boston meetings will hardly be fulfilled, but the actual number should be close upon fifty, if not beyond it; and we trust that more than another fifty of the members of our churches will be there, so that we may, at least, be over a hundred strong.

Before long we hope that Mr. WENDTE will be able to send us a programme of the meetings practically complete, but we already know enough to be confident that the meetings will be full of inspiration, and that it will be worth the making of some serious sacrifice of holiday and other plans to be there. Even more than at Amsterdam or Geneva, we may be sure that in the heart of New England, and with such abundant welcome as we shall receive, our faith will be mightily strengthened in living fellowship, wide and deep, with brethren come together from many lands.

DR. ALFRED E. GARVIE has accepted the Principalship of New College, London, in succession to Dr. Vaughan Price, who retires at Midsummer. Dr. Garvie is still on the youthful side of 50:

WINTER SUNLIGHT.

SUNLIGHT is never so surprisingly beautiful as when it shines on one's face in the earliest, and usually the coldest, time of the year. By then one has grown so accustomed to the sharp air and gray skies of winter, that one scarcely attempts to associate anything more genial with this "inclement season"; and even children write in their little essays, "In summer all is green and smiling, but during the months of cold weather everything looks bare and gloomy." The old idea that Mother Earth goes to sleep after the autumn time of grieving still obtains, and most people suppress all enthusiasm about Nature when winter begins, until the glory of April, with all her obvious delights.

Spring is the intoxicating season of life's renewal, and in spite of all that has been said and sung about it, "the half of its beauty," and what that beauty signifies to man, has never yet been told. But there is so much need of brightness in our stressful lives that we simply cannot afford to postpone joyfulness which is so easily assumed in April, if there is the least opportunity for indulging it in the flowerless and frost-bound days. We cannot afford it, any more than Nature can afford to waste time in sighing for the summer that has passed when the leaves fall. She is, poetically, supposed to weep long for her vanished wealth; but as a matter of fact she does nothing of the sort. She only puts on a plain garment and retires into her inner chamber, where she busies herself in a thousand preparations for summers to be, and is not "at home" to every caller. The suspension and melancholy we read into a winter landscape simply does not exist for her.

The sunlight in January is a message sent from that elemental workshop where the fabric of spring is being woven, to tell us that natural laws are not suspended while we are wrapped in lethargy of spirit. It is even more—it is a part of the great soul of Beauty, as much to be loved for its own sake as for what it prophesies. Colour leaps forth at its bidding where everything seemed drab before, so that one sees with astonishment that grass is still green, rooftops burning red, and the sky as turquoise-tinted as an Italian lake. It has an effect on the dulllest scene like that of a shower of spray on the sandy fragments of rock, scattered about that wondrous Cornish cove where the boulders are so exquisitely veined with scarlet, and amethyst, and emerald. It washes everything in purest light, and brings out hues which would otherwise have been unguessed by the ordinary observer. But until one has seen it glowing in the bell of a hyacinth, or on the yellow cups of daffodils brought from warmer lands than ours to brighten our homes at this season, one has never realised what a miraculous power it possesses. The petals of the flowers are wonderful to us already, with their delicate veinings, flawless colour, and mysterious perfume; but when the sunshine falls upon them, and its radiance is in some indescribable way absorbed into their texture, it almost seems as if the blossoms exhaled a soul—as if the very secret of life lay hidden under their sensitive stamens. The great Swedish botanist is said to have knelt down and praised God when he saw

The Boston Congress.

We want men of original perception and original action who can open their eyes wider than to a nationality; namely, to considerations of benefit to the human race.—R. W. Emerson.

The Fourth International Congress of Religious Liberals will be held in Boston, the city in which this movement for the federation of religious liberals throughout the world originated, on Sept. 22 to 27, 1907. It is intended to make this gathering a notable occasion in the annals of religious thought and fellowship.

A cordial invitation is extended to all who are in sympathy with the general purposes of the Congress to attend it, either as a delegate from some religious organization or in their private capacity. No assent to any formal dogma or adhesion to any particular Church is required for membership. All who desire to increase religious enlightenment, freedom, and tolerance, and to make the world better, are cordially invited to participate in it.

Application for membership may be made at any time to the Secretary, Rev. CHARLES W. WENDTE, 25 Beacon Street, Boston, Mass., U.S.A., enclosing the Congress fee of ONE DOLLAR (four shillings or five francs). Membership entitles one to participation in the Congress and admission to all its meetings, including the receptions to delegates. For the banquet and excursions special tickets must be obtained. Toward delegates from foreign countries a large hospitality will be exercised. To all who in advance enroll themselves as members, subsequent numbers of this Bulletin and other information concerning the Congress will be mailed.

CONGRESS NOTES.

The arrangements for the Congress thus far made, and the responses to invitations already received, assure the success of the Boston Congress meetings as regards their representative quality and breadth of fellowship.

In subsequent numbers of this Bulletin will be printed detailed information

The International Council.

The time is come when liberal Christians should forget their divisions and separations and unite in every civilized country of the world, without stipulating for the particular terms to which each special ecclesiastical connection is historically attached. They should join together and use their best possible light in order to drive back the opposite hosts of darkness that environ them.—Dr. James Martineau.

METHODS.

The International Council seeks to bring into closer union for exchange of ideas, mutual service, and the promotion of their common aims the historic liberal churches, the liberal elements in all churches, the scattered liberal congregations and isolated workers for religious freedom and progress in many lands.

It aims to be a source of encouragement and strength to them in their struggles against dogmatic intolerance and ecclesiastical tyranny.

It cultivates large and fraternal relations with the great liberal movements in religion now going on under various names and auspices throughout the world.

AFFILIATED SOCIETIES.

Some fifty religious associations are now affiliated with the Council, send official delegates to its meetings, and make it the international organ of their fraternal relations with each other.

Among these are:—

United States: National Conference of Unitarian and Other Christian Churches; American Unitarian Association; Universalist General Convention; Friends' General Conference; American Christian Convention; Free Religious Association of America; Congress of Religion; Association of German Liberal Ministers; various liberal orthodox churches and ministers, etc.

Great Britain: British and Foreign Unitarian Association; Association of Irish Non-subscribing Presbyterians and Other Free Christians; South Wales Unitarian Association; Scottish Unitarian Association; National Triennial Conference of Unitarian, Liberal Christian, Free Christian, Presbyterian, and Other Non-subscribing or Kindred Congregations; General Baptist Assembly; the Sunday School Association; Unitarian Churches in Canada, Australia, New Zealand, Tasmania, and South Africa; the Australian Church, Melbourne.

France and Belgium: Délévation Libérale des Eglises Reformées de France; Association Fraternelle des Pasteurs Libéraux; Consistoires des Die, Havre, Mazamet, Montpellier, Nîmes, Tonneins, etc.; the Liberal Congregations of Brussels and Ghent.

Germany: Deutscher Protestantenverein (German Association of Liberal Protestants); Protestantisch-liberaler Verein von Elsass-Lothringen (Alsace-Lorraine); Freie Evangelische Gemeinde zu Königsberg, etc.

Holland: Nederlandsche Protestantenvond (Dutch Liberal Protestant Association); The Remonstrant Churches; the Mennonite Churches; The Free Religious Society of Amsterdam; The Vergadering van Moderne Theologen; Dutch Congregations of London and St. Petersburg.

Hungary: The Unitarian Churches of Hun-on this subject. The proceedings and, with few exceptions, the addresses will be in the English tongue.

A half-hour religious service will be held each morning at King's Chapel.

In the next issue of this Bulletin the programme of the meetings will be given in full, together with the names of the principal speakers, and, so far as possible, the topics of their papers and their portraits.

There will also be printed a list of the eminent men and women in the United States, belonging to many churches and professing many creeds, who have consented to serve as honorary vice-presidents and on the Reception Committee of the Congress, and who assure us of their interest, sympathy, and co-operation.

Besides the active work of the Congress a banquet and various receptions will give opportunity for a closer acquaintance among the members, together with excursions to Concord (visiting Tuft's College on the way), Cambridge, Lexington, Plymouth, and other places associated with the annals of religious and political liberty.

There will be personally conducted tours in Boston and its beautiful parks and suburbs.

An excursion will be made by special train to Fairhaven, Mass., and its noble group of memorial buildings erected for civic and religious uses. After a welcome and lunch the party will re-embark and visit Plymouth and its Pilgrim shrines.

In the next issue of this Bulletin information will be given concerning reduced rates at hotels and boarding-houses, and the hospitalities to be extended to foreign delegates.

INTER-DENOMINATIONAL AMITY.

While the invitation to hold on American soil the Fourth International Congress of Religious Liberals was extended by the National Unitarian Conference and the American Unitarian Association, and the financial contributions and personal service necessary to assure the large success of the Congress will be rendered largely by members of this long-established liberal fellowship, the welcome and entertainment of our guests from abroad will by no means be confined to a single church or sect.

A number of religious bodies will unite in the reception of the Congress and the conduct of its meetings. Among these the Universalists are deservedly prominent. For more than one hundred and thirty-five years the Universalist Church has borne loyal testimony to the truths of liberal Christianity in this country. In Boston, especially, its great leader, Dr. Hosea Ballou, and Dr. A. A. Miner, the devoted apostle of temperance, have left behind them moral and spiritual influences still potent in the up-building of the higher life of the city. In New York Dr. E. H. Chapin, eminent for his scholarship and remarkable oratory, was no less a power. All over the United States the leaven of Universalist teaching has entered the current beliefs of Christendom to lift them to more humane and spiritual interpretations of religious truth, and restore the Christian Church to the gospel of universal salvation proclaimed by its founder.

At present there are in this country 965 churches calling themselves Universalist, and 771 Sunday-schools. The denominational headquarters in Boston are at 30 West Street, where visitors to the Congress will be warmly welcomed.

The Universalist General Convention has appointed a delegation to represent it at the Boston Congress. Rev. Dr. Marion D. Shutter of Minneapolis, Rev. Frank O. Hall, D.D., of New York and Rev. F. W. Hamilton, D.D., of Boston will express the felicitations of their fellowship. Rev. F. A. Bisbee, D.D., editor of the Universalist Leader, whose columns are hospitably open to our cause, is a member of the executive committee of the Congress.

Another body of Religious Liberals affiliated with us in the work of the Congress is the Friends' General Conference, largely made up of the spiritual descendants of Elias Hicks and kindred witnesses for a liberal and progressive development of Christian truth. We hope to speak more fully in these columns concerning this important branch of the liberal household of faith. For the present we content ourselves with citing the following letter:—

PROF. OTTO PFLEIDERER, D.D.

The committee in charge of the Boston International Congress of Religious Liberals is gratified to announce that among the eminent scholars and religious teachers from abroad who have promised to participate in its meetings is the distinguished theologian and writer whose portrait is given above. Prof. Pfeleiderer since 1875 has occupied the chair of systematic theology in the theological faculty of the University of Berlin, Germany. Through his scholarly researches and learned and profound books he has become one of the great authorities of the religious world, especially as regards the history and philosophy of religion. His presence at the congress next September will of itself impart to it dignity and value.

Prof. Pfeleiderer was born in Wuerttemberg, Germany, in 1839, studied history and philosophy chiefly, from 1857 to 1861, at the University of Tuebingen, and then made a series of journeys in the interest of wider observation and study in North Germany, England, and Scotland. Later he served as an active pastor in several parishes, and was a lecturer at the University of Tuebingen. In 1870 he had been promoted to be a superintendent of churches in the Jena circuit and professor of practical theology at its famed university.

In 1875 he was called to his present chair

Dear Friend,—I am writing regarding the invitation sent to the Friends' General Conference lately held at Mountain Lake Park, Maryland, through Dr. Janney, its chairman, for Friends to be represented at the Council of Liberal Religious Thinkers in Boston next year. Let me say that the matter was presented to the full conference of about twelve hundred people, and was approved. It was then referred to the Central Committee, which is the business part of the conference, and by this committee was referred to the Committee for the Advancement of Friends' Principles, with instructions to work out the details and select the delegates as best wisdom might direct. Our committee will shortly enter into the spirit of this task.

The number of delegates is not mentioned in your letter. Our body is divided into seven yearly meetings, and from our standpoint it would be considered desirable to have each yearly meeting represented, provided we were expected to send ten or a dozen delegates. We shall hope for such further instruction in the matter as you may give.

In your letter you refer to us by implication at least as "the progressive Friends." We have no such title. We call ourselves the Religious Society of Friends. By our so-called orthodox brethren we are known as "Hicksites," although we accept no such title. I presume that we could as truthfully be differentiated from the other bodies of Friends by calling us "Liberal," as by any other word.

The persons to serve as vice-presidents of the Council and the person to be our "spokesman" will be selected soon.

I may say that by some of us the action of the conference in deciding to co-operate with the Council was considered a sign of a helpful forward movement, as it is a new departure.

Sincerely,

HENRY W. WILBUR,
General Secretary.

A similar communication of good-will and fellowship has been received from the American Christian Convention, representing over a thousand churches throughout the country. Delegates have been appointed by it to attend the Boston Congress. We hope to speak hereafter with fuller information concerning this action.

The Association of Liberal German Evangelical Ministers, representing a group of German churches principally in the Middle West (Cincinnati, Dayton, St. Louis, Pittsburg, etc.), have assured us of their sympathy with our purposes and intention to be represented at the Congress.

The liberally-minded rabbis of the Reformed Jewish congregations of the United States will be cordially welcomed to the Congress, and have indicated that they will participate in its proceedings.

A number of important religious associations other than churches have signified their friendliness and co-operation. Among these are the Free Religious Association of America, founded in 1868 by R. W. Emerson, W. J. Potter, F. E. Abbot, O. B. Frothingham, T. W. Higginson, and other radical thinkers. This society has exerted a wide influence in liberalizing thought and promoting a wider fellowship in the religion of America. It is represented on our executive committee by its president, Edwin D. Mead, a vice-president, Rev. C. W. Wendte, and a director, Rev. P. R. Frothingham.

The Congress of Religion, Dr. C. W. Thomas, president, and Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones, general secretary, has its headquarters in Chicago. It may be considered as the outgrowth and successor of the World's Parliament of Religions held in that city in 1892. Its annual conventions in various cities of the American Union are events of far-reaching importance in the religious world because of the catholicity and prominence of the participants, representing the leading churches of America, professedly orthodox as well as liberal. Mr. E. D. Mead, a director, will represent this society on the executive committee, and its organ, Unity, published in Chicago, cordially supports our endeavors.

The New York State Conference of Religion is a local organization with similar aims. It also will co-operate with us.

Besides these organizations of liberals there are in nearly all the larger denominations of the United States independent churches, groups of liberally-minded ministers and laity, and individual religious thinkers, who sympathize with the ideals of mental freedom, a broad and inclusive fellowship, progress in religion as in all else, tolerance to dissent, and an all-embracing charity,—in brief, with the principles and aims of that view of religion which it is the aim of the Boston Congress to advocate and increase.

We have already received gratifying assurances that these elements will be largely represented at our meetings. It is their presence and co-operation, indeed, which will give to it especial significance and value.

Their representative on the executive committee is Rev. George A. Gordon,

in Berlin, where for over thirty years he has been one of the lights of the greatest of German universities. Most of his books have not yet been translated into English, but they are familiar to theological scholars and students in all lands. Among the most notable are:—

1878. "Wesen der Religion" (The Nature of Religion).

1890. "Paulinismus."

1893. "Geschichte der Religiösen Philosophie" (a history of religious philosophy from Spinoza to our own day).

1896. "Religiöse Philosophie auf Geschichtlicher Grundlage" (an epoch-making work, tracing and establishing the historical origin and nature of religion, as opposed to the traditional idea of it as a supernatural and miraculous revelation).

1902. "Urchristentum" (an original and learned study of the origins of Christianity). The first volume of a translation into English has just appeared in London.

A valuable book by Dr. Pfeiderer, "The Development of Theology in Germany since Kant" appeared in English. Appended to it is a section dealing in a masterly way with "the progress of theology in Great Britain since 1825."

Another recent book, "Die Entstehung des Christentums" (1905), consisting of lectures given at the University of Berlin, has been translated into English under the title "Christian Origins" (published by B. W. Huebsch, New York, 1906; 295 pages; $1.50). This is a popular summary of the author's conclusions on this subject. It is an admirable little treatise, and deserves a wide reading for its breadth of scholarship and lucid exposition.

A more recent book of similar character is his "Religion und Religionen,"—a series of brilliant, concise, and scholarly lectures delivered last winter at Berlin, which, we hope, may also find a translator. It is interesting to learn that the topic of Prof. Pfeiderer's address before the Boston congress will be "The Development of Positive Religions into the Religion of Humanity," or ultimate religion.

Prof. Pfeiderer's manner on the platform is exceedingly impressive. At his lectures he uses no notes, but speaks with an inexhaustible fulness of knowledge and in a pure and graceful style. His exposition and arrangement of his material is lucidity itself, while his serious and reverent spirit shines through every utterance, befitting the dignity of his theme and the weight of his message. In private life he is the most genial and companionable of men. He comes from a talented family, a younger brother having almost equal reputation as a philosophic writer.

Where other liberal teachers have often been content to limit their radical opinions to their writings, Prof. Pfeiderer has borne brave personal testimony to the truth by associating and uniting his efforts with those unpopular reformers who seek, in Germany, to reorganize the Christian Church in harmony with liberal ideas and democratic principles.

C. W. W.

D.D., the honored pastor of the Old South (Trinitarian) Congregational Church in Boston, a scholar and preacher widely known for his intellectual virility and independence, and his large and inclusive spirit in matters of religious fellowship. In subsequent issues of this Bulletin we shall publish the names of representative men and women of orthodox church connection who have assured us of their sympathy and co-operation.

Finally, we may instance the great number of unattached religious thinkers and workers who will be attracted to a convention whose central purpose is to increase light and liberty among men, and to make more inclusive and tender the relations between earnest and religious spirits in all lands and peoples.

OUR GUESTS FROM ABROAD.

It is manifestly too early to know definitely the number and names of the delegates from foreign countries we shall have the privilege of entertaining at the Congress. A journey to America is a more formidable matter than a trip to Amsterdam or Geneva, and requires greater deliberation. But from information already received we may count on a delegation of at least 100 persons from Great Britain. A special fund has been created in that country with which to aid clergymen in the payment of steamship fares. The travel arrangements are in the hands of Thomas Cook & Son, who will issue early in 1907 a booklet giving detailed information respecting the reduced fares secured on various Atlantic steamships lines, dates of sailing, etc.

Information on these points may be secured from Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, British Secretary of the International Congress, at Essex Hall, Essex Street Strand, London.

Among the eminent speakers whom we may hope to hear at the Boston meetings are Prof. J. Estlin Carpenter, principal of Manchester College, Oxford; Rev. John Hunter, pastor Trinity Congregational Church, Glasgow; Rev. P. H. Wicksteed, lecturer and author; Rev. W. C. Bowie, secretary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association; Rev. L. P. Jacks, editor of the Hibbert Journal; Revs. C. J. Street of Bolton, W. G. Tarrant of London, and others.

From Holland will come a strong delegation of modern theologians, including Profs. B. D. Eerdmans and H. J. Groenewegen of the University of Leiden, Prof. Meyboom of the University of Groningen, Revs. F. C. Fleischer, P. H. Hugenholtz, E. Binnerts, and other representatives of the Dutch Reformed, Baptist, Remonstrant, and other churches.

From Germany we have yet to hear in response to our invitations, but we are able to announce the coming of Prof. Otto Pfeiderer of the University of Berlin, the distinguished scholar and Altmeister of liberal theology.

From Switzerland will come Prof. E. Montet, dean of the Theological Faculty of the University of Geneva and president of our International Council, together with Rev. E. Rochat, pastor of one of the National Swiss Reformed churches in Geneva. We hope also for the presence of Rev. L. Maystre, president of the Synod, and of the venerable and eloquent Father Hyacinthe (Loyson) and his talented wife. Rev. L. Ragaz, minister at the Cathedral of Basel, will attend the Congress, and we hope for other delegates.

From Florence, Italy, will come the pastor of the French-Italian Evangelical Church, Rev. Tony André.

France sends us Prof. Bonet-Maury of the University of Paris, Prof. Jean Réville, the editor of the Review of Religious History, Rev. J. E. Roberty of the French Protestant Church of the Oratory in Paris, and we hope also Prof. Paul Sabatier, and Rev. Charles Wagner of Paris, author and preacher, whose addresses were an important feature of our third congress in Geneva.

From Hungary we expect to welcome Prof. Dr. G. Boros, head of the Unitarian College at Kolozsvár, Transylvania, and Rev. N. Jozan of Budapest. From Belgium, Norway, Denmark, Sweden, and other European countries, from Australia, India, Japan, we hope to welcome distinguished representatives of liberal religious faith.

Nearly all these speakers are familiar with the English tongue.

Besides those named others, intending to be at the Congress, will make themselves known to our committee, and will be named in succeeding numbers of this Bulletin.

Not what does a man believe, but what is his attitude toward the spirit of Truth? is the all important question.—DR. A. H. BRADFORD.

The only hope of preserving what is best, lies in the practice of an immense charity, a wide tolerance, a sincere respect for opinions that are not ours.—P. G. HAMERTON.

the gorse-bush afire in the golden days of summer, and to many of us that seems a very illuminating little story!

There is no exhilaration like that which the sunlight of January or February gives, because there is no time in the year when the heart leaps out to gladness more gratefully. The imperious longing for light and happiness in all of us is never quenched, and, if we are normal, we respond to the kindling of the heavens as a child responds to caresses: The smell of the earth, the moist, mild touch of the air, the prospect of white clouds drifting over the blue, the twittering of birds, the sparkle of water (if it is only a gutter-stream swollen by recent rain!), the lace-like patterns of branches already so anxious to bud, the blue haze that shrouds the horizon in wistful beauty—all these touch responsive chords in our being under the influence of that golden light which is, later on, to become as common as daily bread. One is surprised to hear the music those chords give forth! So many people talk disparagingly of "mere emotion," and unrestrained feeling," that sensitive people shyly cover up their warm hearts lest mankind should detect their beating; while others try to persuade themselves and the world that they have no hearts at all. Besides, to trill our spring madrigals out of season is as dreadful as to laugh in a Puritan household on "the Lord's Day!" But the Spirit of Beauty is so much more unorthodox than we are; and, though men label her manifestations, and divide her glory into sections, she knows neither seasons nor sabbaths. That is one reason why her influence is so reconciling in a world where men are always engaged in controversies, even on such subjects as the love of God, or the brotherhood of Man! Our ideas about beauty may differ to an extraordinary degree; but as long as we are all made of the same flesh, and dowered with the same human needs, we shall rejoice in green grass and flowing rivers, in opening flowers and ripening crops, in the breath of the woodland, and the colour of the sky. For these things are associated in our minds with physical well-being, no less than with æsthetic enjoyment; and there is no excuse for pessimism so potent as the reflection that what is vital to all is denied to millions. He who looks churlishly at the winter sunlight because it rouses him from selfish musings on the bitterness of his own past, or the ingratitude of the world, is a degenerate to whom the face of the earth is "sicklied o'er" with the "pale cast" of unfruitful melancholy. But he whose healthy joy in light and colour is momentarily restrained by the remembrance of stunted souls into which the glory of Nature never finds entrance, has in his breast seeds sown by "the Power not ourselves," which will ultimately restore all men to their birthright of happiness. The lover of beauty who sees deeper than the surface-colouring of things will never be riotous in his joy; he is too full of wonder for empty lightness of heart. But he turns with infinite pity to those who tread the unsunned paths—whose hands are full of ashes instead of flowers; and even the sunlight of winter shall be shadowed for him until their faces, also, are turned to it with gladness. LAURA ACKROYD.

TOWARDS SOCIAL REFORM.

COLLECTIVE OWNERSHIP—ITS ETHICAL SIGNIFICANCE.

MR. EDWARDS' reply to Mr. Simon seems to me conclusive over most of the ground that it covers, but I would like to associate myself with Mr. Simon in his protest that these constant girdings against trade should cease. If we have actual acquaintance with leaders of industry and know something of the difficulties they encounter in dealing with those whose labour they direct and of personal interest they take in the welfare of those who are dependent on their decisions, and of the keenness of the competition they have to meet, we shall not want to condemn them indiscriminately.

I think all who are earnest in seeking social reform have a good deal in common which may now be recognised as a terminus a quo further advance should be sought.

I. (1) Competition has done much good, and has done nearly all the good it is capable of doing. It has provided fine specimens and "selected" individuals who have risen from their own into a higher rank. It will never raise a whole class or lift up the residuum. It drives a wedge not beneath society but through society. It is a race, and by increasing the pace of the runners you do not make all winners. The successful families of the middle-classes represent the winners, and are naturally attached to what has been good for them and their recent ancestors; but this should not make us blind to the fact that competition is strictly limited in the improvement it can effect. Moreover, all the modern growth of benevolence which keeps the "unfit" alive without making them "fit to survive" still further limits, and to a most serious extent impairs, the good that can be done by competition.

(2) Competition itself is being confined within more and more narrow limits with the progress of civilisation.

This applies not only to the Post Office and Tramways and similar undertakings, but to every industry where efficiency is favoured by concentration, more and more the choice is coming to be between a "Trust" of the new American pattern, and an old English Trust like that of the Mersey Dock and Harbour Board which is administered for the benefit of the whole community. It is supposed that we have lately defeated a "Soap Trust." This appears to be doubtful, but in any case the public would have no interest in defeating such a combination if it had adequate assurance that the business would be carried on for the benefit of all who use soap. I fancy we should quickly have a "Coal Trust" of the right—i.e. the Mersey Dock—sort if colliery owners ventured to combine to form a "Trust" of the wrong, or American sort: National and municipal authorities must, of course, appoint those who manage such undertakings, and their gradual extension, if well managed, is proof of higher and firmer civilisation.

II. On the other hand, there are certain facts which, if not ignored by Socialists, do not always receive the attention they deserve:—

(1) The Eighth Commandment:

(2) The sacrifice that must be made of individual freedom in certain directions, and the necessity of proving that this is not inconsistent with allowing greater freedom in other directions, so that the net result shall be gain, not loss, of liberty. Nothing can be more misleading than the way Socialists talk of industrial slavery: It is because we have not slavery, but allow a man to work or be idle, to drink or be sober, to marry, have children, train them up well or neglect them, as he pleases, that we have all our worst cases of poverty. One of the urgent needs of the present time is a reform of the Poor Law which will curtail the liberty of incorrigible "tramps," and afford more assistance to the unemployed workman who is really seeking a job. This distinction is well marked in Switzerland, Denmark, and Germany.

Trade unions have lifted the aristocracy of labour out of the deep, because their members have been willing to sacrifice individual liberty for the common good. In some of the professions, analogous restrictions have operated in the same way. Now, Socialists have to make clear what is the restriction they propose to lay upon other classes, perhaps on the whole community, and to show that the net result will not be fatal to that liberty which we all love so well. This is a point upon which J. S. Mill bestowed some careful thinking, the result of which will be found in his Political Economy: Here we must provide a remedy against the danger to which our attention is called by Mr. W. Simpson in his letter in your last issue. Assuredly we do not want conformity compulsory over our whole lives, but it is no less certain that if we are to retain the liberty most worth having we must give up what we can better spare.

(3) There is a very real limitation to the amount of public spirit on which we can rely for the management of concerns in which our own interest, either self-regarding or altruistic, is itself strictly limited. It is curious to note how quickly this applies to all delegated authority. For some years I was correspondent and hon. sec. to a large undenominational school here: The expenses were mainly defrayed by Government grants, but enough remained for us to meet by subscription to make us feel that the school was our own; and for every step we took, every appointment we made, the managers were responsible. Now the whole tone is different. The question always is: What can we induce the County Education Committee to do; how much can we get out of them? It would be easier to keep up our own tone if our own school were not one of scores similarly situated, all trying to get as much as they can out of a central authority. I do not suppose the Act could be anywhere better administered than it is in Dorset, but the degradation in the public spirit of local management produced by the present system is grievous: I do not want to enter upon the education question generally, but simply to furnish an illustration which has come forcibly under my notice of a danger which Socialists have to meet. When the change was made from grants to individual schools, supplemented by subscriptions, to grants to a county authority, supplemented by rates, we moved another step towards socialistic ideals, but made no adequate provision for meeting the loss which accompanied the gain:

III. We are moving towards socialism, but we are moving slowly and with many misgivings, because the real limitation to social reorganisation is a moral limit. We could move faster and more securely if all public-spirited men and women were prepared to admit that individualism has done nearly all the good it can do, and that the gradual, thoughtful advance of collectivism can alone do much more for the establishment of the kingdom of God upon earth. Let Mr. Simpson rest assured that it is precisely because we believe, as he does, in Christianity rather than in force, that we desire to see competition gradually replaced by co-operation, individualism by collectivism, and the motive of self-interest by that of service. The difficulty of reconciling the claims of Christianity with those of competitive strife has been heart-breaking. We are more hopeful of what may be done on other lines. It is interesting to note how clearly Matthew Arnold saw the contrast and how well he put the truth in his lines on Rugby Chapel, commemorating his father. He gives a powerful description of a band of travellers crossing a dangerous pass in the high Alps. An avalanche and other disasters are graphically described; there is a vivid picture of the difficulties through which we struggle on life's journey. At length one traveller gets through and reaches a safe refuge on the other side. But he arrives alone. Where are his companions? Where are the rest of the band? All lost! And then, with deep emotion, Matthew Arnold declares that this was not the way his father trod, but that his whole life was devoted to bringing his companions with him:

"But thou would'st not alone
Be saved, my father! alone
Conquer and come to thy goal,
Leaving the rest in the wild.
We were weary, and we Fearful, and we in our march
Fain to droop down and to die.
Still thou turned'st, and still Beckoned'st the trembler, and still Gavest the weary thy hand.
If, in the paths of the world,
Stones might have wounded thy feet,
Toil or dejection have tried
Thy spirit, of that we saw Nothing—to us thou wast still Cheerful and helpful and firm!
Therefore to thee it was given
Many to save with thyself
And, at the end of thy day,
O faithful shepherd! to come,
Bringing thy sheep in thy hand."

THE objections to the divisive creeds, to the petty dogmatism, the small sectarian animosities—these objections are not any longer that they interfere with our peace of mind. We have learned to stand them and thrive on them personally. The objection is that they interfere with our work, our common work, God's work here upon the earth; and the great plea for union is the plea for the economic efficiency of the Christian life.—S. M. Crothers.

THE THEISTIC CONFERENCE, INDIA.

THE Theists of India held their Annual Conference at Calcutta during the four days beginning December 26, 1906. There was a representative gathering of Theists from Bengal, Bombay, Madras, the Punjab, and other districts of India. Mr. G. W. Brown, a member of the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, was present. The proceedings commenced with a religious service conducted by Prof. Benoyendra Nath Sen, M.A., whose recent visit to this country readers of THE INQUIRER will remember. On the evening of December 26 the large hall was crowded, when His Highness the Maharaja of Moubhanj delivered a noble address on "Theism—the need of India." He said:—

"The spectacle of such a representative gathering is certainly a source of comfort, shall I not add, of strength, to all who strive to-day to extend the cause of Rational Piety and Spiritual Religion. It sustains us in our spiritual strivings, and charges with energy the hope that the great vision of a National Church for New India may be verified at no very distant date. Here in this hall are brought together men who love spiritual life more than the 'creeds' of religions, and faith and fellowship more than forms of faith. Here is an illustration of what may be spoken of as a Religious Federation broad-based on inter-religious co-operation. For the deepening of spiritual life—for a frank and free communication of thoughts and convictions and religious experiences—for a re-wording of the vital truth of spiritual sympathy which bears all and beholds in all an image of God's Truth growing 'with the process of the suns'—for re-interpreting the thought that modern India needs the sustaining force of spiritual Theism—we are met together.

"To my mind there is no question fraught with such far-reaching consequences in the future as the one about the religious re-awakening of this country. Spirituality and asceticism are the natural endowments of our countrymen, but under the burden of material civilisation which has come upon us, they stand in some danger of losing their hold. I am far from decrying the blessings which modern civilisation has conferred and will confer on us; but it is meet that our moral progress should keep pace with it. True progress consists in the simultaneous development of all departments of human activity, and not in that of one at the expense of another. If the important department of religion be neglected, there will be an atrophy of a vital part in the race-organism, which will be a source of weakness in the long run. The glory and greatness of ancient India was in her religion, and the glory and greatness of modern India will also be in her religion. Let the memory of the past be an incentive to spiritual progress, and not a cloak to hide our present shortcomings.

"At the present moment we see around us activity in all directions. Questions regarding political rights, industrial development, social reform, are engaging universal and serious attention, but the religious problem remains where it was. It does not seem to receive the amount of attention and thought that its importance demands. The reason for this indifference is not difficult to find. Things that meet the eyes, that are readily handled, and meet our immediate animal wants intrude themselves upon our attention in unending variety. The more we fix our attention upon them the stronger the spell they throw around us, while things unseen are apparently remote and do not therefore readily lend themselves to our comprehension; they are unnoticed except by those thoughtful few who have an eye upon the present as well as the future:

"But it does not follow that things which remain behind the veil are of less moment to us than the things of ordinary commerce. On the contrary, if the human soul is to retain its pristine nobility and vigour, and if it is to fulfil its destiny, things spiritual must no less be its concern than things material. To realise this, to realise the transitory character of terrestrial existence, to realise that religion is the backbone of all true and unselfish life, that it is the motive power which is behind all moral actions either in individuals or in nations, a contemplative mood is absolutely essential.

"From the hoary past of which we have any record up to the present day, every generation has seen heroic bands of enthusiasts leaving hearth and home and all that man holds dear in their search after the unseen. We find in all countries and in all ages there have been men who have exemplified in their lives the tremendous influence which religion exercises over human affairs.

"Undoubtedly there have been numbers of men in all ages and in all countries over whom religion has had very little influence. It is no more my purpose to deny this fact than to deny that there is evil in this world. It is true also that in the name of religion much human blood has been shed and many atrocities perpetrated; but religion has been unfairly charged with the sins of irreligion and the excesses of its votaries. And the large fact lives that in the history of the world, and in the lives of individuals, religion has played an all-important part, and that living religion wherever found is a force to be reckoned with.

"The greatest privilege which we enjoy in this age is the freedom of thought. It is the greatest achievement of modern civilisation. The marvellous conquest of men over the secrets of nature, the marvellous inventions by which the forces of nature are enlisted in the service of mankind, are some of the results of this freedom on the physical side. The greater regard for the suffering of living creatures, the greater efforts for their alleviation, the greater respect paid to the opinions and beliefs of others, are some of its results on the moral side. No longer are we required to submit to fetters forged by age or fixed by tradition. No longer is the faculty of reason a captive in the prison of dogma. But if the freedom we enjoy is great our responsibility is greater. In an age when authority had a greater hold upon the minds of people, the faculty of understanding was willingly surrendered to the commands of dogma. That was perhaps a necessity of the age. But things have changed, and we are in danger of running to the other extreme and mistaking licence for freedom."

After discussing the limitations of reason and the ultimate problems of metaphysics, the Maharaja pleaded that a spiritual interpretation of thought and life alone explains or satisfies the needs of man. We give one further extract from this exceedingly able and touching address :—

"It is, however, in the moment of sorrow—of that deep sorrow which is the lot of man—when heaven and earth seem an utter blank, when the heart is lacerated by the agonies of despair, when mind finds no rest except in the most fervent prayer to the Most High, it is in that supremely critical yet blessed moment that man hears distinctly a voice whispering into his ears words of hope and love; then he receives support and strength to bear up with all the suffering that the world can inflict, and he begins to feel that sorrow is a blessing in disguise. He who has realised all this holds in his hands a key to the enigma of the world. It is no longer to him a fortuitous concourse of atoms but the divinely planned habitat of living beings; human beings are no longer the playthings of blind, fatalistic forces, but the 'offspring' of God after His own image."

On the second day, Pundit S. N. Sastri, M.A., preached the morning sermon, and also read a paper on "The Future of the Brahmo Samaj," which was followed by a discussion in which the Hon. Mr. Justice Chandravarkar, Dr. P. K. Ray, Prof. Ruchi Ram, the President of the Conference, Mr. R. V. Naidu, and others took part.

On the third day the morning service was conducted by Mr. Justice Chandravarkar, of Bombay. A paper was read by Babu P. C. Roy, of Bankipur, on the provincial Samajes. He said that he found more people ready to believe in the Fatherhood of God than to act up to the duties involved in the Brotherhood of Man.

In the evening public addresses were delivered. Mr. Justice Chandravarkar said the message of the Brahmo Samaj was the harmony of the action of the West and the contemplation of the East. Prof. Benoyendra Nath Sen spoke on the significance of "Religious Education." Prof. T. L. Vaswani pointed out that the message which the Brahmo Samaj had for modern India and modern Humanity was made eloquent in Keshub Chunder Sen. He spoke on the "Vital Value of Keshub's Ideal," and dwelt on the triple aspect of God-Vision—cosmic, psychologic, and historic. Principal Heromba Chandra Maitra showed the message of the Brahmo Movement was an all-embracing interpretation of Life. Mr. Naidu emphasised the thought that Religion was in essence God-Vision; that this God-Vision was not a theory, not an abstraction, but a supreme and sanctifying reality; that this reality must become for us the informing principle of all activities—individual, social, political, and religious.

On the fourth day the morning service was conducted by Babu B. D. Narain, of Bankipur. In the afternoon various resolutions were adopted, including one conveying cordial greetings to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and to the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers: A committee was appointed to consider the question of establishing a Theological College in India for the training of Brahmo ministers and missionaries.

The World and the New Dispensation, in its issue of December 30, we are glad to see, states that the great ideal of inter-religious co-operation prevailed over attempts at partisan propagandism. The address of His Highness the Maharaja of Moubhanj, from which we have made several extracts, made a deep impression, because of its culture and piety, and the fervour of its religious faith.

SEVENTY-SEVENTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE BRAHMO SAMAJ.

In a series of meetings extending from Jan. 15 to 27 the seventy-seventh anniversary of the Brahmo Samaj of India was celebrated at Calcutta. In London the anniversary was also kept on Friday evening, Jan. 25, by a gathering of some forty friends, of whom fifteen were Indians, at Essex Hall.

A brief religious service was conducted by the Rev. J. Page Hopps, opening with Samuel Longfellow's well-known hymn,—

God of ages and of nations,
Every race and every time
Hath received thine inspirations, Glimpses of thy truth divine.

and the other hymns were Samuel Johnson's "Life of ages richly poured," and Whittier's,— Oh, sometimes gleams upon our sight!

Through present wrong the eternal right.
Mr. Hopps read selections from the Hebrew, Christian, and other ancient scriptures of the East, and by way of address read what he had said many years ago (in 1870) at Glasgow, where he was then minister, in the presence of Keshub Chunder Sen: Mr. Hopps organised a great town's meeting, and on the day before spoke at his Sunday morning service, when Mr. Sen was present, and made a brief response. The address was based upon the vision of the heavenly Jerusalem, with its twelve gates facing to the East and West, North and South, at which all might come in, and dwell upon the sympathy of religions and the universal Fatherhood of God.

After the service the chair was taken by the Rev. JAMES HARWOOD, who recalled the deep interest with which ten years ago he had been present at that anniversary in Calcutta, when he was there as the guest of the late A. M. Bose: It was a great day for their brethren in India, and it was an occasion which he could never forget. They had recently suffered heavy losses through death, and particularly through the departure of the venerated Maharshi D. N. Tagore and Mr. P. C. Mozoomdar, and still more recently of Mr. A. M. Bose.

Professor CHATERJEE moved a resolution of commemoration, recording their deep sense of loss in the death of Mr. A. M. Bose and of Professor Mohit Chunder Sen: This was seconded by a Mr. Sen, and passed in reverent silence.

Mr. S. HALDAR, of Manchester College, Oxford, then read a paper on "The Message of Brahmoism." He spoke of religion as the feeling of the soul after God, and pointed to various movements of recent times as, under different forms, expressions of the one essential spirit. Babism in Persia, Stundism in Russia, Unitarianism in England, and Universalism in America he regarded as all moving towards the same end. All religions of the world were stepping-stones towards the one ideal religion, and that was what Brahmoism in India sought to express. Its fundamental thought was of the unity and eternity of God and inward communion of the soul with Him:

At the conclusion of Mr. Haldar's paper, Dr. B. C. Ghosh gave a brief address on "Doctrines of Incarnation in various Theologies," which was followed by a discussion. We confess that what we heard of it left upon us the impression that even that brief portion of the time devoted to commemoration and religious fellowship might have been used to better purpose. When more than a week can be devoted to the anniversary, place may well be found for such discussions, but hardly when all that is best in such an occasion must be concentrated in a single evening.

A FAREWELL AT CAPE TOWN.

We have already reported the return of the Rev. J. T. Davis to his congregation at Chatham, and have since received from Cape Town the following pleasant account of the farewell to him at the Free Protestant Church of that city :—

On Sunday evening, December 29, 1906, a full congregation attended at the Free Protestant (Unitarian) Church, Cape Town, to listen to the farewell discourse of the Rev. J. Tyssul Davis, of Chatham, who had been in temporary charge of the church since September, during the absence, through ill-health, of the Rev. Ramsden Balmforth.

Mr. Davis spoke in very feeling terms of the interest and pleasure which his stay in Cape Town had afforded him, and of the kindness shown to him by the members of the church, whom he congratulated on the good fellowship which he found existing among them. After the service an informal leave-taking took place, and speeches were made by Messrs. H. E. Agate and H. Tucker, members of the Church Committee, who, on behalf of the congregation, referred to the help and pleasure which Mr. Davis had given to his hearers by his inspiring and eloquent sermons, and expressed their warm appreciation not only of his kindness in coming so far to assist them in their time of need, but also of the fraternal generosity shown by his own flock in allowing him to leave them.

Mr. Davis was specially asked to convey to the Chatham congregation the sincere gratitude of the church in Cape Town for their kindly action, and the hope was expressed that as a result of their pastor's visit a lasting link of interest and goodwill would be established between the two churches, it being pointed out that such a friendly connection would be particularly encouraging and valuable to the isolated body of worshippers in Cape Town, who constitute the only Unitarian church existing in South Africa.

MANCHESTER DOMESTIC MISSION

WITH reference to Mr. Darbishire's "remonstrance" as to a quite innocent report of ours on Christmas at the Missions, Mr. Peach wrote last week. We also received a letter from Mr. E. C. Harding, who was for many years closely associated with the work of the Mission, and who, as a veteran, fully cognisant of the facts, has a strong claim to be heard. We quote from Mr. Harding's letter:—

"It is much to be regretted and difficult to understand why Mr. Darbishire should, after so many years, bring to the notice of your readers an unpleasant incident in the life of the Manchester Domestic Mission. The members of the committee cannot defend themselves without reflecting upon others, and must therefore remain silent. But it is only fair to say that the action then taken has resulted in a great improvement in all departments of the Willert-street branch of the Mission. The Sunday School, which numbered about 25 scholars, now has 450 to 500; the church, which had an attendance of about 20, now has 100 to 150, and in all the other agencies there has been a similar improvement, and the visiting of the poor in their homes has been continued.

"It was my privilege to take an active part in resuscitating this branch of the Domestic Mission, which was one of my last acts of fifty years' service, and I look back upon our work with much satisfaction and thankfulness. The Mission and the outcome of it, the Recreation Society, partly under the same roof, are now exercising a powerful influence for good in one of the poorest and most populous districts of Manchester."

We deprecate any further correspondence on this subject. There was in our original report none of the sinister intention which was read into it, nor can we suppose that Mr. Darbishire, for his part, is anxious to do or say anything that would injure the Manchester Missions, which are deserving of the most generous and whole-hearted support.

SCOTTISH UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

SIR,—Mr. Russell, the esteemed secretary of the Scottish Unitarian Association, tells us that he values correspondents who supply reliable information; and believing that I have something of this nature to communicate, I gladly respond to his invitation. Is the Scottish Association in any way to blame for what has taken place in Kilmarnock? That is the question we have to decide. Mr. Russell believes that it is not, while I, on the contrary, entertain the opposite opinion, and in proof of that position I desire to put before your readers the following facts:—

(1) In the Autumn of 1904 the Scottish Association had fully decided to carry on the work in Clerk's-lane Church, Kilmarnock, and for this purpose applied to the Macquaker Trustees for a grant of £150, supporting that application by a special deputation to London. The Trustees declined to grant more than £120. This refusal caused some irritation in the local committee, and they, in turn, refused to save the situation, as they might have done, by making a supplementary grant. Seeing there was likely to be a block, the necessary balance of £30 was ultimately raised by individuals through the Kilmarnock church, but this did not satisfy a considerable minority in the Scottish Committee, including the late secretary, who now discovered that the church building was in such a bad state of repair that it ought to be sold at once, and moved accordingly. That motion was defeated by a small majority. What gave rise to this sudden change? Can it have been annoyance at the Macquaker Trustees' refusal?

(2) The feeling did not subside, being kept alive by the action of the then secretary, Mr. J. W. Davidson, who, in his correspondence with the secretary of the Kilmarnock church, made no secret of the fact that he disapproved of the services being continued under the existing conditions, and made serious charges against the parties through whose influence this was being done, especially against the Macquaker Trustees, whom he accused of acting dishonourably and in bad faith. Unfortunately these letters were not private, but were signed as official, and afterwards read before the committee. They were distinctly calculated to hinder and discourage, and Mr. Russell may have the opportunity of reading them, if he pleases.

(3) At the close of 1905 the Scottish Association refused to allow the Congregation further use of the church building unless a guarantee were given relieving them of all financial responsibility. The motion to sell the building was again pressed, and again defeated by a small majority.

(4) At the close of the last financial year (1906) I was from home, and could not attend the Annual Meetings held about October, but on my return I found that I was no longer on the committee, that it had now been resolved to sell the church building at Kilmarnock, and further, shortly afterwards, I learned that the little congregation, finding that they were to be deprived of their building, had resolved not to continue the services.

Now, Sir, in the light of these facts, I ask you, has this Association, as the natural guardian of the Kilmarnock church, done all that it could have done, or ought to have done, on its behalf? There can be but one answer. How could any church thrive when a strong party in the parent Association, which owned the church building, was striving for years to sell that building, not by agreement with the congregation, but against the will of the congregation, and that minority ultimately becomes the majority? Can we say that this Association is in no way to blame? What it ought to have done was—(a) Made a supplementary grant in 1904, and encouraged the congregation in every way possible. (b) Refused to confirm letters by the late secretary making accusations against the Macquaker Trustees, and instructed him to say or do nothing calculated to discourage the common cause. (c) At the end of 1905, granted the use of the church building freely and ungrudingly, and again encouraged the congregation. (d) Instead of finally deciding to sell the church building, they ought, if it required repairs, to have assisted the congregation to raise funds for the purpose of carrying out that object. To sell the building ought to be the last resort after every other means has failed.

In conclusion, I put the whole past history aside, and concentrate on this last point. If it be not too late, I appeal to the Scottish Association, to the Macquaker Trustees, and the Unitarians of Scotland generally on behalf of this church. It is a church with many sacred associations, situated in the central part of an important Radical town. It is in the county of Ayr, to which the Macquaker Trustees are enjoined in their Trust Deed to give special attention. If sold it will probably fall into the hands of some orthodox denomination, who will make it a success, proving that it is not the state of the building nor the location that is fatal to it. And lastly, when this great wave of awakening interest in the New Theology is passing over the country, surely this is not a time to close our churches, but rather one that calls upon us to redouble our efforts in order to carry our message to the world. If we have such a message, and have faith in its power to redeem and bless mankind, this appeal will not be in vain. A little money will do all that is required, and I am prepared to contribute my share.

Is it too late?

JAMES GRAHAM,

Ex-President of the Scottish Unitarian Association.

Hazelwood, Bridge of Weir,
January 28, 1907.

SIR,—I regret having any occasion for controversy with the secretary of the Scottish Unitarian Association, though I expected that my criticism of that body would draw forth a reply. Mr. Russell, in his hasty and careless letter, charges me with making incorrect statements, but deals with one only. What are the others? He quotes from the Constitution to show that churches may still be connected with the Association, but he suppressed the fact that the Association dropped the making of grants to churches as part of its duty. Thus it cut itself off from churches. Judging by our experience as a church, I am entitled to speak of scorn and neglect on the part of the Association of a disgraceful kind; but I will spare your readers the painful recital. Our present disconnection with the Association is our protest against studied insult. Mr. Russell's insinuation that the Aberdeen Church kept to the Association for the sake of grants is unworthy of him. He ought to know that we have not got a grant from the Association for years, and yet we loyally supported it. I think he should withdraw his ungenerous and inaccurate assertion.

Mr. Russell writes accurately enough of my absence from Committee meetings. That absence is accounted for by the fact that attendance of meetings meant for me the loss of two days and an outlay for railway fare which I could not afford. What meeting he refers to particularly when I was not there to support him I know not, but I remember that when last I stood up to plead for Kilmarnock I was autocratically silenced.

I have kept clearly in touch with the Kilmarnock Church for the last eleven years, and knew intimately its whole history. I cannot acquit the Association of grave blame in its treatment of the congregation.

Mr. Russell may not have faith in and practical knowledge of such an appeal as I referred to. For the church of which he is now minister I made a personal appeal to our body, and totally cleared the debt from it. I did the same for Kilmarnock when we were pressed to pay off a loan, and had a prompt and serviceable response. I tested the sympathy of the body in the same way for Aberdeen with success. I think such an appeal should have been made for Kilmarnock by the Association, and feel sure the church there would have been saved. The shutting of that church is a shameful black mark against us. Can it not, even yet, be undone? For urging another effort I do not deserve the pandies in Mr. Russell's letter.

ALEX WEBSTER.

TEACHING THE LAWS OF HEALTH.

SIR,—I should like to bear out what Miss Gittins says in your last issue on the above subject. Especially would I urge our ministers and churches to induce Mrs. Crompton (Rivington Hall, Bolton-le-Moors, Lancs.) to visit their schools and congregations. Practical experience should be worth something, and we here in Denton are deeply indebted to Mrs. Crompton, who last week paid us a visit and gave an address to mothers in the afternoon and one to young women (elder scholars) in the evening. Such intense interest was shown by the latter that we have asked Mrs. Crompton to come again, which she has consented to do, and this time will address a mixed audience as well as the Young Women's Class and the Young Men. Her subjects largely cover the ground of Mr. Lummis's appeal. She helps her hearers to "know how to live."

No doubt there is other work of this character going on in our churches. May we say we have got the "living creature"? What we now want is "the wheels"—the work wants organising.

Some of us who were present at the meeting at the Memorial Hall hope that the new "Union for Social Service" will help in this matter.

THE NEW THEOLOGY.

"The New Theology!" "They call it new, The letter-writers in this wordy war:

Why, Clement, he of Alexandria,
Proclaimed it: Gnostic guesses too
Foreshadowed it: and earlier still
St. Paul announced it from Mars Hill,
So old it is, and yet
You call it New."

O friend! Why fret?

If it be true,

Though very old,

'Tis always new:

Truth's hoary locks are ever wet
With morning dew.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

SOUTH EASTERN COUNTIES.

IN this letter I shall take no notice of the London churches which form part of the Provincial Assembly, for these have been quite recently under review in your columns, but deal generally with the country churches scattered over the South-Eastern counties. The district is large, extending from Halstead on the northern side of Essex, to the coast of Sussex, and from Newbury in Berkshire to Southend-on-Sea. It is not easy to give anything like a correct estimate of what is being done by the various churches. No figures can tabulate spiritual results, as it can those which are material. The builder sees the wall rising, as he lays brick upon brick, but the spiritual builder is working with invisible bricks and rearing a spiritual fabric whose walls cannot always be seen. The artist sees the picture growing on his canvas as he works at it day by day, but the spiritual artist is painting away in the unseen. His eye cannot always behold the impressions, the touches of beauty he makes. Sometimes the result of his work on human lives may be seen in the beautifying of character, in the conversion of the ungodly, in the comforting a sorrow, in the uplifting of the depressed, and yet the greater part of his work must be done in simple faith, leaving results with God. If, however, we are true to God and faithful in our work, there will be results somewhere, somehow, somewhen.

We need to remember that our work is to a large extent foundation work. Like Colonial settlers, we have a great deal of ground to clear of noxious weeds and theological growths that have turned the fair field of Christian truth into a wilderness of errors. Like men who lay the foundations of a breakwater in the sea, and fling tons of rock and months of toil into the deep, have nothing to show but horny hands and tanned faces, so we must expect to work on patiently before we shall see much fruit to our labour. But as after a time the huge granite wall heaves its rugged shoulders out of the sea, and by service as a breakwater explains and justifies the hidden work of the past, so by and by, the walls of a noble spiritual temple will be built up, which will explain and justify all our patient, plodding, hopeful toil.

Unlike the orthodox churches we have to contend with prejudices which are deep-rooted and very pronounced in their antagonism to the Gospel we have to preach. This is manifest in all our attempts to extend the knowledge of our beliefs and principles. People seem to think that our mission is to destroy faith in the great verities of religion, and hesitate to accept any invitation to hear for themselves what we have to say. Hence the smallness of the audiences we gather not only in our churches but also when we make some special effort in some public hall. At Canterbury a series of Special Sunday Evening services was held during November in St. George's Hall, but the result was very unsatisfactory. The hall is in a central position and well fitted for a religious service. The services were well advertised in the press, by posters and circulars, but the attendance was very small. Canterbury is, of course, a very conservative place as regards religion and politics, but one would have thought that there were many in this old city who had outgrown the old creeds, and would have welcomed the opportunity of hearing the exponents of a rational religion. At Ilford the special effort has resulted in the formation of an organised congregation, which meets in the Assembly Room, in the Broadway. Its position is not the most desirable, but it is the only room available. It is near the junction of the electric trams, and the constant whirring sound and noise of gongs are not very conducive to worship and meditation. The local committee is very enthusiastic and anxious to secure a plot of land and erect a temporary building. The financial problem is the difficulty. It is hoped that some generous friend or friends will help them to solve the problem. The population of Ilford is about 50,000. The orthodox churches are large and prosperous. It is in these new and growing districts that we need to concentrate more of our attention, or we shall be left behind by the advancing tide of religious activity. People are moving away from the old centres of life to the regions beyond, and can scarcely be expected to maintain their connection with the old church when the distance is considered. New centres must be created to meet the growing need. Moreover, there can be no question that the tendency of religious thought to-day lies strongly in our direction. But our ability to take advantage of it will depend upon the character and intensity of our spiritual life and the measure of our devotion to the cause of liberal religion. We hail with delight the prospect of a Mission Van being employed within the Assembly's area during the coming summer. If it only arouses the churches themselves to more energetic action it will have accomplished a great work. It is useless to expect the continued life and health of our churches apart from an earnest and vigorous activity. It is the law of our personal and it is the law of our church life alike, that we can only get by giving, that we can only increase by scattering; that we can only attain greater fullness and completeness of life as we work and manifest ourselves outwardly.

We record with pleasure the successful work which the Rev. A. Farquharson is doing at Maidstone. Since his acceptance of the pastorate the church has received substantial accession to its membership and the congregation has been trebled. The chapel is now well filled with worshippers every Sunday. Mr. Farquharson has infused new life into the church, and his efforts to arouse interest in our rational faith have been followed with most gratifying results.

The neighbouring church at Chatham is also doing well under the ministry of the Rev. Tyssul Davis, who, by the way, has just resumed again his ministry, having been away in Cape Town supplying the pulpit of the Rev. R. Balmforth, who was requiring a period of rest from active work. During Mr. Davis's absence the pulpit was efficiently supplied by various ministers and laymen. The church at Dover, under its new pastor, the Rev. C. A. Ginever, B.A., has made steady progress in membership and attendance at the Sunday services. Additional accommodation has been provided for the needs of the Sunday-school and week-night activities. The newly erected school-rooms were formally opened by Mr. John Harrison on Wednesday evening. The Dover friends are to be congratulated upon their successful effort in making provision for the growing needs of the church. At Southend, Mr. Delta Evans has taken permanent charge of the church, and is rendering very acceptable service. A new pipe organ has been placed in the little church, the cost of which has been defrayed. The church at Guildford has been without a settled pastor more than twelve months. An arrangement was made with the Rev. C. E. Pike to take temporary charge of the pulpit, but that arrangement has now come to an end. At present, in conjunction with the local committee, I have undertaken to supply the pulpit until some definite arrangement can be made. The congregation is small. There is a nice little modern church building and school-room, free from debt. What is wanted is a minister who is able to devote himself to the work, and who is willing to accept a small stipend. Deal and Canterbury are now united under the pastorate of the Rev. J. H. Smith. A sale of work was recently held at Horsham in order to raise funds for the renovation of the church. Good reports are received from the churches at Brighton, Hastings, and Reading. At Bessell's Green, Billingshurst, Chelmsford, Ditchley, Godalming, Halstead, Lewes, Newbury, Northiam, Saffron Walden, Tenterden and Tunbridge Wells, ministers and laymen are doing what they can to spread our religious faith and build up the Kingdom of God.

The annual meetings of the Assembly held at Lewes in the autumn were of a most satisfactory character. The attendance was large and representative. The reports showed the need of increased financial support, and the delegates were urged to lay this matter before their various churches. The arrangements for the meetings and the hospitality provided were all that could be desired. Lewes was the first country church that entertained the Assembly. The church has sustained the loss of several friends since then, but it has a staunch supporter in Mr. J. H. Every, who is deeply interested in the welfare of the church.

Special efforts are to be made to increase the interest of the churches in the work of the Assembly, and to draw them together into a closer bond of fellowship. At the invitation of the Mansford-street Church, Bethnal Green, the churches in the East and North of London will hold a united meeting on the evening of February 16, when the aims and work of the Assembly will be emphasised. There will be a short devotional service at 7.30, followed by addresses and a social gathering.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Cardiff (Farewell).—The Rev. W. Whitaker, B.A., who for the past three years has been the minister of the West Grove Church, preached his farewell sermon on Sunday evening, and at the conclusion of the service, Mr. F. Childs, on behalf of the congregation, expressed the sorrow that was felt at his departure, and asked his acceptance of a silver tea service as a mark of their appreciation and esteem. Mr. T. Yates, Mr. W. A. Moore, Mr. T. Haviland, and the secretary (Mr. J. F. Stone), spoke in high terms of the ability displayed and the good work accomplished by both Mr. and Mrs. Whitaker. Wishes were expressed that they would have a successful ministry at Hull, whither they were going. Mr. Whitaker briefly expressed his thanks for the kindness and thoughtfulness which had prompted the gift, and his thanks also for the kind feeling which had always been shown to his wife and himself. Referring to Newport he hoped they would always look with interest and brotherly solicitude towards the chapel there. Mrs. Whitaker in a few words also expressed her thanks.

Coalville.—The second of the series of special services was taken by the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, of Nottingham, on January 20, when there was a good attendance to hear his lecture on Channing. The Rev. E. S. Lang Buckland, of Derby, concluded the series by a striking address on Savonarola last Sunday. The audiences have been interested, and it is hoped that some of those present at these services will now find their way to the regular meeting-room on Sundays.

Hull.—The annual tea and entertainment to about 100 old and needy folk, arranged by the Workers' League of the Park-street Church, was given on Saturday evening last, and was greatly enjoyed. Mr. Bailey Holmes presided, and the Rev. W. Lindsay expressed the thanks of the guests in a delightful little speech. Mr. Lindsay has occupied the pulpit for two months pending the arrival of the Rev. W. Whitaker, and, by his hearty, helpful zeal, evinced both in the services and in the various activities of the church, has gained the gratitude and regard of the congregation.

London: Brixton.—On Wednesday, January 23, Mr. J. H. Leigh kindly gave his splendid reading of "Julius Cæsar" at the meeting of the Social and Literary Union. His audience keenly enjoyed his rendering of the play. On Sunday evening last a musical service was held in the church, when a selection of anthems and instrumental pieces was well rendered by the choir, with organ and string orchestra. Mr. E. A. Reeves conducted, and Mr. John Harrison acted as organist.

Sheffield (Appointment).—Mr. J. Walter Cock, of Oxford, who has just completed a probationary term of three months as assistant minister to the Rev. C. J. Street at Upper Chapel, with special charge of the daughter church in Shirland-lane, Attercliffe, has won the confidence of all concerned, and has now been definitely appointed to this post. His induction services, unavoidably delayed, will take place on Sunday, March 17, the Rev. Dr. Carpenter taking the leading part in them.

Southend-on-Sea.—Last Sunday evening, at the Darnley-road Unitarian Church, Mr. Delta Evans preached on "The New Theology," the congregation being larger than for many weeks past. After the service Mr. Evans received a hearty invitation to address the Sunday afternoon Men's Own at an early date. This is of an undenominational character, and is usually attended by three to four hundred men. Professor Bhai Parmanand, M.A., a missionary of the Arya Samaj of India, has promised to address the congregation on February 10 on "The Great Religions of the World."

The veteran New Testament scholar, Professor Adolf Hilgenfeld, of Jena, passed away on January 12, at the age of 84. Already, in 1849, Hilgenfeld published a book on the Fourth Gospel and Epistles; his Historical and Critical Introduction to the New Testament appeared in 1875.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Provincial Assembly of London and the South-Eastern Counties is to hold a united meeting at Mansford-street Church, Bethnal Green, on Saturday evening next, Feb. 16. A devotional service will be conducted by the Revs. T. E. M. Edwards and Gordon Cooper, and addresses will afterwards be given by the Rev. F. H. Jones, the President, the Rev. F. K. Freeston, Mr. John Harrison, and Mr. Alfred Thompson. The service is at 7.30.

THE Rev. John Hunter, D.D., of Glasgow, is to preach at Essex Church, Kensington, on Sunday morning, Feb. 17. Dr. Hunter's friends should note this date, as it may be the only time he will be preaching in London this year.

Our readers received last week the first "Bulletin" of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers" in connection with the September meetings in Boston. In the same interest we publish this week the first of a series of articles on "The Pilgrim Fathers," by the Rev. F. K. Freeston.

THE Preston Memorial Buildings at Unity Church, Islington, are to be opened by Miss Preston on Tuesday next, the chair being taken by Mr. Grosvenor Talbot, President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

WE noted last week Dr. Garvie's acceptance of the headship of New College. This means that the London school of Congregational ministers is in future to be presided over by one who is a strong man and a theologian. Himself a pupil of Dr. Fairbairn's, Dr. Garvie is identified with the religious philosophy for which the head of Mansfield College stands. His is not the "New" Theology of Mr. Campbell. But Mr. Campbell's critics divide themselves into two groups, one of which is marked by arcimomious zeal and the other by what in regard to theological controversy may be described as the "New Courtesy." Dr. Garvie belongs to the second group.

PROFESSOR GARVIE has had a wider and more varied experience of life than falls to the lot of all ministers and theological theorists. He was born, so we learn from the British Congregationalist, in Poland, where his father, a Scotsman, had settled as managing director of a large linen factory. From Poland he came to a distinguished career at Glasgow University, and so to Oxford. He is thus familiar with the people of many lands, and with widely different types of civilisation. He has had since his early college days an opportunity of testing ideas in the rough conflict of business life: It is perhaps natural, therefore, that he should be a keen student of economics and social questions, although it is not necessary to seek in this accident of his career for the reason: He is a man of strong emotional as well as intellectual nature, and this being so he could hardly be aloof from a movement so characteristic of all the fresher life of our time as the social movement, which makes itself so powerfully felt in every land of industry and modern culture:

ONE of the calmest and most reasonable utterances concerning the New Theology appears in the form of a sermon by the Rev. J. S. Clemens, B.A., B.D., in the Free Methodist. Its spirit is indicated by its text: "We know in part and we prophesy in part." It blames the newspapers for working up an undue excitement about Mr. Campbell's statements. It rightly warns us that the confusion which took place in the controversy that called forth the Nicene Creed is particularly likely to happen when men enter into passionate theological controversy. "What took place resembled a fight in the dark, no man knew whether he struck at friend or foe." It gives this advice: "We must be patient: There is nothing for it but for men to examine the grounds of their theological affirmations afresh, and also to understand, as well as possible, the grounds on which others who differ from them base their affirmations." If the Methodist bodies represented by the Free Methodist are able to take this sensible and charitable advice, they will come unharmed through the crisis, and find that they have lost nothing that is worth retaining.

In another part of the same paper we find applied to the New Theology, already before it is yet born, not to say fully grown, a suggested test that has often been applied to Unitarianism: "The New Theology has much to do before it can rival the influence and works of the Salvation Army in its appeal to the people." The Salvation Army does well. Marry, it does well to those who do ill. But what if the work of the New Theology should be rather to lessen the number of those who need a quasi-military force to bring them into ways of decency and virtue? If it increase the number of those to whom Jesus Christ becomes a human friend, and a practical teacher, it need not take the trouble to balance its merits against those of other workers, even the most popular. There are various ways of doing good:

AN inquiry into methods and results of moral training in schools was inaugurated on Tuesday afternoon at a first meeting of the Advisory Council which has been formed for that purpose. The meeting was held in the Caxton Hall, Westminster, under the presidency of the Right Hon. James Bryce, who gave a most interesting address, and an executive committee was appointed, with Professor Michael E. Sadler as secretary. The committee has 34 members, and among them the Bishops of Hereford and Ripon, the Hon. E. Lyttelton, Mr. Allanson Picton, Mr. W. T. Stead, Mr. J. H. Yoxall, M.P., Dr. Carpenter, Principal of Manchester College, Oxford, Professor Muirhead, of Birmingham, Dr. Paton, the Rev. J. Brierley (J. B. of the Christian World), Miss M. S. Beard, and Miss Caroline Herford:

WE trust that many friends in the North are remembering the Chesham bazaar, to be held in the Bank-street school, Bury, from Wednesday to Saturday, Feb. 20-23. Chesham is in urgent need of £2,000 to wipe out a debt and secure the payment of a heavy ground rent for their building. The effort is warmly commended by the N. & E. L. Mission, and should receive the most generous support.

A VISIT TO INDIA.

DEAR MR. EDITOR,—When you urged me to let you have some impressions of our trip to India, I think you hardly realised that my sister and I would only be in the country four weeks, of which one half was spent in railway travelling and on the private business which took us there.

We were, however, fortunate in the opportunities of seeing more of our friends of the Brahma Samaj than we anticipated, as they were kind enough to invite us to the opening meeting of their all-India Conference, to a conversazione specially arranged on our account, and to a private dinner party, all of which we much appreciated. At the first meeting it was very interesting to see amongst how many different nationalities and sects the Brahma movement is at work, to hear the eloquence with which its precepts were expounded in English, and to see that a serious effort is being made to unite its sections for forward work.

What an immense field is open to them, and the difficulties of their task the visit to that typical Hindoo city Benares enabled us to appreciate the better. A general system of education would no doubt be an enormous aid to them, but the people are so poor that it would have to be free education, and until either there is some reduction in military expenditure or more natives are employed in Government Offices, which would mean considerably lower salaries, so as to set funds free, it is difficult to see where the money is to come from, as at present the salt and land taxes press very heavily on the poorer classes.

Lord Curzon has done so much to keep up and restore India's ancient monuments, that it was surprising and disappointing to find that in the employment of natives in Government Offices his policy has been quite retrograde, and this is one of the chief causes of the dissatisfaction with his rule felt even by moderate natives, who quite realise that they will not be able to stand alone for a long time. It is to be hoped that the present Government may be relied upon to see that the surely more reasonable policy formerly pursued is steadily if gradually persevered in. I had a very interesting visit to the Aligarh Mahomedan College, which must be a leavening influence amongst Mahomedans, who are beginning to see their error in standing aloof from Western education, and allowing the Hindoos to get far ahead of them in its results.

I was anxious to see Professor Chatterjee, of Allahabad, who is so kind a correspondent of the B. & F.U.A., but I think a letter must have gone wrong, as did two or three others, written to people in India whilst we were there.

I had several interesting talks with Mr. Chakrabarti, who was fortunately in Calcutta, and, although the attitude of Mr. Kissor Singh and the famine have been serious drawbacks to the progress of the Khasi Hills Mission lately, I got the impression that when normal prices for rice return, and the money and books retained by Mr. K. Singh are recovered, there is a good prospect of an increase in numbers and influence. The Association owes a great deal to Mr. Chakrabarti in this matter.

We had full experience of the value which our Brahma Samaj friends attach to the many proofs of sympathy and the aid extended to them by Unitarians, collectively and individually, whom they join in hoping that before very long they may be able to welcome Professor Carpenter to India at last.

The conversazione took place in the new "Mary Carpenter" Hall, where some of the girl graduates were present, and my sister saw the girls at school there another day. They would very much like to have an English head-mistress, but cannot offer a salary which would tempt anyone to go for that alone.

A college scheme to educate young men for the ministry is in the air, but has not taken shape yet. I think that Manchester College and the B. & F.U.A. may be heartily congratulated and encouraged by the energy and ability which their Indian students are throwing into their work at home.

MANCHESTER CEMETERIES.

REFERENCE has frequently been made in these columns to the protest which our churches in Manchester have been compelled to make against the action of the Council of that city in delegating the conduct of Nonconformist burials to a sectarian organisation. To emphasise this protest a public meeting was held last week in the Memorial Hall, under the auspices of the Manchester District Association of Presbyterian and Unitarian churches:

The President, Mr. T. F. Robinson, presided, and the Secretary, the Rev. N. Anderson, read letters of apology from Councillors H. Marsden, J.P., W. B. Pritchard J.P., J. Johnstone, J.P., and A. Burgon, regretting their absence from the meeting and strongly approving its object. The Secretary also read a resolution passed by the North Chorlton Liberal Association sympathising with the attitude taken up by the Association, and calling on the City Council to cancel the present obnoxious arrangement.

The CHAIRMAN briefly outlined the history of the question, and showed how the Association had exhausted every possible means of protest and appeal before making the subject public, so great was their dislike of sectarian bitterness and strife. Everything else having failed, they were now bound to appeal to the public, for great principles were at stake, and they would not rest until absolute equality had been secured for all citizens.

MR. JOHN DENDY moved a resolution condemning the present arrangement, and calling upon the City Council either to appoint its own chaplains at the various cemeteries or else to prepare a "Rota," on which should be placed all the recognised Nonconformist ministers of the city. Mr. Dendy said they had no right to object to the Evangelical Free Churches organising themselves on a sectarian basis, and he hoped they were not without sufficient dignity to refuse to appeal for inclusion where they were told they were not wanted. But it was a very different matter when an authority like the City Council handed over public functions to such an organisation, allowing it to set up its sectarian exclusiveness as a test for public service. The City Council then became responsible for this sectarian preference, the organisation in question became its agent. It was no answer to say that Unitarian ministers could attend for private funerals; so could anyone, and if this safeguarded the Unitarians, so it would all others. It was the public provision for public funerals that was in dispute. Mr. Dendy drew an analogy from the education controversy, and showed that the principle of freedom from tests in public service applied equally in all cases. Our grievance was a public one, and all who believed in right principles of public policy would support this protest against the re-establishment of religious disabilities in public service.

The Rev. CHARLES PEACH, who seconded the resolution, said that the State or municipality was properly only concerned with the registration of the facts of birth, death, and marriage. The religious consecration of these facts was a private matter. If, however, the municipality elected to go beyond its legal obligation and to make provision for a public religious service, it must see that in doing so it does not inflict any disability on any section of the community. He appealed also to the Nonconformists to rise above theological differences to common religious hopes which alone afforded comfort in the hour of trial.

MR. COUNCILLOR Wigley and the Revs. Dendy Agate, A. Cobden Smith, and J. W. Bishop also spoke, and the resolution was carried unanimously.

THE Rev. R. J. Jones, M.A., of Aberdare, gave evidence, last Saturday, before the Welsh Church Commission at Westminster. The Commission, of which Lord Justice Vaughan Williams is the chairman, and Lord Hugh Cecil, Principal Fairbairn, and Professor Henry Jones, with five others, are members, is appointed "to inquire into the origin, nature, amount, and application of the temporalities, endowments, and other properties of the Church of England in Wales and Monmouthshire, and into the provision made and the work done by the churches of all denominations in Wales and Monmouthshire for the spiritual welfare of the people, and the extent to which people avail themselves of such provision, and to report thereon." Mr. Jones was called to give evidence as to the Unitarians of Wales. He was ready to put in a good deal of historical evidence as to the origin and history of the churches, but this was disallowed by the Chairman. He told, however, of Carmarthen College, and the work done by Unitarian ministers as schoolmasters for the education of the people, and described some of the difficulties of congregations with hostile landowners. A list of congregations, with statistics collected by Mr. Jones from church secretaries, was also declined, as not being first-hand evidence, though Mr. S. T. Evans, M.P., assured the chairman that Mr. Jones had the fullest knowledge of his subject, and no more reliable information could be got. The witness, we fear, felt that he had been brought up to London to little purpose.

THE PILGRIM FATHERS.

I.—THE "MAYFLOWER" VENTURE.

THE visitor to the International Congress at Boston will have many joys awaiting him. Liberalism in religion will find voice and witness, not alone in the meetings of the living, but not less in those voices of the past, which still speak so movingly through the pages and scenes of history. In these memorials of the struggle for liberty New England is still rich to-day.

And the first to claim due homage, both from age and importance, is, of course, the Plymouth of the Pilgrim Fathers. The Pilgrim Fathers were the earliest religious Liberals in Massachusetts; and, but for their splendid faith and intrepid enterprise, there might have been no Boston Congress.

Their story has impressed the world, and there is surely little need that it should again be told. It has stirred the affection and touched the imagination of both young and old. The heroisms of later English Puritans, and of Scotch Covenanters, and of French Huguenots are eternal possessions; not less heroic, but more romantic, was the hazardous enterprise of the Pilgrim Fathers. And if to an Old Englander it must ever be a hereditary joy to say, "I am descended from one of the Ejected Clergy," picture the companion pride of the New Englander: "My people came over in the Mayflower!" "We came over with William the Conqueror" seems a quite archaic and prosaic matter, a mere historic accident, not a great heroic act.

The Mayflower voyagers have been duly praised; they have been sung by the poets and painted by the artists. Wordsworth's "Ecclesiastical Sonnets" are partly redeemed from dulness by his warm tribute to the Pilgrim Fathers:

"Well worthy to be magnified are they Who, with sad hearts, of friends and country took
A last farewell, their loved abodes forsook
And hallowed ground in which their fathers lay.
: : Men were they who could not bend;
Blest Pilgrims, surely, as they took for guide
A will by Sovereign Conscience sanctified."

The popular lines of Mrs. Hemans:

"The breaking waves dashed high On a stern and rock-bound coast," have carried their story into countless schools and homes. George Rawson's hymn, with its fine refrain, has preserved the historic declaration of Pastor Robinson:

"The Lord hath yet more light and truth
To break forth from His Word."

Longfellow's "Courtship of Miles Standish," with its lilting hexameters, deals with the lighter side of the Pilgrims, introducing Priscilla, the maiden, and John Alden, the latter a maternal ancestor. But Lowell, in "The Present Crisis," is more sternly earnest, and points the moral for future pilgrims in prophetic and indignant outburst:

"Was the Mayflower launched by cowards, steered by men behind their time?
Turn those tracks toward Past or Future, that make Plymouth Rock sublime?

Lo, before us gleam Truth's camp fires!
we ourselves must pilgrims be,
Launch our Mayflower, and steer boldly through the desperate winter sea."

The Mayflower paintings are equally well known, perhaps. They include "The Departure from Delft Haven," "The Embarkation" (Weir), "The Signing of the Compact" (Matheson), "The Landing of the Pilgrims" (Lucy, Rothermell, Sargent), "The Departure of the Mayflower" (Boughton), "The Return of the Mayflower" (Bayes), "Pilgrim Exiles" (Boughton), and others. Should not one of these engravings, at least, be on the walls of all our Sunday-schools, and could not the Sunday School Association supply them?

The complete story of the Pilgrim Fathers falls into two parts, the project and the result, the attempt and the attainment, the Old England farewell, and the New England sequel. We here are more familiar with the beginnings of the venture, and may not have followed out its result on the national and religious life of America. We, perchance, have paid visits to pilgrim shrines on this side the water. Gainsborough, Lincolnshire, described as St. Ogg's in George Eliot's "Mill on the Floss," has still its old hall in which the first Puritan worshippers may have been allowed to assemble under the Rev. John Smyth, and in which, also, Wesley and Whitefield, were to preach in later days. With this congregation the Rev. John Robinson had probably no connection, but a memorial church has been erected in Gainsborough recently in his memory. Our old Presbyterian Chapel in Beaumont-street goes back to within fifty years of his death. Over the border, in Nottinghamshire, still stands Scrooby Manor, the birthplace of William Brewster, and in its stable and elsewhere the Scrooby Church held its secret services: It is almost certain that John Robinson joined this congregation in 1607, and he succeeded in time the scholarly and godly Richard Clyfton as its pastor, with William Brewster as ruling elder: It is of interest to remember that Smyth, Clyfton, Robinson, and Brewster were all Cambridge men, and hence that University learning was leading this Puritan secession: Three miles from Scrooby, on the Yorkshire side, is the ancient village of Austerfield, the birthplace of William Bradford, Brewster's friend, and the future historian of the Plymouth Plantation. It was the discovery of Bradford's manuscript history in the Fulham Palace library that has thrown new and needed light on the Pilgrim story.

The Scrooby Church, avoiding credal limitations, joined themselves by a covenant into a church estate "to walk in all God's ways made known, or to be made known, according to their best endeavours, whatsoever it should cost them, the Lord assisting them." They were soon to earn the hard blessing of those who are persecuted for righteousness' sake: Accused of holding and maintaining erroneous doctrines, and of being obstinate schismatics, they were harried about and hunted down with remorseless persecution. Their only course was to flee to Holland, where there was the religious freedom denied at home, and whither others had preceded them from Gainsborough and London: They were in a strait betwixt two dangers: It was unlawful to remain without conforming; it was unlawful to leave the country, as emigration without licence was a crime: But necessity knows no law, and, after many disappointments, delays, betrayals, and separations, they all got over at length. Robinson and Brewster stayed till the last, and then joined the rest in the city of freedom, Amsterdam.

In a year the scene changes to Leyden, where the city authorities made them welcome. Here John Robinson became their pastor and leader, purchased a house opposite St. Peter's, in which their worship took place, was honoured by the University, took prominent part in the Arminian controversy, and drew into the Pilgrim ranks Winslow, Carver and Standish. For eleven years the church had religious peace, and many pilgrim marriages took place.

But again there is a change of scene, and a momentous decision. Why did the Pilgrims leave Leyden? Winslow sets forth the reasons seriatim: "How hard the country was where we lived; how many spent their estate in it, and were forced to return to England; how grievous to live from under English protection; how like we were to lose our language and our name; how little good we did, or were like to do to the Dutch; how unable to give education to our children." And hence the hope took shape that they might somewhere find a tract, and found a state wherein they could govern themselves alone, teach their children their own tongue, preach their own religion, and practise religious freedom. Virginia had received its charter as the first English State in America. Negotiations were opened with the Virginia Company to convey them thither, but these ended in failure; then with a Dutch company; then with a London company of merchant adventurers, who offered to take them across as planters at £10 each, with the stipulation that at the end of seven years the capital and profits be equally divided between the adventurers and the planters!

A more anxious decision was never taken: But after much praying and solemn fasting they came to this resolution: (1) That it was best for one part of the Church to go at first, the youngest and strongest, and the other to stay; (2) that they that went should freely offer themselves; (3) if the majority went, the pastor to go with them, if not, the elder alone; (4) if the Lord should frown on their proceedings, then those that went were to return, and those that remained were to help them: But if God should be pleased to favour them that went over, then they should endeavour to help over such as were poor and old, and willing to come: The majority, but not a large one, elected to remain, so Pastor Robinson had reluctantly to stay with them; the minority decided to make the venture, under their elder, William Brewster. Their departure from Leyden to Delhaven, and thence on the Speedwell to Southampton, was indeed a moving scene. To those left behind it was a sad and mournful parting, sighs, and sobs, and prayers being heard on all sides; the spectators could not refrain from tears. But the Pilgrims themselves, in Bradford's noble words, "Knew they were pilgrims and looked not much on [these things, but lifted up their eyes to the heavens, their dearest country, and quieted their spirits." Pastor Robinson, falling on his knees, commended them to God with most fervent prayers, and then pronounced his blessing. In four days they joined the Mayflower at Southampton, and were ready to cross the ocean. After a month of delays, followed by a voyage of sixty-seven days, the Mayflower sighted land at Cape Cod, and two days later cast anchor in Provincetown Harbour, on November 20, 1620. F. K. F.

THE WHITE AND COLOURED RACES.*

MR. OLIVIER has made a valuable contribution to the literature of the subject in this little volume. There is a freshness of view, an impartiality of treatment which comes as a relief after a good deal of special pleading on one side or the other.

At the same time it is a hopeful book. Mr. Olivier's official experience in the West Indies, and particularly in Jamaica, qualifies him to speak with authority, which is all the greater because he writes throughout in sympathy with the position of the coloured races.

The problems he discusses are many and various. In such a small space he is manifestly unable to do more than touch the surface of the greater ones. "What makes race?" he asks. It is no reproach to him that he has no complete answer to the question; it would have been a manifest impossibility in the few pages he devotes to it. What he does say is, however, eminently suggestive. "Each pure race, so far as it works by the light of its own formulated conscious knowledge and critical and logical habits, is constitutionally unfitted for understanding or even imagining the existence of much that enters into the life of each of all other races, and may be either the most sacred or the most commonplace thing in that life."

"It is noticeable that more than one of the races of which we habitually speak as inferior, and which appears to be decaying, are far in advance of the commercial Caucasian, who is our own type and standard, not only in some of the most desirable and pleasant human qualities, but in artistic, poetical, and others of the higher spiritual forms of genius or faculty." Readers of the "Soul of a People," and of Miss Noble's "Web of Indian Life," will be quite prepared to endorse the judgment here expressed:

The chief need in dealing with the problem seems to us to be a recognition that in the qualities the majority of the white races acknowledge as the highest possible to humanity—unselfishness, devotion, humility, kindness, mercy, chastity,—some of our brethren of the coloured races can teach us lessons we greatly need to learn; and that those qualities and powers in which the white races palpably excel are often of a lower and much more material order.

We have no space here to discuss the many problems raised in this book—that of the negro in the Southern United States, the various forms of indentured coloured labour, the relations between white and black in South, West and Central Africa, and the great problem rapidly becoming more and more urgent, as Mr. Olivier sees, of Indian self-government. The real position, stripped of the wordy excuses which are rife in speeches and essays upon the Mission of the White Races, is stated here very clearly. When the European colonises or annexes tropical countries the force that sets him in motion is a desire for commercial or industrial profit, and not a desire to take up the "White Man's Burden."

"He has an undeniable right to go and peacefully seek his fortune in any part of the world without molestation. He only becomes distasteful when he begins to condemn and coerce uncivilised peoples into the mould of his personal interests, under the pretext of doing them good."

Mr. Olivier here evidently uses the word uncivilised in its conventional sense, which elsewhere he seems to repudiate.

We must refer the reader to the excellent review of the question of the labour supply, as it is called, in the Transvaal and South Africa generally. On the question of native reservations Mr. Olivier is not so clear, and the long extracts from the Report of the Native Affairs Commission of 1903-5, would have been much clearer if the conclusions of the majority and of the minority of the Commission had been separated, so that the contrasts between the varying recommendations would have been plainer. In this, however, Mr. Olivier follows the report itself.

The most interesting portion of the book will probably be found to be the description of the way in which the problem of the living together of the white and coloured races is being peacefully and happily solved in Jamaica.

"In the matter of natural good manners and civil disposition," says Mr. Olivier, "the black people of Jamaica are very far superior to the members of the corresponding classes in England, America, or North Germany. In the British West Indies assaults by black or coloured men on white women or children are practically altogether unknown."

Professor Royce, in confirmation of this testimony, is quoted as saying, in a recent article (International Journal of Ethics, April, 1906): "In Jamaica there is no public controversy about social race inferiority or equality." And Mr. Olivier goes on: "The negro in Jamaica has been so far raised, so much freedom of civil mixture between the races has been made tolerable by the continuous application to the race of the theory of humanity and equality, that it is in the essential sense of endowment in the Infinite, a share, however obscure and undeveloped, in the inheritance of what we call the Soul."

It is eminently satisfactory to read this sane, hopeful, rational discussion of the relations between the races which during the past centuries, and especially in the last thirty years, have seemed to lead to so much demoralisation or character on the part of both white and black men. Their very contact seemed in all but the rarest individuals to produce evil effects on both sides.

The long view, as our author calls it, which trusts in the essential unity of human nature, and in the victory in the long run of absolute justice and fair dealing carried out with sympathy and kindness, is already winning, as it always has won, when it has been given a fair chance.

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

IN this month's Nineteenth Century and After, Sir James Knowles renews the strong protest which he made twenty-five years ago against the revived Channel Tunnel Project, and at the same time reprints as a supplement the pamphlet of 1883, in which the original protest published in the Nineteenth Century was re-issued, together with articles from the reviews and a large amount of adverse public opinion gathered from leading journals. In the present renewal of the protest, the editor has the support of Major-General Sir Frederick Maurice, Mr. Herbert Paul, M.P., Mr. George W. E. Russell, Sir John Macdonell, and Sir John Wolfe Barry. The vital importance of maintaining unquestioned the security of our island position is the great argument against the tunnel, for which Sir J. W. Barry offers a railway ferry, originally proposed in 1872 by Sir John Fowler, as a feasible alternative. Among the other articles this month we note Mr. J. Ellis Barker's on "Germany at the Parting of the Ways," and "Women and Politics," by Miss Caroline E. Stephen, who is widely known as the author of that beautiful book, "Quaker Strongholds." Miss Stephen writes, as she says, "on behalf of a great though silent multitude of women," and urges that at least the real wish of English women in this matter should be ascertained, before the change, which many of them fear may have disastrous results, is forced upon them. What Miss Stephen's ideal is may be gathered from the following passage:—

"The sanctuary which every rightly ordered home must be is not a mere school of housekeeping and ornament, but a centre of calmness and peace, from which the greatest and deepest as well as the minutest things of life wear an aspect not less but more impressive than they can have in the market or the street. I would have women, to the extent of their ability, study and form a deliberate judgment upon the concerns of their country and of the world at large. If their sheltered position as home-builders naturally prevents their becoming familiar with the precise working of political machinery, their view of the goal to be arrived at may be all the more distinct. From their bird's-eye point of view the end may be kept well in sight, while the means by which it is to be worked out are chiefly left to the men who are in the thick of the battle. From such a central but retired position—'true to the kindred points of heaven and home'—may radiate influences far stronger as well as purer than could ever be exercised by comrades in the field. Where all are striving, none can be umpire. I would have an Egeria in every house, to act not only as inspirer, but as moderator and guide of the patriotic zeal of the men whose hearts, after all, she holds in her hands." But why should the possession of the effective power of a vote, with the consequent deepened sense of responsibility, interfere with that lofty influence? Some of the noblest women we have known, the truest mothers and inspirers of a beautiful home life, have been among the keenest of politicians and eager in the advocacy of women's rights.

In the Independent Review Canon Hensley Henson writes on "The National Church and the Education Bill," deploring the calamitous result, the chief blame for which he charges to the Bishops. "The Episcopate," he says, "emerges from this year of agitation with a maximum of discredit," and gives good ground for the severity of that judgment. Yet he will not despair of the Church of England. The too prevalent anti-Protestant feeling of the clergy is not shared by the great body of the laity, and Canon Henson's hope is that the secular solution of the religious difficulty may be avoided by a general agreement to accept undenominational religious teaching, on broad lines, which the great majority of people desire for their children, while the extreme denominational schools, of the Roman Catholic and kindred type, should stand outside the national system as exceptions to the general rule, and be specially provided for. The article on "Local Veto," by Mr. C. H. Roberts, M.P., should be noted, and especially the distinction he draws, in speaking of American experience, between Prohibition States and local veto arrears. The experience of Massachusetts, with a population almost exactly the same as ours in density to the square mile, is of the greatest interest, and should be a great encouragement to temperance reformers. Thus Cambridge, with a population of 97,434, across the river Charles, over against the city of Boston (as Birkenhead is across the Mersey from Liverpool), is a No Licence city, and has steadily voted so at twenty successive annual polls, with an average majority for the last four years of 3,901, while last year 87 per cent. of the people voted. It is a battle which has to be constantly fought, but it proves to be worth while. The article on "A Common Occurrence" tells of the miseries of Macedonia, and the failure of Europe to cope with Turkish misrule; the present condition of things cannot be maintained; either Bulgaria must be left with a free hand, so the writer concludes, or a governor must be appointed, responsible not to the Sultan, but to the Powers. Dr. Hastings Rashdall, in an article on "A Mediæval Herodotus," gives an interesting account of Mr. G. G. Coulton's "From St. Francis to Dante: a Translation of all that is of Primary Interest in the Chronicle of the Franciscan Salimbene," and strongly recommends the reading of this book as a useful corrective of too ideal pictures of that age. "The whole of the Middle Ages," says Mr. Coulton, "cry out to us from Dante's great poem, 'Who shall deliver us from the body of this death!' and I have chosen Salimbene's chronicle as my main theme, because he shows us more clearly than any other what was the body of that Death." How quickly the salt of the Franciscans lost its savour after the death of their leader, and how terribly the moral level sank is well known. "It is difficult," Mr. Coulton writes, "to wish anything away from St. Francis's own life, as it is difficult for an Englishman to regret the Charge of the Light Brigade. But, when our present age is taunted for its alleged soullessness by reactionaries whose eyes are too weak to face the growing light of the times in which they live, it may be profitable to point out that in the Holy War, as in all other wars, we need not only courage and sudden self-sacrifice, but also calm judgment and even a certain amount of routine work."

The Contemporary also, in the person of Lt.-Col. Walter H. James, is strongly against the Channel Tunnel. Mr. Edwin Pears writes on "Macedonia and the Neutralisation of Constantinople," urging that an independent governor must be appointed to make an end of the slow bleeding to death of Macedonia, while the latter proposal would be most conducive to peace and the future prosperity of the Balkan States. Mr. Harold Spender, writing on "Lords v. Commons," recalls the issue of past conflicts to show what may now be done to make the will of the people effective, and Mr. W. J. F. Wilkin-son writes on "Government and Discipline in the Church of England."

SHORT NOTICES.

Sermons in Accents: Studies in the Hebrew Text, by the Rev. J. A. Adams, B.D., is intended to show how a knowledge of the Hebrew accents may suggest to the preacher religious lessons for use in the pulpit. It will suggest, for instance, the suitable division of a text into heads for a sermon. From the position of the accent Zarga in Exod. xx. 8, 9, the author draws a very excellent lesson as to the duty of really working on the six days and not merely resting on the Sabbath. He gives a whole page (p. 104) to this theme, and the reader, wondering whether the Hebrew accentuator really intended all that, calls to mind Lisbeth Bede's remark about the people who "make a peck of their own words out of a pint of the Bible." Preachers whose object is strictly to expound the text of Scripture may perhaps find this little book helpful, at least if they are extremely good Hebraists. Some of them are not. The author, however, is, and one can see how deeply interested he has been in his subject, and can acknowledge with gratitude the zeal which prompted him to put at the disposal of other preachers his own technical method, even if they cannot use it, or grudge the time needed for the learning of it. (T. & T. Clark. 4s. 6d. net.)

Reason in Belief, by Frank Sewall, M.A., D.D., is a blend of Kantian philosophy, Swedenborgian mysticism, and ultra-orthodox theology. The author's style of argumentation is not always very clear or convincing. It may be true, as he maintains, that the miraculous birth and resurrection of Jesus are reconcilable with certain first principles of reasoning. They are matters, however, that need to be approached rather by the way of historical criticism than by that of a a priori deduction; and of such criticism Dr. Sewall shows little or no appreciation. OBITUARY.

MISS EMMA SHAEN.

WE recorded last week the death, in her 85th year, of Emma Shaen, the eighth child of the late Samuel and Rebecca Shaen, of Crix, Hatfield Peveril, Essex. She was the last survivor but one of their nine children. Her father was a J.P. for the county, and a deputy-lieutenant, a strong Liberal in politics, and a sturdy Nonconformist in religion. Reared under these influences Miss Shaen adhered through life to Liberalism in its best and widest sense.

After the death of her parents, Crix was sold, and Miss Shaen resided the last half of her life at Weybridge and Wimbledon. From an intellectual and cultivated home she inherited keen literary and artistic tastes and interests combined with stern Puritan principles. Hers was a strong character, and she was a gifted and accomplished woman.

Occasionally some of her writings appeared in print without her name. Among these may be mentioned a "Theistic Catechism," which she hoped would be of use to those who are of the Church Universal. She had a fervent admiration for Mazzini and his doctrines, and did all in her power to spread among English working men his creed, that the true aim of Democracy is the recognition and performance of Duty—not the assertion of Rights. She maintained undiminished interest to the end of her long life in the progress of thought, and promoted it by her sympathy. Feeble health, and the student's love of retirement, prevented her being widely known, but to her family and her intimate friends she leaves a noble and inspiring memory.

MR. JOSEPH BROOME, J.P.

By the death, on January 25, of Mr. Joseph Broome, at his house at Llandudno, Manchester has lost one of the oldest and most highly respected of her citizens. For nearly the whole of his long life Mr. Broome was an extremely hard-working business man, but he always found time to devote himself to a great deal of public work. Much of it was of a kind that is not always recognised most prominently—quiet, but useful, movements in various directions for the betterment of the conditions of life. Such was the tribute paid to this good man's memory by the Manchester Guardian at the beginning of its obituary notice. We are glad to be able to add some further particulars from that notice. Mr. Broome was born on May 1, 1825, at Reston Brook, near Frodsham. His family removed in 1834 to Manchester, and he, when sixteen years old, entered the service of Messrs. Pemberton & Savage, who were then engaged in the dyed goods trade. A little later he took a situation with Messrs. Samson & Leppoc, merchants and shippers, and eventually was admitted a partner of that firm. From this time onward his career illustrated the truth of the old saying that nobody will so well discharge new duties as an already busy man. He added continually engagements of a public character to the absorbing occupations of a Manchester merchant who had business transactions with every quarter of the world. One of the earliest, as well as afterwards the most constant, of his solicitudes was for the progress and welfare of the Model Free School established by Richard Cobden and others in Jackson's-row. He was the treasurer of this up to the time of its closing in 1887. Practical work in education, indeed, always delighted him. He joined energetically in the establishment of the Manchester Warehousemen and Clerks' Provident Association in 1854, and he spared neither time nor means in helping the Orphan Schools at Cheadle Hulme. In 1862 he joined the Committee, was elected its chairman in 1864, and held that office for nearly forty years. In the organisation of this fine institution his business aptitude helped him greatly, but it must also be said that his heart was in the work. He regarded the great family at Cheadle Hulme with a quite paternal care. His services were recognised publicly at the annual prize distribution of the schools held in September, 1883, when an address was presented to him, and his portrait, and it was determined to raise a fund of £3,000, to provide scholarships, to be called by his name, to be held at the Victoria University by pupils of the Warehousemen and Clerks' Schools. Another fund, called "The Broome Fund," was raised, and invested in trustees. Its income is applied to aid poor and deserving children who, when they leave, have been not less than three years at the schools, and for whom help may be useful in assisting them in their future career.

For many years Mr. Broome was closely associated with the Manchester Botanical and Horticultural Society. He had a great love of flowers, and both when he lived at Didsbury and afterwards at Llandudno his garden was the chief of his pleasures, which he delighted to share with others.

In 1881 Mr. Broome was one of the representatives of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce at the French Treaty Inquiry, and in the same year was made a magistrate. In 1891, when he had lived for a few years at Llandudno, he was nominated High Sheriff of Carnarvonshire. He held other public offices, and the high esteem in which he was held was marked on his eightieth birthday, when a deputation from Manchester waited upon him at Llandudno to present an address of congratulation and grateful recognition, signed by the Lord Mayor and a large number of other friends.

Mr. Broome went to live at Llandudno about seventeen years ago, for reasons of health, and did not take any part in the public life of the town. He was, however, widely known for his generous beneficence, and the funeral on Tuesday, January 29, took place amid signs of general mourning. The service was held in St. George's Church, and the interment was in the St. Tudno Churchyard, on the Great Orme's Head. At the same time a memorial service was held in Cross-street Chapel, Manchester, conducted by the Rev. J. C. Street, of Shrewsbury. There was a large and representative gathering of friends.

Mr. Street spoke of Mr. Broome as a very old friend. He did not wonder, he said, that so many people should have gathered together to express their appreciation of their fellow-citizen. The story of Joseph Broome was very simple, but, he thought, very wonderful. He entered the commercial life of the city as a servant, and he won his way step by step to a position in the partnership of the firm in whose service he was. He afterwards founded the great firm whose head he was at the time of his death. During his long career he went in and about the city, going on the Exchange and mingling with his fellow-merchants, and he won the distinction of being called "Honest Joseph Broome." On the Exchange his word was his bond. In all the transactions with which he was connected his spoken "yes" or "no" was quite sufficient security. All through his career honesty was stamped upon him. It was no wonder that the merchants and manufacturers appreciated him as they did. He had been one of those merchants who gave tone and constancy to the life of the city and held it up for great reputation among the cities of the world. He illustrated the well-known fact that it was the busy man who would undertake extra work for the well-being of the community. To him God was a present reality, religion a real thing. In the Free Churches Joseph Broome showed his appreciation of what was highest and best, and he gave not only of his substance, but of his services to make the Church purer and stronger.

MR. D. C. BETTS.

A WELL-KNOWN Norwich citizen and life-long worshipper at the Octagon Chapel, Mr. David Carter Betts, passed away on Friday, February 1, after a comparatively brief illness. He was born on April 9, 1829, and remembered incidents in the ministry of W. J. Bakewell, which terminated in 1838. For more than 40 years he held responsible positions in the firm of Bolingbroke, Jones & Co., makers of the famous Norwich shawls and other fabrics, but he had long been living in retirement. He was an ardent musician, and for just over 30 years was a member of the Norwich Festival Chorus, and for the greater part of his life a member of the Octagon choir. He acted as secretary to the Trustees of the Rosary Cemetery for 54 years. Few men loved flowers more than he, and he spent the latter part of his life in his garden, cultivating, among other things, a great variety of English wild flowers. Not many men of his years were so popular with the young, and though he had passed through much sorrow in life, he retained his brightness and cheerfulness to the last. He is almost the last of a fine generation of men which gathered round the Octagon and John Withers Dowson, and which included Mark Wade, Frederic Stevens, and Charles Cochrane. The funeral, which took place on Tuesday, February 5, was largely attended. The first part was taken at the Octagon, and the choir rendered the anthem "Crossing the Bar."

THE REV. WILLIAM ROBINSON, F.G.S.

A LONG career of laborious usefulness was closed on Friday, February 1, by the death, at Altrincham, of the Rev. William Robinson, in the first hour of that day. Mr. Robinson was born at Padiham, February 24, 1828. Though his early opportunities of education were meagre in the extreme, his was a determined diligence, and he showed great power both as a learner and teacher; already as a young man he used to hold week-evening classes, history and geography being among his favourite subjects; and for 20 years he was attached to the Nazareth Chapel Sunday-school, first as scholar and then as teacher and superintendent. He also preached occasionally in the chapel, being encouraged thereto by his father-in-law, John Rushworth, and for about two years he shared with the Rev. Robert Wilkinson the services of alternate Sundays, the others being supplied by students of the newly established Unitarian Home Missionary Board.

In 1857 Mr. Robinson became a student of the Board, and after three years' training for the ministry took up missionary work at Accrington, Blackburn, and Burnley. For two years he was minister at Newbury, and then, in 1865, he entered on a congenial and happy pastorate of eighteen years at Crewkerne. He entered into the social and educational interests of the town, becoming an active member of the local Literary and Scientific Institute, for which he lectured. On the occasion of the formation of the first School Board he was elected a member, serving on the Board for a period of six years, during which he had to fight many a battle for undenominational religious teaching. The interesting local geological formation near Crewkerne attracted Mr. Robinson to geological studies, and in December, 1891, he was elected a Fellow of the Geological Society of London, being welcomed therein by the President, Sir Archibald Geikie.

Brief pastorates at Tamworth, Nantwich, and Torquay followed the years at Crewkerne, until failure of health enjoined his retirement. His home latterly had been with his son, the Rev. Thomas Robinson, at Altrincham, and it was there that he passed away.

The funeral was at Padiham on Tuesday, the service in Nazareth Chapel being conducted by the Rev. J. E. Jenkins, in the presence of a large number of relatives and friends, and also at the grave in the Padiham Church Cemetery, where Mrs. Robinson had been buried in the summer of 1885.

MR. J. L. EVANS.

THE Hastings congregation has suffered a severe loss through the death, on January 26, of Mr. John Lane Evans, for many years the chairman of the Church Committee, and for many more a generous contributor to its funds. Born in 1828, son of John Evans, barrister, grandson of the Rev. Dr. John Evans (author of "The Sketch of all Denominations of Religion," and for many years minister of Worship-street Chapel, London), the late Mr. Evans attended the school and afterwards the college of the University of London, graduating about the year 1846. Entering the Pay Office of the Supreme Courts of Justice, he attained eventually the position of Principal Clerk, and here he remained until his health failed in 1887, when he retired, choosing Hastings as his place of residence.

From 1852 until his removal to Hastings, Mr. Evans attended Rosslyn Hill Chapel during the late Dr. Sadler's ministry, and both he and his brother Caleb took great interest in the church and school, helping in every way they could. For some years Mr. Evans served the church as chapel warden. For the last twenty years he was one of the main supporters, through good and evil times, of the Hastings church. Unobtrusive, shy, and of a very retiring disposition, he yet took a keen interest in everything connected with the church, freely placing his services and his money at the disposal of church and individuals whenever there was need. He was a man of high and honourable character, thoughtful, well read, and interesting in many ways. Above all, he was unswerving in his love for and devotion to the faith of his fathers. The funeral service at the Hastings Cemetery on January 31 was conducted by the Rev. Gardner Preston.

THE little book, "Modern Developments in Methodism," in the series "Eras of Nonconformity," is perhaps not perfectly happy in its title, for it is really the history of the origin of the minor Methodist bodies: It is an eminently readable little book. The state of matters in the Methodist societies immediately after the death of Wesley is described in such a plain, matter-of-fact style that here, as elsewhere, the reader fully realises the complexities which the author had to disentangle for himself before he could be ready to state his results. The results of his investigations are given in a fearless manner, but with no ostentatious courage; even as the writer's tributes to the greater Methodist reformers, and workers, and sufferers are paid very quietly as just their due and no more. Any reader of this brief record will understand the inevitableness of the rival Methodist churches; will see clearly the impossibility of a perfectly democratic version of the Gospel together with an oligarchic polity, going on together without producing at first rebellious scenes and then attempts at revolution: Let the story of these scenes and these attempts be read. Mr. Redfern's unvarnished tale has interest for others than Methodists. It is a drama, in which we see the play of opposing principles and the characters of determined men.

CAPTAIN JOHN BROWN, the hero of Kansas, said to me in conversation, that "for a settler in a new country, one good, believing, strong-minded man is worth a hundred, nay a thousand, men without character; and that the right men will give a permanent direction to the fortunes of a state."—Emerson.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

THE games of make-believe that we enjoy so much as children are only just the beginning of all the happiness we may enjoy through our imagination—our power of making images, pictures in our minds.

Do you remember the old fairy tale of the magic carpet? If I remember rightly, its happy possessor had only to sit on it and wish himself somewhere else, and, one! two! three! there he was at once, without the trouble of a journey. We have, each of us, an even more wonderful magic carpet in our minds, only we give it another name. It will not only take us anywhere, but also into other times, back into our own yesterdays and forward into our own to-morrows, and also into the yesterdays and to-morrows of other people. It gives us ideals of our own and also a share in the ideals of others, as well as glimpses into their ordinary every-day thoughts and feelings. Next time you are in a crowded tram, just try to realise for a moment that, in that crowd of people sitting and standing side by side, each may be, in imagination, somewhere else. Imagine your surprise, if, instead of saying "fares please!" and offering tickets for pennies, the conductor were to say to each one "a penny for your thoughts!" What a queer mixture of pennyworths he would get! Perhaps a sudden jerk, a stop, and the entrance of another passenger brings all thoughts back for a moment to the here and now. On goes the tram, and away go the thoughts again on their various journeys.

Sometimes, as at school or in church, the thoughts of a number of people all travel in the same direction, and their imaginations make pictures of the same thing. A preacher may be telling us one of the parables of Jesus, and describe the country between Jerusalem and Jericho, and the journey of a certain traveller who fell among thieves on the way.

All wish to be like the Good Samaritan in readiness to help, whilst probably each of us thinks of a different way of being more kind. And when the last hymn comes we sing together with good-will and new resolves for the future. A hymn, like other poetry, may give us word pictures for our imaginations. Poetry stirs our sympathy for others, and suggests an ideal. When we sing hymns together, we make the same sort of picture in our minds, and have the same sort of happy thought of what might be.

In our trying to be good, we often use the pictures of poetry. In our efforts to choose the right, to follow the ideal, we even find it helps us to think of ourselves as if we were somebody else. We use a sort of picture language, or imagery, as it is called, and thus find once more the old delight in using our imagination, with a new happiness of earnest purpose.

How often in our singing of hymns do we imagine ourselves as travellers on a long journey, as sailors sailing o'er the ocean of life to a distant haven, as soldiers fighting the good fight of faith, as sowers scattering the seed for a harvest by and by, as gardeners making the best of our own little plot of ground, pulling up the weeds, and tending the flowers, plants, and trees.

The Bible is very rich in this picture language of poetry. A simple picture often tells us far more than we could say otherwise, even with a great many words. Sometimes we are told that one thing not so easy to understand is like another which is better known to us, and which we can see in our minds as a picture.

"The Kingdom of Heaven is like a grain of mustard seed which a man planteth." "Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear Him."

"The Kingdom of Heaven," or "The Lord is my Shepherd" means so much to us that we almost forget we are using picture language. We all love this imagery, and we find that it helps us to try and fit ourselves better into the picture, as it were—to be mote truly at home there. When we say "The Lord is my Shepherd," we try to give up our own self-will, and yield ourselves to the guidance within: It is not enough to call the Lord our Shepherd, unless we try to follow his leading and trust ourselves to his care.

Jesus taught us to think of God as our Father, and to pray to him as our Father. He so often shows us the way, leads us to our Father, that Jesus himself is often called the Good Shepherd too, and is shown in pictures as the shepherd leading the sheep, or with a lamb in his arms:

Perhaps some of you know the hymn for children beginning: "Jesus, tender Shepherd, hear me." A little girl was accustomed to say it at bed-time as her evening prayer. She is usually a good child, but for some reason or other, or no reason at all, she had been tiresome for the whole of one day—cross and disagreeable—really naughty for once. At bed-time she began her hymn as usual,

"Jesus, tender Shepherd, hear me, Bless thy little lamb to night."

She was a truthful child and must have felt that the words did not fit. She knew she had not been like a lamb that day. So she changed the word, "Bless thy little bear—it should be!" "Bear" fitted her state of mind, but it spoilt the picture!

There was another way of making the picture fit. She would find it out for herself before she went to sleep that night, and you will see it for yourselves too.

Another story—from a book this time—tells of a boy, David. He was a good boy, and a happy boy, and we are not told of any real naughtiness at all. But one evening at bed-time, he must have felt restless, for when he began his hymn—the same hymn—he looked up and said "Can I say colt?" Then, without waiting for an answer, he decided for himself: "No, colts don't have shepherds, it has to be lamb."

Colts don't have shepherds any more than bears. If we want to be at home in the shepherd picture, we must be ready to be led, ready to trust.

And you know that, after all, the picture is only a picture of what is beyond the picture itself. You know that our heavenly Father cares for the real tears and colts too, even when they are cross and wild: Whilst they are naughty, they cannot feel this tenderness in their hearts. But it is there, waiting for them—waiting for them to put away their naughtiness and be still. When the cross little bear or wild little colt is quiet once more and ready to be led, it will feel ready also to receive the evening blessing and make a new beginning next day.

MR. CAMPBELL'S POSITION.

THOSE were noble words, to be taken to heart, in Dr. HORTON's letter, which we quoted last week:—"We are not going to preclude our new light and truth by the ignorant prejudice and clamour which always try to silence or to persecute the original voices, the fresh truths which are God's new Messiahs. If Mr. CAMPBELL is wrong, free ventilation of his views, brotherly sympathy with him, and affectionate prayer for him will bring him right. If he is right, if he is coming, like Amos from the fields and the herds, untrammelled with the theology of the schools, to speak the new truth which Christendom is failing and fainting for, what more terrible mistake could Christian men make than to discourage, wound, and perhaps kill, this man of God, as the Pharisees killed Our Lord?"

The clamour in the newspapers has not yet subsided, and the searching fire of the dogmatic theologians, notably in the British Weekly and the British Congregationalist, is being directed against Mr. CAMPBELL's positions, or supposed positions. Meanwhile, for the present month, he is down in Cornwall, enjoying, as we trust, a much-needed rest; and he is said to be writing a book, which will set forth his actual teaching, and the new faith and hope of his religious life, in a more clear and definite form than has yet been available, except for those who have habitually attended his ministry.

What we propose at the present moment is to illustrate by another very striking example the far-reaching nature of this new religious movement, in which Mr. CAMPBELL has a part. He believes that the old doctrines of the Evangelical "scheme of salvation" must be re-interpreted in the light of present-day knowledge and religious experience, if they are still to express the profoundest truth and maintain their power of inspiration in our life with God. Here is another voice of our own day, which expresses the larger and more universal conception of religious truth:—"Thus understood, faith and love and hope are three factors into which the life of religion, of union with God through humanity, with humanity through God, may be resolved. This is a religion which is logically (not historically) older than all the creeds that have struggled so variously to give it expression; just as every kind of life is older than its intellectual analysis. So far as you live with this life you are in spiritual communion, not only with Catholic Christians, but with the men of faith of every creed or no creed through the length and breadth of the world." And again:—"We do not worship Humanity, with the Comtists, but we worship the Power that is revealed in human goodness of every sort. In this sense Humanity, so far as it stands for the just, the noble, the brave, and the true, for those who in any way have crucified, sacrificed, limited themselves for the love of God and for the sake of His kingdom and of their fellow men, is a mystical Christ, a collective Logos, a Word or Manifestation of the Father; and every member of that society is in his measure a Christ or revealer in whom God is made flesh and dwells in our midst."

This is not Mr. CAMPBELL who is speaking, but a Jesuit Father, writing to a friend, a professor of anthropology in a continental university, who had confessed that he could no longer reconcile his own convictions of truth with the doctrines and claims of the Roman Catholic Church. Father TYRRELL's letter in reply to his friend is an elaborate and very frank justification of his revolt from the dogmatic teaching of the Church, but at the same time an earnest plea that the Church as a religious fellowship and an organ of Divine revelation and redemption in the world was something much greater than the narrowness of the theologians and the tyranny of the hierarchy. Passages from this letter, having appeared in translation in an Italian newspaper, Father TYRRELL was called to account by the authorities, and as he would not renounce his convictions, he was promptly expelled from the Order of Jesuits. That was last year, and in self-justification, he published his letter as a whole, with an explanatory introduction and notes.*

There are those in this country who would like to treat Mr. CAMPBELL as the Jesuits have treated Father TYRRELL, but Dr. HORTON has far better expressed the true genius of English Congregationalism. The two cases appear to us very closely parallel, and we commend to all who are exercised over the CAMPBELL controversy a close study of the "Much-Abused Letter."

Father TYRRELL, though admitting into the field of his religion all the results of modern science and historical criticism, and in revolt, as his friend was, against the ecclesiastical and theological tyranny of the present rulers of the Church, holds to the Catholic ideal as the most perfect embodiment of religion in the world. "The Roman Communion," he says, "may be no more than the charred stump of a tree torn to pieces by gales, and rent by thunderbolts; she may be, and probably is, more responsible for all the schisms than the schismatics themselves; yet, unlike them all, she stands for the principle of Catholicity, for the ideal of a spiritually united humanity centred round CHRIST in one divine society—of the Kingdom of God governed by the Son of God; she is at least an abortive essay towards that perfect all-embracing religious association which as a mediating instrument should secure the fullest and freest commerce between its several members and the Whole; that is, between the soul and God." And again: "For as the Roman Communion is not co-extensive with the whole of the spiritual world, with the Invisible Church, so neither is her creed, her collective mind and teaching, co-extensive with the mind of the whole, with that Vision of which faith is a sharing—a vision that includes the creed as the vision of a single expanse of country might be said to include that of its military chart with all its divisions and sub-divisions and complexities. Faith is not a sharing in the common creed of the visible Church, but in the common vision of the invisible Church, which is, in a measure, that of God Himself."

There are other passages in this remarkable letter which we should have been glad to quote, but must be content with one more sentence from a long passage (pp. 62-4), to which we would call special attention:—"Again, I think you agree with me, that though the one thing needful is communion with the invisible Church (i.e., with God as presented to us in CHRIST and in all CHRIST-like men past, present and future; with all those who, whatever their professed creed, in any way or degree suffer and forsake themselves for God's cause and God's will), yet communion with the visible Church, with those, namely, who profess to be CHRIST-like, is a great desideratum, is a condition of more fruitful communion with the invisible."

One must rejoice that within the communion of the Roman Church, as elsewhere throughout Christendom, there is such stirring of new life as is here manifested. What we have to do in this case, as in Mr. CAMPBELL's, is to get, as far as possible, at the heart of the truth here struggling for more perfect expression, and to see to it that in our own religious life, and our own immediate fellowship of churches, we are making as full a contribution as we can to that greater communion of the invisible Church, in which we all are called to have a part.

TOWARDS SOCIAL REFORM.

COLLECTIVE OWNERSHIP—ITS ETHICAL SIGNIFICANCE.

WITH Mr. Solly's protest against "these constant girdings against trade" I cordially agree, but not with his acceptance of Mr. Edwards' reply to Mr. Simon as conclusive. Indeed, it seems to me that Mr. Edwards has failed to grasp the meaning of Mr. Simon's argument. It is surprising how prone Socialists are to make use of the advantages gained under our present system as arguments in support of Socialism, and this is what Mr. Edwards does: He says: "To contradict the bald assertion of the sterility of municipal and national servants, one has but to point to the multitude of improvements in telegraphy made by the operators in the Government service; and to the numerous devices for safety in the municipal tramway service adopted during the last year or two, mainly invented by municipal officials." Mr. Simon does not contend that public servants under our present system were "sterile." They live and invent "in the free air of individual competition," where, under our patent law, defective though it be, they can secure the value of their inventions, while not withholding their benefits from the public. Under universal Collectivism an inventor could not do this. The incentive of personal gain would be taken away, and human nature would say, "What is the use of bothering about inventing when I shall get little or nothing by it?" Do not most inventions now come from the countries where the patent laws are most advantageous to inventors? It is no argument to say that Socialism would alter human nature, though it is often both said and implied by Socialists. It is one of those "unsupported assertions" with which Mr. Edwards finds fault, and from which his article is not entirely free, e.g., "the atmosphere of 'free competition' is the atmosphere of the shambles and the battlefield," et seq. But, supposing that Socialism would prevent some of the evils which are abuses of, but not inherent to, our so-called Individualism, there are many grave reasons for believing that, by its adoption, we should only "fly from ills we know to those we know not." I am not alone in saying that Socialists start from a totally mistaken assumption, namely, that the individual exists for the good of society, and must, therefore, sacrifice himself to it. On the contrary, society is the creation of individuals, and exists for them. The individual was before society, and he lives in it because he can therein find the highest expression of his own individuality. Socialism (which includes Collectivism) would, of necessity, prevent this realisation. For, what is this Collectivism? It complains that, under our present system, many workmen are workmen only, and work under great disadvantages: Materials, instruments and capital used in connection with their work all belong to others. They have little or no voice in the direction of their work, and get but a small proportion of its products, besides being constantly liable to dismissal and consequent poverty. This may be a reason for co-operation, for making workmen capitalists as well as workmen; but not for Collectivism, which assumes it would cure the evils of which it complains by making them universal. It would deprive a workman of all property; not a tool or a shilling of capital could he ever call his own; all the means of production and distribution would be the property of the State; and the workman would have no voice in its direction except the feeble one of his vote in the choice of his director, to whom he would have to yield implicit, absolute obedience. He would be in a position of mere slavery. He would have to live on what the State chose to give him. The law of supply and demand would be reversed; and, instead of demand governing supply, supply would control demand. Whether the effect or ultimate end of Collectivism has been carefully thought out by Socialists is open to doubt. There is not wanting evidence that, with them, "the wish is father to the thought"; but however this may be, they do not hesitate to advocate measures which could lead to nothing but national ruin: They recognise that their system would demand the elimination of all competition, and that, consequently and for other reasons, foreign trade must be excluded. The needs of the country would have to be supplied by itself. The growth of population would be regulated. Labour would be economised by the suppression of luxury. Money would be abolished and coupons take its place. And they have the boldness to promise the proletariat that these sweeping but wholly untried changes, with all their ramifications and far-reaching effects, would bring a fabulous increase in production, national revenue, and labour returns. It is a wild and utterly unsupported assertion. It assumes that every worker would be inspired with the highest interest in increasing production and diminishing its cost; that the administrators would exercise a perfectly just and firm control over the collective production; and, in short, that human nature would not be what it is, but what it would be necessary to be if Socialism were to have the slightest chance of avoiding ruin. The only evidence we have of the results of Socialism is not reassuring: The various French and American Socialist colonies that have been tried were established to abolish the declared injustice of the many workers having to support the few idlers; but most of these colonies failed because the few workers found themselves having to support the many idlers. I need not labour the question. It seems to me beyond dispute that, in any effort we make to overcome the evils which all deplore in our present order, human nature as it is must be taken into account. To convert us into a nation of slaves, and assume that we shall be a community of angels, is the height of absurdity.

But, are we proceeding along the lines of Socialism? With much that Mr. Solly says I heartily agree; but on this point I differ both from him and Mr. Edwards. The Post Office, the municipalisation of gas and water supply, and trams are not Socialistic undertakings any more than streets are. They are essentially natural monopolies. Gas, water, and trams all run along our highways. Water and gas are not offered in different qualities; and, if they could be, it would never do to have competing companies laying their several pipes along our streets. Nor could more than one set of trams conveniently run along them. It must, however, be remembered that both gas and trams are only monopolies in their special kind: Trams, for example, are open to competition from motor-buses; and, in all these undertakings, the labour necessary to work them has to be obtained under competition. The employees are free agents, and can seek other work if they choose. Professor Henry Jones contends with much force that the municipalisation of such undertakings as the above has done much to counteract any tendency to Socialism; that it has set free an enormous amount of capital for investment in undertakings which private enterprise can do better. But even municipalities have to borrow money for their undertakings, and this borrowing opens up investments for private capital. The tendency, indeed, is not towards Socialism, but towards the diffusion of wealth and the increase of capitalists: For a municipality to work a natural monopoly in an age of competition is a very different thing from Collectivism, which allows of no competition. If a municipality were to take over all the grocers' shops, or the supply and distribution of all the bread, and prohibit any individual doing likewise, that would indeed be a step towards Collectivism, because it would be an enforced, and not a natural monopoly. The condition of the workers in municipal enterprises to-day is very different from, and far superior to, what it would be under Collectivism: In the former they have the power to improve their position; in the latter they would have no such power. Now they are free men, free to choose their occupation and their locality of work, free to emigrate if they prefer to seek employment in other countries; but, under Socialism, they would have no such freedom.

I may be accused of making "bald assertions," but when one has to deal with an untried proposal, both proposer and objector can depend only upon their own reasoning powers. Socialists, however, are silent on many points that to deep thinkers appear logical and fatal results: Socialists harp upon present abuses, and many people, agreeing with their accusations, seem to think they are something new, and straightway call themselves Socialists: But the recognition of abuses is not Socialism. The strongest Individualist would not dispute that riches are not always distributed according to merit; "that the moral law should control the relations of business and the whole field of human action"; that the rich and the State have responsibilities to the poor; and that the law ought to enforce, if necessary, the reasonable claims of the poor. Socialism is the scheme which its advocates assert would cure the evils of which they complain. It is true that some of their claims are not endorsed by men who, nevertheless, loosely call themselves Socialists, e.g., that the workman is entitled to the whole value of the things he produces, without any deductions for rent, interest, or profit; or, as they term it, "the right of the labourer to the whole produce of his labour." This is a claim which has, undoubtedly, captivated hundreds of working men, yet it would be easy to show that it offends against right and justice, and could not be realised under Socialism.

Nor can I quite agree with the statement that, where it has been tried, the municipal management of the undertakings above mentioned has been an unmixed good. Experience has not been the same in all places; but it must not be forgotten that municipal control is not State control. In one case it is the management of things of general requirement under the direct control of those who want them, and thus come under direct public criticism. Under State Collectivism this criticism would lose all its force, and be lost in the interests of the whole nation.

It is the duty of the Socialist to show, beyond reasonable doubt, that his theories are sound and practicable. This he has, so far, failed to do; but, until he does, Socialism is not likely to come within the region of practical politics. That we are moving on to a more equitable state of things is undoubted. The opportunities of the working classes have vastly improved. They are better paid, better fed, better housed, and have better and cheaper education than they had a generation ago; but it will be a vast mistake if they are taught to look to the State for every benefit. Their elevation should be wrought by their own well-guided efforts, otherwise their manhood and independence will be undermined and enervated.

W. C. RAWLINS.

Waterloo, Liverpool.

ROBERT BURNS AND THE "NEW THEOLOGY" OF HIS TIME.*

THIS congregation has all along been intimately associated with the one which now meets in the Octagon Chapel, Norwich. Both apparently originated in the same year, 1672, though their present places of worship are of later date, our chapel having been built in 1711 and the Norwich one in 1756. Both were Presbyterian and quite orthodox by birth, but, having no doctrinal articles in their trust deeds, their thought was free to develop, and so in the natural course of things they emerged from their original Calvinism, passing through Arianism to Unitarianism.

During the nearly 240 years of their existence, then, the sister congregations at Bury and Norwich have gone on, ever seeking for new and better light on divine things, and taking an interest in each other's work and welfare; and that interest happily still exists in unabated measure.

James Martineau, you know, was born at Norwich, and the Octagon Chapel was his early religious home. For his sake, therefore, as for much else, we are very proud of that relationship of sympathy and good-will, which has so long subsisted between us and the congregation there.

Now, I daresay some of you may be asking yourselves what all this has to do with Robert Burns and the New Theology of his time. Well, I will show you.

The Octagon Chapel at Norwich was, as I have said, built in 1756—that is, just three years before Burns was born. Its minister then was Dr. John Taylor,* a very distinguished scholar and theologian. At the opening of the chapel he preached a sermon, in the course of which he said: "We are Christians, and only Christians. Episcopalians, Presbyterians, Independents, Baptists, Calvinists, Arminians, Arians, Trinitarians, and others, are names of religious distinctions. But, however we may be commonly ranked under any of these divisions, we reject them all. We disown all connection, excepting that of love and good-will with any sect or party whatsoever." That statement anticipates by a century and a half what Mr. R. J. Campbell said the other day, when repudiating the names Unitarian and Trinitarian, "The name Christian is enough." Dr. Taylor was the author, among other works, of a celebrated treatise on the Doctrine of Original Sin—a book which gave rise to almost as much controversy then as Mr. Campbell's sermons are doing now. Its object was to show that human nature is not so corrupt as Calvinism represented. Jonathan Edwards, in New England, declared that no one book did "so much towards rooting out" the underlying ideas of the Westminster Standards; and we are told of a minister in the north of Ireland who, in addressing his flock, referred to it in these terms: "I must warn you, my brethren, against a book called 'The Scripture Doctrine of Original Sin,' written by one, John Taylor, of Norwich, and which has lately been printed at Belfast and sent all round the country to pervert the people from their good old faith. I desire that none of you will read it; for it is a bad book and a dangerous book, and an heretical book, and, what is worse, the book is unanswerable."

Well, this "unanswerable" book was widely read in the west of Scotland, and among those who possessed a copy of it was William Burness, the poet's father, who agreed with its opinions and sought to train his family in that truer and better view of religion which it set forth, even composing a catechism for their use to take the place of the Westminster one. The home in which the poet grew up, with its atmosphere of simple piety and affection, is beautifully suggested for us in "The Cottar's Saturday Night," and in "the saint, the husband, and the father," so vividly and lovingly described in that poem, we recognise the portrait of William Burness; a God-fearing and upright man, yet, as his neighbours whispered (and as we have seen not without reason) something of a heretic. Robert, who deeply loved and revered his father, adopted his religious opinions; and when the great theological controversy broke out, he naturally put himself on the side of the "New Light." In a note to one of his poems he says that "'New Light' is a cant phrase in the west of Scotland for those religious opinions which Dr. Taylor, of Norwich, so strenuously defended," just as we might speak of "New Theology" as a cant phrase for the opinions advocated by the Rev. R. J. Campbell. In the "Epistle to John Goudie" Burns refers to Dr. Taylor. Goudie was a Kilmarnock tradesman who wrote a book of theological essays which vindicated the liberal views and added fuel to the fire of controversy. So Burns writes to him:

"'Tis you and Taylor are the chief Wha are to blame for this mischief."

At the time when the controversy began, Burns was about twenty-five, and was occupying with his brother the farm of Mossiel, in the parish of Mauchline, Ayrshire. He had already become conscious of his powers as a poet, and his productions had astonished and delighted such of his relatives and friends as had read or heard them. He had also been guilty of a grave misdemeanour, and for this, in accordance with the custom of the time, he was publicly rebuked in the Mauchline Church—a proceeding which he resented most intensely. Mr. Auld, the minister, and his kirk session were, of course, but doing what by the law of the church was their duty; and we must remember this in our judgment of them; yet it is easy to understand how their action must have offended a proud, sensitive soul like Burns. Other and wiser treatment, or the same treatment administered by wiser men, might have made all the difference in his after character and career.

The "New Light" controversy marked an important epoch in the poet's life. The part he played in it matured his powers, bringing out especially his wonderful gift of satire; and it brought him a wider and more influential circle of friends and admirers. It also afforded him, it must be said, the welcome opportunity of avenging himself on the minister and kirk session of Mauchline. It is difficult indeed to say how much his championship of the New Light party was inspired by pure love of truth, and how much was due to the desire to pay back Mr. Auld and his elders (including "Holy Willie") for the affront* they had put upon him. That even without this personal animus he would have taken sides in the controversy is beyond a doubt. "Being a Scot," says Mr. Henley, "he was instinctively a theologian," and therefore could not remain neutral in such a dispute; and "being himself," continues that writer, "he was inevitably liberal-minded." But if the desire to clear off old scores against some leaders of the Old Light or Orthodox party gave point to his satire, it caused some coarseness and misrepresentation also. In reading his satirical poems, therefore, we have to allow for the personal resentment which colours his portraits of the men from whom he differed, which makes the shadows darker than they really were, and leaves out all—and there was a good deal—that was amiable and excellent in the characters and lives of these men. Perhaps even "Holy Willie" was not quite so bad as Burns pictures him—though by all accounts he was bad enough. It was, however, against the whole system of religion, the old hard Calvinism which had so long held Scotland, and especially the west of it, in its grip, that Burns revolted; his personal quarrel with some of its exponents was after all a matter of accident and detail. He was a child of nature and joy and love; and between him and the grim gospel of Calvinism there was no sort of congruity whatsoever. He who had such a passionate delight in all natural things, such a keen eye for the beauty of the world, and such a quick ear for its music, could not see that this earth is so dismal and doleful a place as the orthodox theology represented it to be. He who loved his fellow men so intensely and sang of the dignity of honest labour and of the time when

"Man to man the world o'er Shall brithers be for a' that," could not believe that man is such a poor miserable rascal as Calvinism held him to be, destined, with few exceptions, to eternal damnation. . . . Scottish Calvinism is, even yet, not dead, though it is now more dead than alive; but of a truth Burns signed its death warrant when he wrote "Holy Willie's Prayer," beginning

"O Thou wha in the heavens dost dwell
Wha as it pleases best thyself,
Sends ane to heaven and ten to hell
A' for thy glory;
And no for onie guid or ill
They've done afore thee."

The doctrinal pre-suppositions of that "prayer"—that some are elected to salvation and others fore-ordained to eternal damnation, that all mankind are guilty because of Adam's transgression, that there are babes suffering torments in hell—have all their basis in the "Westminster Confession of Faith," which, as everybody is being reminded, is incorporated in the Trust Deed of the City Temple, London; and there are many people, forsooth, who are calling on Mr. Campbell to resign for not preaching in accordance with that Confession!

The first of the New Light poems seems to have been "The Twa Herds," occasioned by a quarrel which had taken place between two ministers of the Orthodox party:—

"The twa best herds in a' the wast
That e'er ga'e gospel horn a blast
These five and twenty simmers past
O! dool to tell,
Ha'e had a bitter black out-cast
Atween themself'!

And so on through lines in which the humour is as boisterous as the satire is keen. The same can be said of "The Ordination," and also, and above all, of "The Holy Fair." For the wonderful descriptive power which, in fewest words, hits off men and manners, there is probably nothing comparable to these poems in all literature.

The only other satirical poem which, as produced during the New Light controversy, calls for notice, is "The Kirk's Alarm." A hue and cry had been raised against two New Light divines at Ayr, Drs. McGill and Dalrymple. So great was the opposition to their teaching that they were summoned to appear before the Church courts and answer to the charge of heresy; the particular doctrines on which they were considered "unsound" being those of original sin and the Trinity. Apparently they had been reading Dr. Taylor of Norwich! The consternation which their heresy caused in the Kirk or, at anyrate in the Old Light section of it, finds humorous expression in the poem, of which I quote a few verses:

"Orthodox, orthodox, wha believe in John Knox,
Let me sound an alarm to your conscience,

There's a heretic blast has been blawn
in the Wast:

'That what is not sense must be non-sense.'

Dr. Mac, Dr. Mac, you' should stretch on a rack,
To strike evil-doers wi' terror,
To join faith and sense upon onie pretence
Is heretic damnable error.

D'rymple mild, D'rymple mild, though your heart's like a child
And your life like the new-driven snaw, Yet that winna save ye, auld Satan must have ye
For preaching that three's ane an' twa."

"To join faith and sense upon any pretence" is still unfortunately very wrong, in the opinion of some theologians, as the present controversy is showing. Yet we doubt not that for multitudes at this time a reasonable faith is at last emerging, like the sun from behind the clouds. What has long been regarded as a heresy is now being recognised by many as the very truth of God, which for years they have been feeling after, if haply they might find it. It is being widely realised that Christianity is something very different, something simpler, grander, more rational and more helpful than orthodox theology has made of it. For this discovery, which many in all the churches are making, we must needs rejoice and be thankful; for verily it seems as if a new era in the history of liberal Christianity has now begun.

Burns' revolt against Calvinism was merely one phase of his revolt against everything that is artificial, inhuman, out of touch with the realities of life and the finer instincts of the heart. It was through this revolt of his against all things unnatural that he initiated what is known as the romantic movement in English poetry—the movement of which Wordsworth became the great high priest. In several of his poems Wordsworth acknowledged his debt to Burns. Thus he wrote of him: he "Showed my youth

How verse may build a princely throne
On humble truth."

And, indeed, it is on "humble truth" that all great things are built, whether in life or literature or religion. Theology has been called the Queen of the Sciences; and her throne must needs be built on humble truth. Creeds and systems of doctrine which have any other foundation are destined to be swept away and cease to be.

THE Jowett Lectures for this year at the Passmore Edwards Settlement, Tavistock-place, W.C., are being given by Dr. James Moffatt, author of "The Historical New Testament." There are to be ten lectures in all, on "The Conception of the Spirit in Early Christianity," and we are very sorry we did not hear of the lectures before the course had begun. The first lecture was on Jan. 30, and the course, which is freely open to the public, continues on Wednesdays until Feb. 20, and then is continued on Mondays and Wednesdays for three more weeks, ending with a summary on Wednesday, March 13.

BANDS OF HEALTH.

SIR,—I do not agree with Miss Edith Gittins that the duty of work for health in our churches "is so manifest that there seems little need to urge it." To Miss Gittins herself, indeed, who is in this as in other fields, an active, devoted and successful worker, it is no doubt manifest enough; and there is an increasing number of people who recognise it as urgent, and wait for somebody else to do it. Mr. Perry seems to me to hit the nail on the head. We need what I have asked for, namely, organisation. The sentiment of our congregations is more or less prepared for this work, but it needs raising, informing, encouraging to work, and providing with tools.

The immense body of work to be done cannot be disposed of by sporadic, haphazard effort. We need a widely distributed and strongly federated society of workers. There is work to do in our own households. We must ventilate, drain, and otherwise render worthy of their object our own churches and Sunday-schools. Buildings of this sort ought to be subjected to as stringent an inspection and public sanitary control as factories and dwelling-houses. There is a vast teaching work to be done, such as cannot be attempted without special organisation, and cannot be well done unless that organisation is both locally strong and centrally united. In every town there is need of civic reform in hygiene and sanitation, and a keen vigilance committee of people to whom the maintenance of public health is a religious duty is required to guide it. There is, lastly, a national work to be done. For instance, the air space requirements in public elementary schools are scandalously inadequate. Whose business is it to redress this wrong to the race, if not ours? And much of what is really needed in towns and villages cannot be obtained without Parliamentary action.

If we begin, the other denominations will soon follow. They may not federate with us, but they will federate among themselves, and the work will get done. I am quite ready to do what I have been asked to do, and submit a plan of campaign; but I would rather delegate this task to a more experienced and competent worker. There is, however, no need to wait for this before setting to work locally. It is never too soon to respond to a holy call, and those who need guidance are no longer ignorant where it may be obtained.

E. W. LUMMIS.

SCOTTISH UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

SIR,—Mr. Graham thinks that in 1904 the sum of £30 would have saved Kilmarnock. In 1904 the S.U.A. spent £105 on that church. If the Committee had thought that another £30 would save the church, the amount would have been voted. We are all sorry for what has taken place, but the S.U.A. has done its best and is not to blame. Kilmarnock has been a failing church for years. Each year the congregation has seemed to get smaller, and its ability to contribute to the funds to diminish. The building has sitting accommodation for about 600 people. Of late the congregation has numbered possibly between 30 and 40. There are bonds on the property amounting to £600. The building needs £300 spent on it. For a few years large grants have been made by the McQuaker Trustees and the Committee of the S.U.A. to support the minister and to pay other expenses. In 1905 it seemed to my Committee that it would be wise to sell the present building, and to advise the congregation to take a small hall. At the annual meeting of the Association held in October, 1905, Mr. Graham and Mr. Webster both declared that the Committee had made a mistake. A heated discussion took place. At 6 p.m. the meeting adjourned for tea. Immediately after tea I moved: "That we approve of the Report as submitted, but seeing that a new offer has been made by the friends of the Kilmarnock Church to pay all the burdens on that church for one year, that we ask the Committee to take no further steps for the sale of the building during this period." Mr. Graham seconded, and this motion was carried. But during that year the congregation still seemed to dwindle. In December, 1906, the Committee decided to put the building into the market. The Congregation had ceased to meet because of this decision: Until the building is sold the people were to have the free use of it, were to have all the preachers found for them quite free, and were only to pay the incidental expenses of carrying on the services: I offered to find a hall and to get the rent of it for a time after the building was sold if the people would continue meeting. Now, sir, supposing my Committee were to issue an appeal to the Unitarian public for £900 to pay off the bonds and to put the church in good repair, do you think the money would be forthcoming? Mr. Webster thinks the appeal would be successful. My Committee take another view, and think the congregation ought to be willing to worship in a smaller place. Mr. Graham thinks the church ought to be retained because of its history. I do not believe that its history would bring a single penny out of Unitarian pockets. If the money were raised and the bonds cleared off and the repairs done, there would still be the need of a guarantee fund of about £200 annually to pay the minister's salary and to keep the services going. Until December 1, 1906, I have always voted against selling the church, but on that date I voted with the majority, but I was sorry there was no other prospect. I think your readers will agree with me that the S.U.A. is not to blame. E. T. RUSSELL,

A WARNING.

SIR,—During the past few days I have received several inquiries from London with reference to a man who gives the name, Frank Challis, and who says that he is known to me. I shall be glad if you will permit me to warn all to whom the man may apply for help that he has no authority to use my name for any purpose. I do not know him.

Blackley, W. HOLMSHAW.
Manchester, February 6.

WELL, it is not so quiet now; on the contrary, rather inclined to be noisy, if not rowdy, owing to the number of people who are all talking at once in about all possible keys and on a vast variety of subjects. A General Election, run along "sectarian" lines for the most part, a strike of bricklayers, and sensational disclosures relative to the morality of one or more of our leading citizens, with a number of small incidents thrown in, leave one but little leisure to be quiet. I will try, however, to forget all about these topics, which could hardly keep their freshness across a long sea voyage, whilst I tell a simple story of one or two events that are of more than private interpretation.

As to the season, it is late spring; this year we have had no spring, but continuous winter down to the time of writing. This is the time appointed for the gathering of the ecclesiastical clans; these have not failed us if the spring has. As a matter of fact, they have been more abundant than usual owing to the "Church Congress" holding its meetings in the "Queen City of the South." These past, we were excited by the announcement of a parley between the Anglicans and Presbyterians as to a possible basis of union of the two bodies. The gatherings of the Baptists falling at the same time were quite dwarfed by the side of the larger assemblies and the more far-reaching questions touched upon.

Yet my first word must be about these. The one point of special interest in their meetings was a personal incident, which, however, goes beyond a merely personal issue. A few weeks ago a Baptist minister had the courage to declare that he did not believe in everlasting punishment, no startling announcement in the twentieth century, perhaps, but for the Baptists of Victoria it was both novel and startling, if not positively outrageous. But the issue of the incident is the curious part over which I do not know whether I ought to laugh or cry. Once or twice before, let me explain, this same minister has been in trouble for being a little ahead of his denomination, but he has never before had to appear as a "martyr." Now, however, he describes himself as "a sufferer," inasmuch as he is unsound as to the blessed hope of an eternal hell. The "suffering" involved the resignation of his theological chair, as one who could only teach so maimed a theology was obviously not fit to instruct students for the ministry. This amount of "suffering" was, apparently, sufficient "satisfaction" for his personal offence, and was accepted as such by the Union, which decided not even to discuss the merits of the question in view of the resignation. Evidently it is a much less serious matter to mislead a congregation than to instil poison into the minds of the students. In this way peace was established. The incident shows as well as anything else where some of the churches of Victoria stand.

By a sheer coincidence the Presbyterians also had a field day about a theological chair, only their trouble arose from no desire to empty one, but from an excessive anxiety to fill a chair that was vacant with a man who would fit it exactly. There seems to have been some doubt as to the shape of the said chair, whether it was round or square, or elliptical, or of some other shape that is not easily described. Hence it was not so simple a matter as might appear to a mere outsider to find a man who would fill it perfectly. The local candidates were promptly excluded, their shape was correctly known—the anxiety began over the two candidates in Scotland, about whose form diverse opinions soon manifested themselves. In favour of a certain Mr. Cairns, it was contended that his figure was of the strictly traditional order, as became the chair he had to fill. Unfortunately the other candidate, one Dr. Ferries, had written a book, and so his opponents had a great advantage over him. The divines proved to their own satisfaction that the good doctor bulged a little, if the expression may be allowed, and this unfortunate tendency in him might disturb the centre of gravity of the chair itself, which required a faultless anatomy to poise it easily and gracefully. Neither side convinced the other, and the vote was a tie. The Moderator was alarmed, and dare not make the appointment by his own casting vote. The matter was referred back to the Assembly. Then the unexpected happened, as it will sometimes, even in an ecclesiastical gathering. Part of the clergy had gone back for Sunday duty, and in their absence a second vote was taken, and Mr. Cairns was elected by a considerable majority, but the total of his vote was much less than it was the day before, whilst Dr. Ferries, who ran neck to neck on the previous day had only a few supporters. The liberals tried to recover on another motion, viz., that if Mr. Cairns declined the post, Dr. Ferries should be declared elected. The disguise was too thin; the Assembly would not have an unorthodox man on any account. Some bitter things were said about "a mean advantage" and the like, and there was a good deal of feeling.

The incident leaves an unpleasant impression on the mind. Yet probably the matter is not settled. Mr. Cairns may decline to accept a position won on such terms; if so, the result may be different a year hence. In the meantime it is important to realise the significance of the incident. The supporters of Dr. Ferries knew that his opinions were not "sound" on one point, as the Presbyterian Church of Victoria understands "soundness," but they wished to vindicate the principle that it was neither necessary nor wise to institute an inquisitorial inquisition into the personal views of a candidate who was in every way fitted to fill the post with advantage to the church. That is a great step forward, and the fact that the attempt has been made and so nearly successfully leads one to hope for better things in no distant future.

The Church Congress was notable for two things, (1) The persistent way in which it harked back to "tradition," and (2) a daring proposal to establish one great "Australian Church." Of course, it was only an academical discussion, but the amount of support the suggestion received indicates better than anything else the objective of the Church of England in these southern lands. And it must be remembered that the proposal proceeded from a bishop. First, he asserted that "the Church in Australia is autonomous, and must not be bound to English rules. Any Australian province, and much more the General Synod, has undoubted power to adopt, say, a local name, a local code of canons, a local standard of ritual, a common trustees and vestries Act, and a local code of discipline suited to the requirements of the church in Australia; all of which in the opinion of not a few of us are things greatly to be desired." The bishop assumes that the Australian church will not depart from the faith, sacraments, or orders of the church, "as these have been handed down to us from time immemorial." "The great aim is," he goes on, "to form so comprehensive a body as to be able to include all the rest." The bishop would embrace everybody save the Roman Catholics, the Unitarians, the "Australian" church, and other heretics; that is, he would do this on certain conditions, which when looked into are a little disappointing. Here they are: "(1) The Scriptures, (2) the Apostles' and Nicene Creeds, (3) the two sacraments, and (4) the historic episcopate." These are, of course, the four Lambeth Articles, and the bishop rightly feels that the crux is in the fourth—the "historic episcopate." He proposes to surmount it by not insisting on the re-ordination of the present generation of Methodist and Presbyterian clergymen, but in some way which is not explained "episcopal orders" are to be given them, and lo! the Australian Church is in existence!

Criticism is not necessary; the conditions are impossible. It is only necessary to glance over the report, the "interim report" of the Committee on Church Union, composed of representatives of the Anglicans and the Presbyterians, to see that the bishop's thought and that of the committee do not coincide so far as they have gone. But it need only be said that the main issue is carefully avoided. My own impression is that the question will be very decorously buried by this committee, though there is not a man upon it that does not desire union if some really practical scheme could be devised. I cannot doubt that at the present stage, and along the lines suggested, union would be a national misfortune. There is something higher and more holy than mere conformity.

The whole question of union has been under consideration for a long time as between the Presbyterians and Methodists and Congregationalists, but interest seems to be going out of the subject as the hope of any solid achievement declines. Consequently it is difficult to say how the matter stands to-day. It is not dead, certainly, but I have not met any who can say how much life there is in it.

The fact we have to face is that it is not proposed to include Unitarians in either of the schemes; it will still be their painful duty to stand for that ideal of a church which is "Lofty as the love of God, and ample as the wants of man."

UNITARIAN HOME MISSIONARY COLLEGE.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE annual meeting of the Unitarian Home Missionary College was held in the Memorial Hall, Manchester, last week. The chair was occupied by Col. Pilcher, and there was a fair attendance of subscribers and friends. Apologies were announced on behalf of the treasurer, Mr. J. R. Beard, the deputy treasurer, Mr. G. Hadfield, the clerical secretary, Rev. E. L. H. Thomas, and others.

Mr. E. TALBOT, the lay secretary, read the annual report. The report had special interest in that it covered the first complete year under the new conditions inaugurated by the establishment of the college in the new residential Hall at Summerville. The new arrangements, the report stated, had worked with remarkable smoothness and efficiency. For this result they were indebted to the Principal and the matron, Miss Pantton Ham, whose capacity and devotion demanded the warmest recognition. During the session 1905-6 there had been eleven students in residence. In addition there had been in residence two former students of the college, who were studying for their B.D. degree in the University of Manchester, and two Indian students. At the close of the session Mr. E. Morgan took his B.A. degree and Mr. H. McLachlan, M.A., his B.D. degree. The committee felt they could not but rejoice that amongst the first batch of B.D.'s of the Victoria University of Manchester should be numbered an alumnus of their college. Not only had Mr. McLachlan taken his degree of B.D. with honours in Old Testament and History of Doctrine, but two other past students of the college, the Rev. H. J. Rossington, M.A., and Mr. E. Thackray, M.A., had only to pass in one further subject in order to complete the B.D. degree, Mr. Rossington having gained distinction in Comparative Religion and Mr. Thackray a prize in Ecclesiastical History.

The committee feel that they have much reason to be gratified at the nature of the careful and valuable joint report on the examinations presented by the Visitors to the college, the Rev. P. Moore, B.A., and Dr. S. H. Mellone. After many detailed and encouraging comments the Visitors remark:—

"The arrangement of the college courses, so as to provide at once for at least three classes of students—namely, the 'Special Aptitude' men, and those taking the ordinary course beginning at Owens College, and those whose capacities make it desirable that they should read for the B.D. degree, is not an easy thing: perhaps the great difficulty lies in meeting at once the needs of the first and third of the classes named. It is absolutely essential, however, that this should be done; and, in the opinion of the Visitors, the committee and tutors of the college are to be congratulated on the way in which it has so far been done. It is earnestly to be hoped that the class of student coming under the 'Special Aptitude' regulations, and the class of student qualified to work for the Divinity degree, will both be represented at the college in the future as in the past. It is well known that the results, as regards the degree students, have been remarkably gratifying and creditable to all concerned. It is also unquestioned that the usefulness of the students admitted, as having special aptitude for the ministry, will (by their college work) be greatly enhanced for the churches in which they may be called upon to minister. We have made a suggestion by which it seems possible that the advantages offered to this class of student may be still further increased."

The students of the college now number fifteen, of whom fourteen are in residence at Summerville and one is studying at Oxford. The committee have received many gifts during the year, for which they express their thanks. Among them are many books, ornaments, &c., for the Hall, and plants for the grounds; but the most important is the gift by Mr. J. R. Beard, of a copy of the portrait of the first Principal and one of the founders of the college, the late Dr. J. R. Beard. There is to be a public presentation of the portrait.

In the absence of the treasurer, the financial statement was read by Mr. G. H. Lawton. There was a net deficiency on the year's working of £286 5s. 11d. This included an item of £245 deficiency on the house account. It was subsequently pointed out that as soon as the promises to the Jubilee Memorial Fund had been paid, and the balance subscribed, the house account would on the present basis be self-supporting.

In moving the adoption of the report and balance-sheet, Col. Pilcher spoke of the great satisfaction which all the committee felt with the results which had accrued from the establishment of the college at Summerville. The committee and tutors now knew the students in a way they never did before, and they were able to help them in ways impossible under the old conditions. While they were all proud of the high distinctions which their students were gaining at the University, they were even more pleased with the faithful way in which they found all the men striving to fit themselves for their life's work. He had the greatest possible faith in the principles for which the college stood and in the services which it was rendering to the churches in whose service it was established.

Principal GORDON, who seconded the motion, read a letter conveying the greetings of the Chief Consistory in Hungary, expressing thanks for the reception given to the Hungarian student now in residence at Summerville, and he added the expression of his personal interest in the presence among them of a representative of the oldest organised Unitarian church in the world.

The reports having been adopted, the thanks of the subscribers were accorded to the Visitors, the Examiners, and the Medical Officers for their various valuable services, on the motion of Mr. R. Robinson, seconded by the Rev. G. Evans.

The Rev. DENDY AGATE moved the election of the new officers and committee. In doing so he expressed the deep sense of gratitude felt by all the committee and subscribers to the retiring president, the Rev. Charles C. Coe. Mr. Coe's presidency had, he said, covered the period of the most important development in the history of the college, and he would be remembered for his wise counsel and generous support in all the stages of that undertaking. In Mr. Grosvenor Talbot, of Leeds, they would have a president worthy to succeed Mr. Coe, than which he could offer no higher praise. The Rev. W. Harrison seconded, and it was adopted. The Rev. W. E. George moved the reappointment of the Jubilee Committee. As an alumnus of another college, he said he could not help feeling a little friendly envy of the present opportunities of the college with a Free Faculty of Theology at their doors, whereas in Oxford they had to conform to the Established Church if they wanted to take a theological degree.

The meeting closed with thanks to the chairman.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Dent n.—The annual congregational party was held at Wilton-street, last Saturday. After tea, the Rev. H. E. Perry took the chair, and was supported by the Rev. A. R. Andrew, of Gee Cross, and E. G. Evans, of Dukinfield. Addresses were given by the three ministers, and there were also pleasant music and other entertainments.

Dover.—For many years the work of the Sunday-school has suffered for want of a more suitable meeting-place than the vestries. Years ago a generous lady, Mrs. Fordham, gave a building, but for a long period this was let as a cottage. Recently the upper floor has been brought forward on pillars until it joins the chapel, and numerous alterations have been made; the result is a lofty, well-lighted hall, communicating with the top vestry, with two capital class-rooms and a vestry below. The original donor would hardly recognise her gift, but it would have gladdened her heart to see the happy party that filled up every nook of the new hall for the opening tea. On all sides were congratulations. If anyone felt criticisms he did not look them, still less utter them. The hall is seated for 100, but by careful packing another score were stowed away for the opening meeting. And, indeed, it was natural that all should look pleased, for did not the treasurer announce that over £300 of the total cost of £360 had already been received? The choir surpassed themselves, the speakers had an easy time. Mr. John Harrison, treasurer of the Provincial Assembly, declared the building open in a genial speech. The Rev. T. E. M. Edwards pointed out that a year ago he had truly prophesied that progress would be made under the pastorate of the Rev. C. A. Ginever. Mr. George Chitty spoke of the need of Sunday-school work. The Rev. J. H. Smith offered Deal's congratulations. Mrs. Ginever told how the members of the girls' club are to learn to manage a home, from Irish stew to scrubbing the floors. And Mr. Ginever made an ideal chairman, full of wit and enthusiasm. A pleasing incident was the presentation of a book of Bach's works to Mr. Alfred Dixon, who has recently relinquished the post of organist on his appointment as organist to the Garrison Church. Wednesday, January 30, was in sooth a red-letter day for the Adrian-street congregation, and the success of the gathering augurs well for the advancement of the cause of liberal religion in Dover.

Edinburgh.—St. Mark's Literary Society resumed its meetings on Monday evening last, when Rev. R. B. Drummond gave a reading of Euripides' beautiful drama of "Alkestis," with the assistance of Miss Netta Young, who read the part of Alkestis. The version of the play used was adapted from Browning's "transcript." The reading, which may be suspected of being quite a unique performance, was attentively listened to by a fairly numerous audience, and was evidently highly appreciated.

Great Yarmouth.—The annual meeting of the congregation was held on Sunday last after evening service. The Rev. John Birks presided, and Councillor James Milliment, J.P., presented the report and balance-sheet, which were unanimously adopted, being the best for many years. Great loss had been sustained by the death of Mr. Bruce Leach. Still, steady improvement could be reported in numbers, subscriptions, and offertories. Two courses of lectures on "The Unitarianism of To-day" had been given by the minister, the cost of printing and advertising being borne by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. The social union was popular and successful, and made a grant of £5 to the church funds. The Ladies' Society had done much useful work in connection with the church, and their sale of work was well carried through, with the result that they were able to devote £20 to the church funds. A resolution of thanks to the minister was heartily carried, and the meeting closed with the Doxology and Benediction.

London: Bermondsey.—The annual Sunday-school tea and prize distribution of the Fort-road Unitarian Sunday-school took place on Tuesday, January 29. During the evening Mr. John Harrison presented the prize books for attendance and good conduct to forty-seven of the scholars. Mr. Jesse Hipperson, in asking Mr. Harrison to accept the vote of thanks which had been proposed by Mr. Marks and seconded by Mr. Harris, spoke gratefully of his constant kindness to Bermondsey, and his unflinching interest in church and school. Mr. Harrison responded with warm expressions of goodwill.

London: Mansford-street.—The annual meeting of the congregation was held on Sunday, February 3, after evening service. The report and balance-sheet were adopted, and a vote of confidence in and thanks to the Rev. Gordon Cooper was unanimously passed. A vote of thanks to the chairman, Mr. Alfred Thompson, concluded the meeting.

London: Peckam.—The annual entertainment by the children of the Band of Hope and Sunday-school Guild was given on Saturday last, and the evening resulted in a welcome addition to the funds of the "Children's Church."

London: Stoke Newington-green.—The annual meeting of the congregation was held on Saturday last, Mr. Young in the chair. The report of the committee showed that the services had been well attended during the year, and that the work of the Sunday-school and allied institutions had been efficiently carried on. During the winter two courses of free lectures to mothers and young women on "Infant Care" and "Home Nursing" had been provided by the London County Council. The main interest in the report was its reference to the retirement of the Rev. Wm. Wooding, on his completion of 25 years of devoted service. The chairman, while recognising that advancing years and strain of work made the step necessary, expressed the regret and warm affection of the congregation for their minister, and was glad to say that he was remaining amongst them as a friend, exchanging the pulpit for the pew. He added that a testimonial had been subscribed, and would be presented by a deputation of the church. On the following Monday, Mr. Ion Pritchard and Mr. Arthur Titford waited on Mr. Wooding at his residence, and presented to him an address expressing the personal affection of the congregation and grateful thanks for all the work done by him on behalf of the church, and asked his acceptance of a cheque for 120 guineas contributed by 115 members and friends of Newington-green church.

Manchester: Upper Brook-street.—A course of sermons on the New Theology is being preached on the Sundays in February by the Revs. C. Peach, G. Evans, and W. E. George. In the opening sermon Mr. Peach said they had no desire to claim Mr. Campbell and his friends as Unitarians. But they did claim them as children of the same spirit—the spirit of free inquiry.

Saffron Walden.—On Tuesday evening a social tea was held in the General Baptist Chapel, followed by the annual financial meeting. Report was made of healthy activity in the various departments of work. The Trust of this chapel has suffered much recently through the depreciation of land values.

Southport (Resignation).—The Rev. F. B. Mott has resigned the ministry of the Portland-street Church, and intends, according to the Christian World, to reside in the neighbourhood of London and devote himself to literary work.

Stockport.—The annual parents' party, tea, and prize distribution was held on Thursday, Jan. 31. In the absence of the Rev. B. C. Constable, through illness, the chair was taken by Mr. W. Humphreys. An operetta, entitled "The Wishing Cap," was played by the children, and was most successful.

Stockton-on-Tees.—The Guild opened its winter session with a public lecture by Rev. R. H. Maister on "Dickens." There was a large audience, who thoroughly enjoyed a most interesting and entertaining lecture. Information has been received from the executors of the late Mr. Edwin Clephan, of Leicester, of a bequest to the church of £200. Mr. Clephan in his earlier years was a worshipper in this chapel, and took a life-long interest in its welfare, continuing his membership and subscribing liberally to its funds.

Walsall (Appointment).—The Rev. Philip E. Richards, B.A., formerly assistant minister at Halifax, has accepted the invitation of the congregation to become the minister at the Church of Our Saviour.

Yorkshire Unitarian Club.—The first meeting of the Club in Bradford was held last Saturday. At a general meeting in the afternoon the rules were adopted. Subsequently, the Rev. T. P. Spedding, E. Ceredig Jones, W. R. Shanks, and H. McLachlan, were elected to be honorary members of the club. In the evening a joint meeting of the Chapel-lane congregation and the Club was held in the Channing Hall, when the Rev. T. P. Spedding, Field Agent of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, delivered a Van Lecture, "The Story of a Summer Mission in 1906," with lantern illustrations. Mr. John Hargreaves, vice-president of the Club, occupied the chair. It should be noted that "any person of either sex, connected with any Unitarian organisation, congregation, or Sunday-school in Yorkshire may be a member of the Club," on payment of the minimum annual subscription of 1s. Either the Hon. Treasurer, Mr. F. G. Jackson, 8, Park-lane, Leeds, or the Hon. Secretary, will be glad to enrol members. Further, "Any Unitarian Minister may be elected as an hon. member of the Club." Will ministers desiring membership kindly communicate with the Hon. Secretary, Mr. A. Simpson, 17, Parkfield Mount, Beeston, Leeds. There are now 53 members of the Club.

The Faith of a Free Church and other Essays is another little volume gathering together the new issue of Tracts by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, in very pleasant handy form (2s. net). The title will be recognised as that of the valuable essay by Dr. Crothers, which holds the first place, and the volume contains also Dr. Crosskey's McQuaker lecture on "What is a Unitarian Christian?" Dr. Charles Beard's "The Church, the Bible, and Free Thought," Pandit Sastri's address on "Theism in India," Dr. J. E. Carpenter's "The Jesus of the Gospels and of History," &c. Very apt, in connection with the present interest in the "New Theology," is the quotation from the President of the American Unitarian Association, added as a motto to the volume: "Unitarianism is not a body of opinion, it is a habit of mind and a principal of conduct. There is no such thing as a Unitarian sect. We speak accurately only when we speak of a Unitarian movement. It is the movement away from dogmatic Christianity towards spiritual Christianity. Its effort is to realise for humanity a freer and richer life. It endeavours not to destroy, but to fulfil." Whatever dogmatists, friendly, or otherwise, may say as to the name, that is the kind of religion which, broadly speaking, the people called Unitarians now strive to promote. And others, under other names, in their own way, do the same.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE response to our request for subscriptions for the purpose of sending copies of THE INQUIRER to free libraries throughout the country has this year been prompt and generous; but there are still twenty-four of such copies, which we have been sending out, unprovided for. We should be grateful for further subscriptions to cover these, and, of course, still more, if possible, for we are assured that this effort to reach a wider circle of readers is thoroughly worth while.

WE called attention last year to the movement promoted by an influential committee for the erection of a Statue of Servetus at Vienne, where that eager scientist and theologian had been living for some time, when he was seized by the Inquisition, before his final betrayal into the hands of Calvin. Among those who have given their names in approval of the effort are Principal Gordon of Manchester, and the Rev. C. W. Wendte, of Boston, Mass. We note that Professor William Osler, of Oxford, has contributed 100 francs, and Sir John Brunner and Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence, 1,000 francs each. The Secretary of the Committee is M. Albert Monot, to be addressed at the Hôtel de Ville, Vienne (Isère), France. The Treasurer is M. J. Brenier, Maire de Vienne.

THE new Session of Parliament was opened by the King on Tuesday, the Speech from the Throne dwelling upon the "unfortunate differences" which have arisen between the two Houses, for which a solution must be found, and promising measures of licensing reform, of better administration of local affairs in Ireland, and for the reform of University education in that country, for the establishment of a Court of Criminal Appeal, for enabling Women to serve on Local Bodies, for the better Housing of the People, and other reforms.

LAST Saturday witnessed an impressive procession of women from Hyde Park to Exeter Hall, followed by a meeting at which the right of women to the franchise was powerfully advocated. Wednesday brought a very different demonstration. There were meetings of the Women's Social and Political Union afternoon and evening at the Caxton Hall, and twice an attempted march on Parliament was frustrated by the police. It is lamentable that if women will use such tactics in promotion of their cause the police cannot devise a more effectual and gentler strategy to prevent breaches of public order.

MR. JAMES BRYCE, on whom the King conferred the high honour of the Order of Merit on Monday, sailed with Mrs. Bryce on Wednesday from Liverpool on his mission to America as the new British Ambassador. It is felt on both sides of the Atlantic that no happier choice could have been made, and it is very pleasant for us, in the connection of liberal religious thought and life, to feel that in this year, when the International Council is to meet in Boston, our country will be represented at Washington by such a man.

WE understand that a full statement as to the proposed Society for the Encouragement of Progressive Liberal Thought will be made by the Rev. R. J. Campbell in the April number of the Hibbert Journal.

AT Cambridge the office of Downing Professor of the Laws of England (vacant by the death of Dr. F. W. Maitland) has been conferred upon Dr. Courtney Kenny. Dr. Kenny is a Trustee of Manchester College, in which, in 1871, he, as an "Occasional Student," attended the lectures of Dr. Martineau. An interesting illustration of the historical continuity of the old English Presbyterian congregations is afforded by the fact that Dr. Kenny is a registered member of our Halifax congregation, of which his ancestor, the Rev. Nathaniel Priestley, was (in 1696) the founder and the first minister; and in which, moreover, each of the intervening links in the chain of ancestry was, either throughout life, or at least for some period, a habitual worshipper—one of them, the Rev. John Ralph, also serving, from 1767 to 1795, as its minister.

DR. KENNY, who will be sixty next month, went up to Cambridge in 1871, and was senior in the Law and History Tripos in 1874. He gained the Chancellor's medal for law in 1875, and other university distinctions. Downing is Dr. Kenny's College, and he has been for some time Reader in English Law. He was in Parliament as Liberal member for the Barnsley Division of Yorkshire, 1885-86, and has taken great interest in town affairs in Cambridge.

THE January Quarterly Review contains a noteworthy article on the Charity Organisation Society, and this is followed by an article by Dr. C. H. Herford of Manchester on "Ruskin and the Gothic Revival." That revival, Dr. Herford says, is commonly dated from the building of Horace Walpole's famous temple of bric-a-brac at Strawberry Hill in 1750, and he adds: "Certainly in that case, no newborn child ever presented in its puckered features a more grotesque travesty of the future countenance of the 'man' it was to father." What Goethe did for the Gothic revival is here noted, and finally the great work of Ruskin who disclosed the ethical quality and mission of art.

"Ruskin, by shattering that old prosaic antithesis of the beautiful and the useful, gave a higher consecration both to labour and to art," and the Gothic revival came finally to bear the stamp, "in the ideas which it embodied or in the enthusiasms which it quickened and diffused, of the most vital intellectual energies of our time—the revolutionary passion for liberty, the scientific quest for organic law, the artists' worship of Nature, the poet's recovery of wonder, the democratic fervour of brotherhood, and that ideal upon which all our fragmentary aims seem tending to converge, the promotion of manifold, yet ordered, devout, but constructive human life."

THERE is no separate organ for the apprehension of divine truth, independent of will, feeling, and thought. Our knowledge of God comes to us in the interplay of those faculties.—W. R. Inge.

CORRESPONDENCE.

SCOTTISH UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

SIR,—The question between Mr. Russell and myself is the broad issue—Is the S.U.A. to blame for the present condition of the Kilmarnock Church? I maintain that it is, and have given four distinct reasons for so thinking, only one of which, I am sorry to say, has Mr. Russell really faced, and that one he has admitted. The first of these reasons is the refusal of the Association to sanction an urgent supplementary grant of £30—one, indeed, on which the existence of the church depended—and the cause for such refusal. By way of reply Mr. Russell tells us: "In 1904 the S.U.A. spent £105 on the church. If the committee had thought that another £30 would save the church the amount would have been voted." I accept the statement that owing to special circumstances at the close of the previous ministry £105 was spent on Kilmarnock during 1904, and this proves that up to a certain period the Association was generous, but Mr. Russell forgets that the grant that I refer to, although discussed at the end of 1904, was really for the year 1905, and when it came up for decision the era of generosity was past, and that of severity had begun. They would not grant £30 even to save the church, and the funds had to be raised elsewhere. The first part of Mr. Russell's statement only makes the case worse against the local committee. Notwithstanding the fact that they sent a special deputation to London in order to secure a grant of £150 for Kilmarnock with the full intention of carrying on the work there, and although it had been their custom to make considerable grants to that Church, they suddenly changed their policy when it was found that the MacQuaker Trustees positively declined to give more than £120. They then utterly refused to assist by making any grant themselves, and a strong effort was made to pass a resolution exposing the Church building for sale. Why this sudden change? In the interest of truth I am compelled to answer the question according to my convictions. The cause, in my opinion, was exasperation at the action of the MacQuaker Trustees in refusing the request of the deputation. In short, the matter developed into a quarrel, and the object of a large section of the committee now seemed to be to demonstrate to the MacQuaker Trustees that they, by their refusal, had created an impossible situation.

(2.) That I am not exaggerating is conclusively proved by the official letters of the late secretary, Mr. J. G. Davidson. He writes thus to the secretary of the Kilmarnock Church:—"I think the time has come when you must be made aware that the immediate stumbling block to your present success is the MacQuaker Trustees themselves." . . . "The MacQuaker Trustees, anxious to save themselves from open disaster, seized on the opportunity given them by the defection of Messrs. Graham and Wilson, and they have used this for their own ends to destroy you all the same, but at the same time get the S.U.A. blamed for the misfortune." These words were written by the proposer of the original motion to sell the church, and I ask—Am I wrong in believing that the animus revealed in such absurd and reckless accusations gives us the key to the situation? The so-called "defection" referred to consisted in voting against Mr. Davidson's motion to sell the building, and, as the motion was defeated, the "defection" had become the finding of his own committee, which he, as secretary, was in duty bound to see carried out. Further comment is unnecessary.

(3) The statement that at the close of 1905 the further use of the church building was granted on condition that the Association was relieved of all financial responsibility is admitted by Mr. Russell. The terms were the best that could be got, and I referred to it in order to show how little encouragement was given to the congregation.

(4) I maintain that the decision to sell the building has been arrived at without first exhausting every means to retain it. The main difficulty, as I gather from Mr. Russell, is that there is a bond upon it of £600, and, further, that it requires repairs, which he estimates would cost £300. The bond does not need to be disturbed meantime. It represents but a small rent, and I understand that against it there is an income from property. But what hinders the raising of £300 to make the necessary repairs? Has any effort been made in this direction?—and, if not, why not? Until that is done, the resolution to sell is premature.

Mr. Russell says the congregation at Kilmarnock has been dwindling. Is it a wonder? For two years they have been living with the threat of expulsion held over them. The Scottish Association has not only refused them financial support, but it has, I fear, made the congregation feel that their moral support was withdrawn also, while the knowledge of the dissensions existing between the Scottish and London Associations must have had a most depressing effect. The climax is reached when, the decision to sell having been arrived at, Mr. Russell, entirely unconscious of the bitter irony of his words, intimates the fact, and tells the faithful "30 or 40" (can we afford to depise that number?) that they may have the free use of the building "till it is sold." Is it a marvel that, tired and disgusted, they resolve to disband? There is a ray of hope in the fact that Mr. Russell only fell in with the resolution to sell because "he was sorry there was no other prospect." I urge him respectfully to consider how he can be sure that there is no other prospect until an effort is made to raise sufficient funds for the necessary repairs. Let him make the attempt.

JAMES GRAHAM

Ex-President, S.U.A.

Hazelwood, Bridge-of-Weir, Feb. 12.

SIR,—May I join my voice in the appeal made by Mr. Graham and Mr. Webster for the retention of this venerable and historical building, and for a further attempt to continue the congregation here? It was in Clerk's-lane church that the revolt from the United Secession Calvinism took place, which resulted, in 1843, in the formation of the Evangelical Union denomination, since merged into the Congregationalist body; and the church itself, with the congregation, was taken over into the new connection by its minister, the Rev. Dr. Morison, the leader of the reform movement.

A further step forward was made when, in 1885, while I held the missionary lectureship for the Scottish Unitarian Association, and largely in consequence of our meetings in Kilmarnock, the reins of the Evangelical Union were drawn so tight that the then minister of Clerk's-lane, the Rev. James Forrest, M.A. (now of St. Vincent-street Unitarian Church, Glasgow) withdrew from that denomination. In this he was supported by his congregation, who persuaded him to remain as minister of the "Clerk's-lane Free Christian Church," which henceforth became associated with the Unitarian body.

Such a history of progressive evolution of a church is worth some effort at preservation, and I cannot think that Unitarians, if they understand the facts, will lightly let such a connection go. If they do, and if those who grudged its alliance with liberal heresy regain possession of the property and make the church a living one again, it will be a reproach to us, and give good reason for exultation to the Evangelicals, who will naturally say that alliance with Unitarianism means death.

It may be too late to save the situation, and I have no knowledge of the facts in recent years beyond what has been expressed in the correspondence. But if anything can be done to avoid this stigma of reproach, I trust the Scottish Unitarian Association, or the British and Foreign, will, even at the eleventh hour, take the needful step. C. J. STREET.

Sheffield, February 13.

THERE is no end to the volumes written in defence of this or that church which sets itself forth as the only true church, and claims exclusive acceptance with God. But the unlettered Christian has an answer to them all. He cannot and need not seek it in libraries. He finds it, almost without seeking, in plain passages of the New Testament and in his own heart. He reads and he feels that religion is an Inward Life. This he knows, not by report, but by consciousness, by the prostration of his soul in penitence, by the surrender of his will to the Divine, by overflowing gratitude, by calm trust, and by a new love to his fellow-creatures. Will it do to tell such a man that the promises of Christianity do not belong to him, that access to God is denied him, because he is not joined with this or that exclusive church? Has not this access been granted to him already? Has he not prayed in his griefs, and been consoled? in his temptations, and been strengthened? Has he not found God near in his solitudes and in the great congregation? Does he thirst for anything so fervently as for perfect assimilation to the Divine purity? And can he question God's readiness to help him, because he is unable to find in Scripture a command to bind himself to this or another self-magnifying church?—Channing.

THE SUSTENTATION FUND.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE twenty-fourth annual general meeting of the contributors and friends of the Sustentation Fund for the Augmentation of Ministers' Stipends was held at Dr. Williams' Library, Gordon-square, London, on Wednesday, February 13, the Rev. Dr. Carpenter in the chair. There were also present Mr. Edgar Chatfield Clarke, treasurer, Mr. John Dendy, Mr. Edward J. Blake, and the Revs. F. Summers and V. D. Davis. There has never been so small an attendance since the foundation of the fund. Illness kept the president, the Rev. S. A. Steinthal, and the senior secretary, Mr. A. W. Worthington, away, and Mr. Frank Preston is in the West Indies. Messages of regret for absence were also received from the Rev. C. C. Coe and Messrs. Edwin Ellis, W. Byng Kenrick, and William Long. One may take it that the absence of contributors was not altogether due to illness and inclement weather, but in large measure also to complete confidence in the managers of the Fund.

In the absence of the secretaries, Mr. E. CHATFIELD CLARKE read the report as follows:—

THE REPORT.

Your managers feel increasing confidence from year to year in the wisdom which led to the establishment of the Sustentation Fund, and the advantages attendant on its operations. There are many Free Christian congregations in large towns, the number and means of whose members enable them to maintain an independent and often a prosperous position. There is, on the other hand, a constant effort to establish new congregations with open trusts, and these find encouragement and aid from the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and from the many District Associations whose organisation practically covers the whole country. Besides these two classes of congregations, a large number are sufficiently established to be beyond what might be termed the missionary stage, but yet have not the means to provide an adequate stipend for an efficient minister. Many of these congregations have existed for long periods, reaching in some cases to upwards of 200 years; have held during that time a position of local respect, and have exercised considerable influence beyond their walls; indeed, it may sometimes be observed that the existence of such a congregation in a small town leavens its atmosphere and curbs the rampant force of bigotry. It is especially important that such congregations should be able to procure the services of the "faithful and efficient ministers" whom it is the aim of your Fund to assist in providing. Such congregations may often be very earnest and self-sacrificing, yet be neither numerous nor wealthy enough to provide an adequate stipend for a competent minister. Without such a minister they may rapidly deteriorate in numbers and activity, and may even run the risk of extinction. In such cases the aid granted by your Fund is of great benefit; and, though the stipends secured by its help are often still very inadequate, your managers have reason to believe that the effect of the Fund is often felt, not only in increasing the vitality of congregations, but in aiding them to secure the services of more tried and able ministers than might otherwise have been possible. The managers are, however, well aware of the necessity of constant vigilance in order to be assured that the grants made by them are not operating to discourage local effort, and they are keeping this in view in making their grants from time to time.

The managers have received; as usual, numerous letters expressing the gratitude of congregations and ministers for the aid granted by the Fund, with occasional expressions as to its special acceptability under circumstances of difficulty or ill health.

In making the year's grants the managers often attach conditions, urging increased local contributions, the establishment of Sunday-schools, &c., where it appeared desirable. In many cases such conditions have been cheerfully complied with; but in some instances local difficulties have been reported of such a character as to satisfy the Board that compliance with their conditions should not be pressed at present.

In this connection, they have great pleasure in reporting that the circumstances of the congregation at Birkenhead have become sufficiently prosperous to enable it to dispense with the grant made them for many years past. Another grant, they are sorry to say, has not been renewed owing to the discontinuance of services at the Colyton Chapel.

Several applications have been referred to the Augmentation Fund from congregations situated in its area; and a few applications have been deferred for future consideration.

The grants for the year are as follows:—

Last year's report recorded the preparation of a scheme for a Consultation Board of the Trustees for funds in aid of ministers and students for the ministry, and the resolution of your managers expressing a modified approval of the scheme. The Board appointed representatives to attend the proposed Consultation Committee representing the Trusts in question, which was held at Oxford on April 17, 1906. Various resolutions were passed nem. con., of which the first only needs to be reported, viz:—

"That this meeting, in view of the replies received from the various Trusts, is of opinion that the scheme for a proposed Consultation Board is not at present practicable; but it earnestly urges that the various Trusts shall, as far as possible, consider their methods of administration from the point of view of the common work of the Churches; and it recommends that occasional joint meetings should be held for purposes of mutual co-operation in connection with the triennial gatherings of the National Conference."

It may be well to add that your managers have always endeavoured, and with some measure of success, to exchange information with the representatives of funds which aid congregations or ministers within the area of your work; and that, in the applications made to them for aid, they have always been confidentially informed as to grants received by congregations and their ministers, and have been helped thereby in fixing the amount to be granted by your Fund in each case where further aid appeared necessary or desirable.

The Conference Committee requested your Board to submit to the National Conference, held at Oxford last April, a report as to the work of the Sustentation Fund. Such a statement was duly prepared, approved by your managers, and presented to the Conference.

Your managers have also made some formal amendments in their bye-laws, which have been reprinted.

Your thanks are again due to the Honorary Treasurer for his successful effort to recover the repayment of income tax to the amount of £44 16s. 0d. He has invested, in accordance with a resolution the Board, a sum of £300 in the purchase of Cape of Good Hope Three per Cent. Consolidated Stock to the amount of £351 17s. 1d.

He has also received, in addition to some new subscriptions, a second donation from Mr. Charles Thomas, of Bristol, amounting to £100; and one of £50 from the Rev. Dr. Drummond, of Oxford.

The Contributors have to lament the death of the late Mr. David Ainsworth, who showed his interest in the Fund by a generous donation on its establishment, and also by continued services on the Board of Management from its commencement to the time of his decease. His genial presence and sound judgment will be missed at the Board, as it will be on many other committees, where his attendance and advice were ever welcome.

The Managers are pleased to say that Mr. T. A. Colfox, of Bridport, is willing to accept the seat thus rendered vacant on the Board, and has been duly nominated for election. They are especially pleased by his consent, as he will represent the great interest which his deceased father, Mr. William Colfox, manifested in the object of the Fund, to which he contributed a donation of £250 on its establishment, and also subscribed £50 a year till his death in the year just expired.

The loss of Mr. Edwin Clephan, of Leicester, is also a source of much regret, as he was warmly interested in the work of the Fund, was a generous subscriber, and served for many years on the Board of Management, and has bequeathed the handsome sum of £500 to the Fund by his will.

To this melancholy list of departed friends and supporters must also be added the names of Mr. A. Currey Briggs, of Leeds; Mr. J. Howard Brooks, of Wilmslow; Mrs. George Buckton, of Oxford; Mr. G. C. Thompson, of Cardiff; and Mr. Joseph Broome, of Llandudno.

The TREASURER also presented the accounts, and in doing so pointed out that the investments, if realised on the previous day at the current prices, would have produced £320 18s. 9d. more than the total of their cost, which was £24,794 4s. 3d. The total was £300 more than last year. The accounts, with a balance of £251 11s. 10d. from 1905, and £44 16s. of income-tax recovered, showed an income of £1,744 8s. 6d., donations (£80 more than last year), being £160 19s. 9d., annual subscriptions £431 14s. 8d., and interest on investments £855 6s. 3d. Grants amounting to £1,220 8s. 4d. were paid, and £300 went into Cape of Good Hope stock. A balance of £186 16s. 2d. was carried forward.

The CHAIRMAN in proposing the adoption of the report and accounts, said that the managers were never more convinced of the value of the Fund. Its growth meant an increase of usefulness. They had recently been making careful inquiry into the general effect of the Fund, and had now under consideration the statistics which had been obtained, but did not feel able at that meeting to take any definite action, because the attendance was unusually small. The matter, however, was seriously engaging their attention, and it opened up large questions of administration. The losses by death during the past year had been unusually numerous and grave. The friends who were gone were so well known, so well beloved, such earnest supporters of the Fund, that they could not contemplate the record without feelings of sorrow and affection. They trusted that the approved usefulness of the Fund would draw to it fresh supporters, and they commended the efforts of their devoted Treasurer as of great importance to the community of their churches.

Mr. JOHN DENDY seconded the resolution, and it was passed.

The PRESIDENT then moved the re-election of the three retiring managers, the Rev. S. A. Steinthal, the Rev. W. James, and Mr. A. W. Worthington, with special thanks to Mr. Steinthal for his services as president during the past three years.

This was seconded by Mr. E. J. Blake, and agreed to. Mr. T. A. Colfox was elected a manager in the place of the late David Ainsworth, and Mr. Edwin Ellis, J.P., was elected President. The other officers were re-elected, with warm acknowledgment of the value of their services. The whole of the resolutions passed will be found advertised in another column. The meeting closed with a vote of thanks to the Chairman.

THE PILGRIM FATHERS.

II.—NEW PLYMOUTH AND ITS FIRST CHURCH.

The English pilgrims to the Boston Congress will sight Cape Cod in seven or eight days; the Mayflower Pilgrims had to wait ten weeks. From the Barbican in old Plymouth town the little ship set sail for the open ocean, and the spot is now marked by a plain, flat stone, bearing the one word only "Mayflower, 1620." Let into an adjacent wall is a memorial tablet of metal recording the small event which was yet to make so great a mark on the North American continent. "On the 6th of September, 1620, in the Mayoralty of Thomas Fownes, after being 'kindly entertained and courteously used by divers friends there dwelling,' the Pilgrim Fathers sailed from Plymouth in the Mayflower, in the Providence of God to settle in New Plymouth, and to lay the foundation of the New England States."

Whilst the Pilgrims still waited their departure, letters arrived from John Robinson, their pastor. In these he repeats his intention to join them across the ocean so soon as he can; he bids them think of him as one being with them in best affection and most earnest longing, for God knows how willingly he would have borne his part with them. Solemnly enjoining many things upon their care and conscience, he finally charges them in farewell words, that as they are now to become a body politic setting up civil government, they must show their wisdom and godliness in choosing such governors as will promote the common good, and thence yield to them all honour and obedience as God's ordinance.

It was a cruel irony of fate which would not let John Robinson embark with his beloved and devoted flock. His spirit presided over the venture, and he still remained their pastor, for they would choose no other; but he was never to gain his heart's desire and rejoin them over the great water. Difficulties, not of his own making, kept him with the church in Leyden until he died, in five years' time, at the age of forty-nine. "If either prayers, tears, or means would have saved his life, he had not gone hence." John Robinson is not a high-sounding name, but he was undoubtedly the outstanding personality of this noble struggle for religious liberty which founded the New Plymouth colony. It is said that we read too much into his prophetic utterances, and that his faith in more Light and Truth was too limited to include him in the ranks of Religious Liberalism. Be that as it may, he was most certainly the religious liberal of his day, a controversialist but not a sectary, an early apostle of comprehension, toleration, and charity. He was a man of devout spirit and large heart, of broad judgment and scholarly habit; he was a hero, a prophet, and a saint. No portrait is known of him, and hence no statue embodies his memory in the Leyden of to-day; but in recent years a memorial tablet has been placed on the site of his church and house, containing this inscription:—

The Mayflower, 1620.

In Memory of
Rev. JOHN ROBINSON, M.A.,
Pastor of the English Church Worshipping Over Against
This Spot A.D. 1609-1625. Whence at His Prompting Went Forth
THE PILGRIM FATHERS
To Settle New England
In 1620.

Buried under this House of Worship 4 Mar. 1625.
Ætat XLIX. Years.

In Memoria Æterna Erit Justus.

John Robinson had not to meet the dangers of the deep. Ten weeks of peril and discomfort on "the fast and furious ocean" brought the Mayflower her first sight of land at Cape Cod, and thence, two days later, into Princetown Harbour on November 22. Six more anxious weeks spent in shore expeditions in search of a landing and settling place resulted in the choice of Patuxet, twenty-five miles distant, which they now renamed New Plymouth. After remaining until the following April, the Mayflower returned to England, and the Pilgrims were left to their lot across the Atlantic on the wild New England shore.

Now came the test of their courage and faith. How would they proceed in this strange, rough land with neither laws nor safeguards, and roving Indian warriors as their only neighbours! Their pastor's sage counsels were not forgotten, and they practised constitutional wisdom no less than religious freedom. Finding themselves without warrant in a region beyond their patent, whether through storm or the captain's trick, they met in the ship's cabin the night before landing, and drew up a compact, or covenant, which each male adult had to sign. The operative part of this covenant must be given in its own form:

"In the name of God, Amen. We whose names are underwritten. . . :

having undertaken for the glory of God, and advancement of the Christian faith, and honour of our King and country, a voyage to plant the first colony in the northern parts of Virginia, do, by these presents, solemnly and mutually, in the presence of God, and one of another, covenant and combine ourselves together into a civil body politic, for our better ordering and preservation, and furtherance of the ends aforesaid; and by virtue hereof to enact, constitute, and frame such just and equal laws, ordinances, acts, constitutions, and offices, from time to time, as shall be thought most meet and convenient for the general good of the Colony; unto which we promise all due submission and obedience. In witness whereof we have hereunder subscribed our names."

Of the forty-one signatures, the first seven gained much prominence and merit lasting remembrance:—John Carver, William Bradford, Edward Winslow, William Brewster, Isaac Allerton, Myles Standish, John Alden. Are they all names of sweet savour and entitled to honour? Carver was chosen governor; Bradford succeeded him later; Winslow held the office for three years; Brewster remained ruling elder; Standish became captain and military commander; Allerton was Winslow's assistant; Alden, a cooper, rose to a position of great honour, and proved the last survivor of all those who signed on the Mayflower. These men were the mainstay of the colony; this covenant was its charter of order and liberty.

Yet only through much suffering and affliction was the day to be won, for the heaviest trials had now to begin. Within the first three months no less than twenty-one of the signatories died from the effects of the winter cold, scarce food, or disease. Dangers from the Indians, the ruin of their first buildings by fire, drought, and harvest failure, and the death of Governor Carver, made their lot still heavier during the first year. But with dauntless faith and endurance they slowly overcame their difficulties, made a treaty with the Indians, built their fort and meeting-house, organised their church, commenced a Book of Records, instituted trial by jury, appointed a Governor's Council of seven to administer the colony, and by firm but tolerant action laid a deep and strong foundation during the first seven years of the Plymouth Plantation. They thus served as pioneers and forerunners of the second and more extended Puritan exodus which took place during the next twelve years, and formed larger colonies in Connecticut and Massachusetts. But the intolerance and narrowness of these later Puritans must never, in fairness, be laid to the charge of the broad-minded Pilgrim Fathers. When the three colonies at length federated into "The United Colonies of New England," the Pilgrim movement became merged and almost lost in the larger march of events.

But those who love its memory should visit Plymouth to-day. With no ordinary sensation does one stand by the Plymouth Rock, or stone, on which the brave Pilgrims first stepped when landing, and afterwards knelt down in thanksgiving.

It is not a rock of offence, nor a stone of stumbling, but a world-witness to religious freedom. Along the banks of the Town Brook they built their first plain dwellings; Leyden-street was their first street, and it leads up to Burial-hill, where the first winter victims were laid, and where a conspicuous marble obelisk marks the grave of Governor Bradford. High above the town towers the national monument of granite, in which a colossal figure of Faith is supported by four seated figures representing Morality, Law, Education, and Freedom. On the sides of the base are representations of the four famous scenes—the Departure from Delft Haven, the Signing of the Compact, the Landing at Plymouth, and the Treaty with the Indians.

But yet the building of most interest is the First Church, for was it not to get freedom of worship that the Pilgrims crossed the Atlantic? The history of the congregation has been written by its present minister, the Rev. John Cuckson, and with this as your guide, or, better still, the author himself, one may get to the heart of the Pilgrim movement. The present fine building is the fifth in turn, and a bronze tablet on its front bears the following proud inscription:—"The Church of Scrooby, Leyden, and the Mayflower gathered on this hill-side in 1620, has ever since preserved unbroken records and maintained a continuous ministry, its first covenant being still the basis of its fellowship. In reverent memory of its Pilgrim Founders this Fifth Meeting-House was erected A.D. MDCCCXCVII." In its interior are memorial windows representing "John Robinson addressing the departing Pilgrims" and "The Signing of the Compact." On its walls are memorials to its long succession of ministers—Brewster, Smith, Roger Williams, Reyner, Chauncey, Cotton, Little, Leonard, Robbins, Kendall, Briggs, Hall, Knapp, Osgood, and Lombard. In its tower hangs the bell, cast by Paul Revere, which for three generations, rang the Curfew at nine o'clock every night. Long may it stand, this First Church in Plymouth, not alone as a witness to the brave deeds of the Pilgrim Fathers in America, but as a testimony to civil and religious liberty all the world over.

IN THE CROW'S NEST.

THE night works enchantment upon our forests. At dawn the frosted pines gleam like belated ghosts, and in the full sunshine they tower, rank behind rank, like glorified spirits of trees. One can gaze upon them, with entire self-surrender to their unimaginable beauty, until all sense of time is lost. Moments may pass, or hours: suddenly one flees back into himself, almost with terror; so strange, so remote, and yet so certainly a part of the gazer's own soul are the faculties and instincts that begin to stir. It is easy to understand how the fakir sits, unconscious of cold and hunger, unkempt, ragged, unwashed, passively fed by his chela, lost in contemplation.

The sense of time is so easily lost. Our emotions are always playing tricks with it. "I'll tell you who Time ambles withal, who Time trots withal, who Time gallops withal, and who he stands still withal." To lose it seems like paying toll at the gate of a wonderland of cosmic emotion. And yet we always—we Westerns—start back in panic, and cling to our sense of time, for without it, whatever else we can do, we cannot really think. And in spite of the divers paces of time, in spite of our Langweile and Kurzweile, our need of pastime, our weeks that pass like days, and minutes that seem hours, in spite of our reputation for quickness or slowness, our standard of time must be, on the whole, a very stable thing.

Suppose it suddenly changed; became, let us say, a coarser instrument, so as to make larger quantities, to take account only of longer processes. Let the clock tick minutes instead of seconds. Nature would begin to rush past our poor, slow-witted race like a runaway colt; the cosmos would spin about us like the sails of a windmill. Every twelve minutes or so we should have a sunrise or a sunset, whose splendours would bloom and fade with magnificent swiftness; but their colours would not be those which we see now. Some of our spectrum would be utterly lost, and those tints of a lower vibration, which our eye cannot now perceive, would paint themselves on the sky and the whole face of earth.

Nature would speak, too, with a new voice—and so should we, if we wished to be heard—and all our musical instruments would be obsolete. Our electric lights would be set to switch themselves on and off automatically every twelve minutes; if anything went wrong with them, we should only have to wait a hand-washing while for the next daylight. We should see the sun rushing across the firmament, and the constellations hurrying in stately procession after him. The planets would bore their way visibly through the signs of the zodiac. The life of a moon would be less than twelve hours. If we still called a stretch of twenty-four hours a day, we should plough on Monday, sow on Tuesday, reap on Thursday. Fruit would ripen before our eyes as we sat in the orchard: "These apples are hard and green," we should say; "they had better not be gathered for two hours at least." For a few hours every week we should have to avoid these mountain passes, for what chance would anybody have of dodging an avalanche? And where tigers and snakes abound man would soon cease to abound under these new conditions.

What would happen if we slowed down another sixty-fold in our time perception? There would be no more day or night, but an eternal alternation of twelve seconds' light and darkness, to which the eye would have to accommodate itself. The sun would be a golden band right across the sky, the stars would all be shooting stars, with the wild planets shooting across their parallels, and the moon would flash in and out like a zoetrope picture. Think of the tides ebbing and flowing five times a minute, the nosing glaciers, the sudden flowers and herbage, the orchards clad for ten minutes with blossom, the forests burgeoning and withering within an hour!

And now, suppose we could make the converse experiment, and quicken our time-sense, so that it marked shorter intervals and processes. Let us divide the second into sixty parts, and give each of them the duration, for our minds, of a whole second. Once again the world of sound and colour would change, but in a direction clean contrary to that formerly imagined. We should all be able to hear the cry of the bat, which is too shrill for many ears, and much that is now unheard would be perceptible to all of us; while the lower tones of our present existence would sound no more. The high-vibration colours would come into our visible spectrum, and linger for fifteen or twenty hours on the sunset sky. When we had lost our sun we should have to wait a month before he rose again: Our wheat harvest would be reaped once in sixty years.

Turn the screw once more to the same extent, multiply our time sensibility yet again sixty-fold, and lo! our daylight lasts five years, and about five years of night come after it. And you will not need to go on long in this ratio before you have the whole life of man passed, in one town, at an everlasting nine o'clock in the morning. The sun has ceased to climb the sky: there he hangs, above unchanging fields and woods, and a tideless sea.

The imaginative reader can work out these little fancies in detail, if it list him. It is already clear that our time-sense and time-standard is much the same for all men, and must needs be so, and that man's place in Nature is fixed by his fixed sense of time. And yet time, it seems, is not and cannot be real. Our sense of time corresponds exactly to no real character in the cosmos. It is a form under which our cosmos—the only universe which matters to us, that of which we can ourselves be cognisant—must needs be apprehended.

We are getting used to the New Year, and no longer blunder in dating our letters. Some of our intentions and hopes are a little worn already. But let us keep them as fresh as we can. It is quite true that intentions fail, and hopes are disappointed, but there is no reason in this for damning our own intentions, and clouding our own hopes before their time. The only real hell is a place where, as Dante knew, no more good intentions can be formed, and, as Milton knew, hope never comes. So long as hope lives, the happiness to which hope points is alive too. Do you think the realisation, the retrospect on hope triumphant, is a greater joy? I am not sure. Our trickish friend Time is perhaps kindest to us when we look forward; in the backward glance there is always something sad—amid however much joy, something sad—which we have no longer any power to alter. But the future is the playground of our faculties; that we can alter; some of the sadness which, but for us, would be, can be abolished by our hope, and its daughter, our energy.

Like most of mankind, I have looked both ways. Lost for long hours, in a deserted mine, I blew out my last inch of candle, that I might rest without wasting my chances, and with eyes that grew used to the black darkness, divined rather than saw, a faint, far-off gleam of reflected light. And I have gazed through the Spring, leaping to life along quivering boughs, upon the death of a sun that had brought me joy. There is room in life for both outlooks, through death towards resurrection, through resurrection upon death conquered; but the last is fitted only for moments of rest, before the new darkness is breasted, the new gleam divined and followed.

Carry all other joys to the money-changers, and take them back in hope; that is the currency that carries you best through life. "To be fooled at last?" someone asks; "what do you know of the afterwards? What resurrection can you demonstrate that shall give you the fruition of your hope? To be fooled? How so, when my hope has been my joy throughout? Hope must needs, in its very nature, outstrip knowledge. But what could be than better this, to hope bravely to the end, and then lie down in hope? I have leave to sleep; my Father, if He needs me, will wake me.

OBITUARY.

ALDERMAN THOMAS HOLT.

It is with great regret that we record the death, on February 7, of Alderman Thomas Holt, of Bury, at his residence, Stoneholme, Walshaw, in his seventy-fifth year. Mr. Holt was a man of fine character, one of the stalwarts, most trusted and honoured in the fellowship of our churches, and he will be sorely missed.

Mr. Holt came of a long line of sturdy Nonconformists, connected for generations with the old Presbyterian Chapel in Bury. John Holt, of whom he was a direct descendant, was one of the subscribers to the building of the Silver-street Chapel in 1719, now represented by Bank-street Chapel, of which Mr. Holt was a life-long member. Born September 16, 1832, Thomas Holt as a boy was a hand-loom weaver. He entered the business of his father, Mr. William Holt, on leaving school, and soon after, power looms were introduced. In 1856 he and his brother were taken into partnership, and the firm is still known as William Holt & Sons. "One might search Lancashire through," says the Bury Times, "and fail to find a firm which to the same extent united the simplicity of the old order with the progressiveness of the new."

Mr. Holt's activities were by no means confined to his business. For ten years he served on the Bury Board of Guardians, and then in 1890 entered the Town Council. He was Mayor in 1900-1. To him fell the duty in January, 1901, of proclaiming the King in the market square, and he presided at the opening of the Art Gallery and Free Library by the Earl of Derby in the following October. He was a man of tried wisdom and sagacity, whose influence was felt in all the work of administration, and he held other offices of trust. He was a strong Liberal, and a recognised leader in the district.

Mr. Holt had been a magistrate for fourteen years, and the Magistrate's Clerk, speaking of him in the Court on the morning after his death, said:—"He served the borough extremely well as Mayor, and he believed he was also known in the local village as the Mayor of Walshaw. He thought Mr. Holt, more than any other man, was endowed with common sense, and was a typical Lancashire man. None of them would forget the incident which occurred in that Court some time ago when a well-known resident of Walshaw, named Squire Roston, addressed Mr. Holt, who was then acting as Chairman, in the words 'Now, Tummas,' showing the very friendly feeling which existed between Mr. Holt and the residents of Walshaw."

To Bank-street Chapel, and its tradition of a liberal Nonconformity, his whole heart was given. He entered the Sunday-school in 1844, and from 1862 for more than forty years he was one of the superintendents. At the meetings of the Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire his was a familiar figure, and in all matters connected with the church life of the district he was a trusted counsellor. We shall hope to publish next week some further tributes from friends who have had a long and intimate knowledge of Mr. Holt's character.

The funeral on Tuesday was the occasion of a remarkable demonstration of respect. From Walshaw to the Holebottom Cemetery the hearse was followed by more than fifty carriages, and there were manifestations of sorrow on every side. The service was conducted by the Rev. E. D. Priestley Evans. To-morrow (Sunday) Mr. Evans will preach a memorial sermon in Bank-street Chapel, Bury.

COUNCILLOR J. W. GROWCOTT.

Our congregation at Oldbury has lost a valued member through the death of Councillor J. W. Growcott, which occurred on Jan. 30 in a private hospital at Birmingham after a severe operation. Mr. Growcott, who was 63 years of age, was a native of Kingswinford, and as a young man had many difficulties to face; he became, however, a successful mining engineer, and for ten years had been a member of the Oldbury District Council. He was brought up among the Primitive Methodists, and for some time was a local preacher, until he became a Unitarian, and joined the chapel first at Dudley and on his removal to Rounds Green, at Oldbury.

THE LATE MR. J. W. PRESTON, J.P.

As one who had the privilege of much correspondence and some personal intercourse with the late Mr. J. W. Preston, I may be permitted to give the readers of THE INQUIRER, a few notes about him. For further details they may turn to last week's issue of the Christian Life, where our friend "T. L. M.," with the vigour that defies his eighty years, contributes a longer account. In that account Mr. Preston's birth (1825) and education for the Church, are set forth, as well as the curacies held by him before his theological opinions led him outside the establishment. His last curacy was at Bowerchalk, Wilts., where he became a warm friend of the celebrated Dr. Rowland Williams, the Broad Churchman, and contributor to "Essays and Reviews." Inheriting a competent fortune he retired into private life, residing first at Park-stone, whence he attended the Unitarian Church at Poole; later he made his home in Lyme Regis, and there spent the last thirty years of his life.

Mr. Preston (says a local newspaper) "had endeared himself to all classes during his residence amongst us." As a Guardian of the poor, and as a county magistrate, he faithfully served the community, but his obvious bent was towards the study, and his scholarship was deep, wide, and varied. He frequently sent letters or other contributions to this journal, and, as a specimen of his offerings, there now lies before me a copy of some fifty Greek hexameters, which he chiefly fashioned out of quotations from Homer, the Psalms, Isaiah, Micah, Cleanthes, the Stoic, St. Paul, &c. This cento, however, did not appear in these columns. I remember another of his notes dealing with the epitaph on the Rev. Jeremiah Joyce, at Cheshunt, where Mr. Preston lived as a boy. Perhaps even good Unitarians exist who do not know who Joyce was, but his name is honoured still by some who owe their first taste of science to his "Dialogues." Mr. Preston had, amongst other treasures, many interesting documents in his library at Cliff House, Lyme Regis, among them, I believe, the manuscript of the very first of Macaulay's Essays, which was written by the future historian when he was a boy under the tutorship of the Rev. Matthew Morris Preston, the father of my old friend. Of his own MSS. there was abundance, for he was a facile and ingenious verse writer, and some of his compositions showed a tender grace, more of them a kindly yet pungent humour. A little volume of "Lyme Lyrics," very badly printed, is all, I believe, that he ever published.

Gentle, shrewd, devout and cultured, he has passed to rest amid the tender regrets of many friends;

W. G. T.

It is no man's business whether he has genius or not; work he must, whatever he is, but quietly and steadily; and the natural and unforced results of such work will always be the things that God meant him to do, and will be his best. If he be a great man, they will be great things; if a small man, small things; but always, if thus peacefully done, good and right.

Ruskin.

EVERY loyal obedience to the inner call of duty, every attempt at speaking bravely the thing that is within one's heart, every attempt to utter kindness and goodwill, brings us into connection with the whole history of the upward movement of the world. So have good men and women been doing from the beginning, and all our heritage is but the result of their effort. If to us there comes the need of meeting a new situation, speaking in a new accent, making for the time a new emphasis, we are simply following out that universal law through which the world grows more and more, though men die and fail. A new commandment speaks to us. When we obey it, we find that it is the old commandment which we have heard from the beginning.—S. M. Crothers.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

It was the Christmas holidays, and there was bright, cold winter weather. The garden was covered with snow, and Tommy thought the distant hills looked like frosted sugar cakes. The earth under the snow was frozen hard, and there was ice on the streams and ponds in the valley below.

Tommy and Lilian were very busy and very happy.

Tommy was making a snow Father Christmas, and Lilian was making a birds' Christmas tree, which was supposed to be Father Christmas's present to the poor little starving birds.

The snow Father Christmas looked very fine when he was finished. He had a peaked cap, and a long white beard and coal black eyes (for indeed they were made of two bits of coal), and a long white robe, and his right arm was stretched out pointing to his Christmas tree. He seemed to say, "I am Father Christmas. I wish well to everybody, and I will not let the little birds starve. See what I have done for them!"

Truly it was a wonderful Christmas tree that stood on the lawn not far from the house.

It was hung with bones dangling on strings, and there were two half cocoanut shells hanging there with pieces of fat inside for the tits.

Lilian was very proud of her work, and stood smiling at it, not minding in the least the coldness of her little rosy fingers. Next she begged pieces of stale bread from the cook, and soaked them and spread them on the ground round the tree. Then it was dinner-time, and both children came indoors, and had a great deal to say during dinner.

"You see, mummy," said Lilian, "Dicky Specklebreast may be hungry now that he can't get any worms, and I shouldn't like him to die, nor any other of our garden birds, so I shall feed them every day while it's so cold."

Dicky Specklebreast was a little thrush that the children had reared in the spring and then allowed to go free. For many days after that, Tommy and Lilian fed their feathered friends, and would stand at the window and watch them eat. The dear little grey tits and blue tits would sit on the cocoanuts and dip their little beaks inside, nibbling at the food. Sometimes it was all gone, and then they would sit on the edge of the cocoanut shell and peep into it, and then look at the children in the window as much as to say, "It's empty; give me some more nice fat, please!" They liked the meat bones, too, and would hang upon them, often topsy-turvy, and peck and eat as they swung about; for the tits are little acrobats.

Sometimes a robin would come to the cocoanut, too; but never if a tit was there, for the robin is shy of other birds.

"Shall I tell you the legend of the robins?" said Mrs. Weldon one day to the children.

"Yes, do mummy—look, there are two on the lawn now!"

"It is said that when our Saviour was left hanging on the cross, lonely and deserted, a little robin came to him, and perched upon the crown of thorns upon his head, and a thorn pierced the little robin's breast, and it bled, and the feathers were stained red; and ever since the robin has had a red breast, and been the friend of man.

"Gardeners think the robin lucky, and like to have one hopping round while they dig. Indeed, our gardener says it is unlucky to dig without a robin near."

"Mother," said Tommy one day, as he and Lilian stood at the window watching the birds feed, "the birds are not one bit nice to each other; there's a big thrush who has frightened away a little sparrow and seized his piece of baked potato skin. Oh! and there's another thrush looking so hungrily at him while he eats it, and he won't give him a bit! He's just horrid, and now a big starling has come and seized it, and frightened him away, and it serves him right!"

"And what do you think I saw yesterday," chimed in Lilian? "I saw a lot of starlings quarrelling over a piece of bread. They wouldn't let each other get it, and there was a little hungry sparrow looking on a little way off. He waited till the starlings were so busy fighting each other away that they forgot to guard the bread, and then he popped in and seized it, and flew away with it! I did laugh! But I wonder why the birds are so unkind to one another, mummy?"

"Dear," said her mother, "Nature's ways are hard to understand, but there is always a reason for them. Wise men tell us that in nature, only the strong survive, while the weak perish, and so the race is carried on by the best birds and the best animals, and all are strong because the feeble disappear. It used to be so with men in savage times too. The weak were killed in war or died of hunger, and only the strong survived."

"It seems very cruel, mummy."

"Yes, dear, it is cruel, and so Christ came to show us a still higher law, to tell us that the strong must protect the weak, the rich must help the poor, that the life of love is the highest life of all, and that everybody, even little children like you, can try and lead it."

Mrs. Weldon laid a hand gently on each young head, and the children turned thoughtfully away from the window:

VIOLET SOLLY.

THE Rev. F. B. Mott, whose resignation of the Southport pulpit we reported last week, informs us that he has no intention of giving up the regular ministry, and that what we repeated from the Christian World on that subject was purely newspaper gossip, due to complete misapprehension.

"PSALMS OF THE WEST," though still issued anonymously, is now known to be the work of the Hon. Rollo Russell. First published in 1889, a third and revised edition was brought out in 1897 by Messrs. Longmans, and a fourth impression two years later. This is now re-issued in paper cover for sixpence net, an effort to reach a wider public which we very warmly welcome. Friends should do all they can to make this beautiful book of modern devotion more generally known. Copies may be had at Essex Hall.

FOR THE CONGREGATION.

AMID the urgent interests of the world one returns always to the thought of the congregation as the natural home and centre of religious life, at any rate in its social aspect, to be kept pure and strong, as the appointed place of refuge, of rest and refreshment for those engaged in the strife of daily work and all earnest efforts of progress in the world. And not this alone, but it must be also a centre of kindling force, from which inspiration may be gathered, and a driving power for better life be obtained.

This must be our constant care, to preserve the congregation from deterioration, to maintain the home feeling, its power of ministering to peace and gladness in all who are gathered into its fellowship, and any who may chance to come in; and with such power of quiet ministry must go the deeper convictions of spiritual truth and communion with the UNSEEN, that the power of God in truth and righteousness may be there convincingly felt, and a pure searching light illumine the whole range of daily life, and in all and through all its ideal of perfect love.

The church, which is the living congregation of faithful men, must always be ready to teach and to learn, there must be the kindling of living impulse in every heart, and through sympathy and common aspiration, a kindling of him who is appointed especially to minister, to stronger effort, more perfect consecration, clearer vision, and more confident, rejoicing, and convincing speech.

It is well when a congregation is earnestly set to equip itself more perfectly for that closer fellowship, both in worship and in work, and the opening of the Preston Memorial Buildings for Unity Church, here recorded, is a welcome instance of what is repeatedly being done by our churches, of which the effort to complete the MARTINEAU Memorial at Norwich is another. Again, the report of the Sustentation Fund, also published this week, bears witness to another effort for the strengthening of the life and work of our churches, which is to be earnestly commended to all who wish them well.

PRESTON MEMORIAL AT ISLINGTON.

THE Preston Memorial Buildings, which are a greatly needed addition to the old schoolroom of Unity Church, Islington, were opened by Miss Preston on Tuesday evening, in the presence of a large gathering of friends. The buildings are a memorial to her brother, the late Joseph T. Preston, erected by the congregation of which he was throughout his life a devoted member.

A door leads out of the old schoolroom into a fine new class-room, which continues the line of the church buildings to Florence-street at the back, where there is a new entrance, together with a kitchen and cloak-room, and a staircase leading to three upper stories; on the first floor are two smaller class-rooms, and the rest of the building forms an admirable little house for the caretaker. The best use has been made of the space available, by the architect, Mr. H. Chatfield Clarke, and cordial tribute was paid at the meeting to the excellent manner in which the work had been carried out by the builder, Mr. C. P. Roberts, who is a member of the congregation. The contract for the building was £1,208, including £148 for a system of heating by radiators and hot-water pipes, of which the old school-room also has the benefit. There are, of course, other expenses of furnishing, &c., but the treasurer of the building fund announced that the whole amount had been raised except for £20. Donations from 125 friends, near and distant, amounted to £1,160, the recent bazaar produced £240, and the Sunday-school raised £50. The new rooms will be a great gain to the Sunday-school, and furnish an enlarged opportunity not only for its work, but for all the social activities which centre in the church.

Before the actual opening of the new buildings a meeting was held in the old school-room. Mr. Grosvenor Talbot, president of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, was in the chair, supported by Miss Preston, Mr. Stanton W. Preston, Mr. J. Classon Preston, Dr. Drummond, Dr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C., the Revs. W. Copeland Bowie, C. Roper, and E. Savell Hicks, Messrs. H. Chatfield Clarke (architect), C. P. Roberts (builder), A. Wilson, F. Creak, and Ronald Bartram. There were altogether between fifteen and twenty members of the Preston family present, including Mr. and Mrs. Percy Preston, Mrs. Classon Preston, Mrs. Frank Preston, Mrs. Sydney Preston, and Mrs. Bartram.

The CHAIRMAN, expressing his pleasure at being there that evening, recalled his early memories of Carter-lane Chapel, the predecessor of Unity Church, when as a boy at University College School he used to walk across from Gower-street on Sundays, down Holborn-hill (for there was no viaduct then), past Newgate, to Carter-lane. He remembered Dr. Hutton preaching in the old chapel, and in those days also there was no name in the congregation more honoured than that of Preston. Carter-lane Chapel had now disappeared among the great warehouses about St. Paul's Churchyard, and the congregation had moved on to Unity Church; and in the same way their Unitarianism had gone forward. The old principles were as true and strong as ever, but their religious life, as Unitarians, had made progress, following the truth. With the old enthusiasm and reverence he believed they held now a better and higher faith: Their orthodox brethren had also gone forward, but they were still trying to make their new thought fit into the old creeds and dogmas. The way of complete freedom was better, and they had to maintain the essential need of truth, building on that foundation both in life and in religion. As to the "New Theology," it had better keep to its own denomination. They were not anxious for these men to come over to them. The "New Theology" and "Unitarianism" might work on side by side. In conclusion, he congratulated Miss Preston and her family on what they had done for Unity Church, and on those memorial buildings. They were the fruit of effort on the part of the congregation, effort not for self, but for others, which was the secret of true life; and he hoped those buildings would be the centre of much good work for the uplifting of the people round about.

Mr. RONALD BARTRAM, having read letters of regret, for absence from Sir E. Durning-Lawrence and the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, and announced further letters of regret from Mr. C. F. Pearson and other friends, read a statement as to the new buildings, in which the congregation warmly acknowledged how much they had owed in that matter to the enthusiasm of their minister, the Rev. E. Savell Hicks. Mr. F. Creak, treasurer of the building fund, also read a statement, giving particulars as above noted.

Dr. DRUMMOND said that he had come there that evening not expecting to speak, but simply to show his sympathy and honour for the memory of the man whom those new buildings were to commemorate. He was glad of the opportunity to bear testimony to the admirable and consistent character of the man whose whole life's interest was centred in the congregation at Carter-lane first and then there. Mr. Preston was a firm and consistent Unitarian, ready to devote what powers and means he had to the furtherance of the cause of Unitarianism, and his whole interest was given to the welfare of that congregation. It was right that such a man should be remembered. His religion was deep, earnest, and sincere. He had the reserve rather characteristic of Unitarians. Perhaps they carried it sometimes too far; but, of the two extremes, reserve and great freedom of expression, reserve was the less objectionable. Surface emotions were easily exhibited, but the deep emotions that never changed, true and faithful through all the life did not easily express themselves. His was the most powerful eloquence, that of a true, honourable, manly life. He was a man of business, and a man of business could preach sermons, not from the lips, but from the honourable nature of his dealings, the high tone of his commercial morality. No man of such character could mingle in the world's affairs without making his quiet influence unconsciously felt. Their dear friend preached many a sermon of which he was quite unconscious, impressing on others the value of what was high and good, making them ashamed, at least in his presence, of anything mean or dishonourable. It was right to remember such men. Their saints were not known by asceticism, special forms, or withdrawal from the world, but by mingling with it, while keeping from its evil. He rejoiced to think that among Unitarians there had been numbers of such, and that a high and noble ideal of life pervaded their ranks more than among some others, while their people were on the whole truer to their ideal and more absolutely sincere in what they professed. He prayed that they might long cherish that spirit there, and that the high example of faithfulness, sincerity and simple courage might remain to hold on high the banner of righteousness in that neighbourhood; and that in due time the sincerity of their faith might be more clearly recognised, and they might receive a larger share of the world's charitable judgment than ever fell to their friend. He was glad, he said in conclusion, to bear his humble testimony to the worth of a man of pure, refined, and noble character.

The Rev. E. SAVELL HICKS, who followed, expressed his gratitude for Dr. Drummond's presence. Mr. Preston stood for all that was best and noblest in their Unitarian belief and life. He made his religion his business, and his business his religion. No better name could be associated with that building, and their hope was to make their work in it worthy of the ideal set before them. He expressed his delight also at Miss Preston's presence, and that she was able to be there to open the new building.

Mr. CLÄSSON PRESTON then gave an interesting account of the old Carter-lane chapel, the walls of which were still there, though engulfed in a great block of warehouses. He mentioned the names of Nettlefold, Warren, Chamberlain, as well as Preston, as closely connected with the congregation in those early days, and he told of the succession of their ministers, and, as Mr. Preston's eldest son, expressed his gratitude at the presence of so many friends on that occasion.

The Rev. W. COPELAND BOWIE proposed, and Mr. ALFRED WILSON seconded a vote of thanks to Mr. Talbot and to Miss Preston for the service she was about to render. This was carried by acclamation, and Miss PRESTON then spoke a few words, with deep feeling, of what that occasion meant to her, and what they hoped from the new buildings, both for the Sunday-school and the various agencies connected with the church. They must all heartily thank Mr. Hicks, she said, for all that he had done to obtain that building, and concluded with an expression of very earnest hope for the future of their work.

Mr. Hicks then led Miss Preston down the room, to the door into the new buildings, which she unlocked, and showed the way into the large class-room. The buildings were afterwards inspected by the company, and general satisfaction was warmly expressed.

THE MOOD OF IMMANENCE:

In fastening upon the idea of the Divine Immanence, and making that the fountain conception of all his other teachings, Mr. R. J. Campbell has drawn to himself the sympathy of many minds. If we wish to overcome and put behind us whatever is erroneous and imperfect in his view, we must first be able to appreciate the attractive truth and value which it embodies.

There is a well-marked attitude of thought on the deepest matters of religion, which we may call the mood of Immanence. It is not confined to any period of history, but it has always exercised special attraction whenever men have been strongly under the impulse to unify their conceptions of the universe and rise by a bold flight to a comprehensive vision of the All. It is the characteristic attitude of all mystics, for they are impatient of all conflict, of all that belongs to the detailed and the particular, and they wish to see all things only as subordinate elements or moments in the life of God. The whole revelation of God to their souls must have the stamp of immediacy; the mediated faith, the transmitted fellowship, the experience that is construed and constructed out of the jostle and play of our human relationships—all this is nothing. For these "God-intoxicated" men the world practically does not count; neither does man as such, nor self, except as an evanescent phase in the "life of the whole." The total process is everything, the details have no reality of their own; and the total process is as nearly as may be tantamount to God. We can bring this out more strongly by contrasting it with the opposite point of view—that of "transcendence." Transcendence takes the world as a hard and fast, static reality, which is objective to the Transcendent God. Immanence, on the other hand, takes the world as a developing, growing, living reality, which only comes into view as the mode or medium by which God is known to us. When men are strongly impressed by the idea of immanence, all facts and events and things and persons lose their contours in a golden haze of divinity; whereas "transcendence" insists on things being regarded strictly as what they are, and without such enthusiastic heightening. A parallel case, which will help us to understand "immanence," is the Rousseauite and Wordsworthian notion of "Nature"—the exalted and rarified Nature which stood for Shelley as the very soul of the All, and which had the same kind of attraction for poetic young men in the revolutionary era that "Immanence" has for Mr. Campbell and others to-day. In Meredith, again, the same idea is represented by "Earth."

It is not difficult, when the matter is stated in this way, to see that, in a healthy condition of mind, the mood of immanence easily and quickly supplies its own antidote. For it is not, and cannot be, on terms with our normal and permanent experience of actual life. It results in setting up the most terrible distinction between secular and religious life (although it began by promising and professing to do just the opposite—to merge them). All attempts to reduce the world either to "Nature," on the one hand, or to God, on the other, are sure to be revenged in this very manner. For if we are bent on this particular way of "seeing all things in God, and God in all things," nothing will serve but we must say that there is but one Reality—God—and that all else is but show and illusion. But, as soon as we have arrived at this desolating result, we discover that what we have really asserted is just the opposite of Immanence. The One Reality absolutely transcends all its mere appearances. We have passed from bald immanence to bald transcendence.

There is, in fact, no way of escaping transcendence. It cannot be merged into, or reduced to, or explained as immanence. The thought of immanence is indeed a noble and valuable thought. But it is utterly one-sided and cannot stand by itself. It holds good only while we deliberately keep our minds fixed in one tone of experience. As soon as we insist on the reality of self, or events, or the world, as soon as we admit conflict, immanence ceases to be our dominant feeling, and is seen to be a kind of Buddhist Nirvana. Admit the real substantial reality of men, and things, and sin, i.e., admit that God is transcendent, and then you have to think of God as over-ruling as well as unifying. He not only permeates the world, but also redeems and regenerates it. Now it is just these latter ideas that are most foreign to a theory of mere immanence. An Immanent who should strive to redeem the All of which He is actually the perfect sublimation, would be an absurdity.

It appears, therefore, that the foundation upon which Mr. Campbell builds his entire theory (including his views of the Person of Christ, prayers to Jesus, and sin) is quite insufficient. Accordingly, we find that he can only get his results in an illegitimate manner. Thus, e.g., it seems to be thought by the "new" theologians, that the idea of Incarnation has some special connection with Immanence. Jesus is regarded as an Incarnation of God, and so is any other man, because God is immanent in all beings. But this is a confusion. He who says Incarnation says Transcendence. The Reality that incarnates Itself, now in this, now in that form, does so by coming forth out of its unrevealed, inaccessible, incognisable existence; by the very fact of Incarnation it proves how infinitely It transcends its Incarnations. And this shows that it is impossible to say that Jesus, or any other Incarnation, is God. How important this consideration is, we may see from a recent attempt of one of the "new" theologians to rebut the charge that the Immanence theology is only a kind of Pantheism. He does so by showing that Pantheism overlooks the fact that God is not only immanent in the world, but also transcends it, and he claims for the New Theology that it avoids this error. Now, we have only to apply the same argument to the "new" statements about Jesus, in order to reveal the hollowness of the assertion that He is God. To say that he is God is exactly parallel to the Pantheist's statement that the world is God. To say that God transcends the world upsets Pantheism; to say that God transcends Jesus disposes of the New Theology.

We cannot help admiring, while we dissent from, Mr. Campbell's heroic attempts to save the Christian atmosphere, and the feeling about Jesus, by means of his immanence theology. But it avails nothing to insist that God is revealed in Jesus, if He is revealed in the same sense in the All. For the revelation of Jesus has a different substance from the revelation of the All. You cannot lose yourself in the transport of the All, the mood of immanence, and at the same time drink in the spirit of the Cross. "Cosmic emotion" can never be identified with the specific experience we call Christian. "In him we live and move and have our being," is not the transport of the All, "the chant of the whole," but a definite view of God's moral relation to man and the world. Mr. Campbell vainly imagines that the antagonism of goodness and evil can be transformed into the antithesis of "life in the whole" versus "life for self." But Christianity insists on the self. It is Omar Khayyam, as Mr. Chesterton has well pointed out, and not Christianity, that blots out man in the interests of an overwhelming God.

Omar Khayyam, the passion of modern science for unification, various monistic philosophies—these are the trends and stresses of modern thought that have had an influence with those who emphasise Immanence. They have a legitimate influence, and our contention is that they find their justification and meet with their proper response in a view of Christianity to which Mr. Campbell sometimes approximates, but too often lets slip from his grasp. If we want to satisfy the mood of immanence, if we want to get away from the magnified non-natural man which Deism set up for God, if God is to be for us not a potentate holding quasi-regal relations with a world from which He is widely separated, but the very Life of the world, the interpretation of its struggles, the informing principle of its evolution, we can have what we seek in an organic view of the Christian revelation. On that view, the whole work of redemption, in other words, the whole process of evolution from lower to higher humanity, is wrought by man, in the normal pursuit of his own human ends. Man's free will, man's struggle against sin, man's love and suffering for his weaker brother—these are the cardinal facts of the great human manifestation that we call the Christian revelation. The effort of it is man's, and the exceeding great joy of it is man's also. The failure and sin also are man's (for there is often disastrous failure), and so is the suffering from failure. And no amount of argument can rob man of the conviction that it is his own affair; that he is no mere puppet of cosmic power, and that he chooses his fate with open eyes. This is the truth of Transcendence—that God is not man, and man is not God. And yet it is equally true (and this is the truth of Immanence) that it is just through this human evolution that God manifests Himself. The more truly human it is the more truly does it achieve the Divine purpose. It is all done by man; yet in doing it man becomes one with God. And this is, as yet, an ideal, not an accomplished fact; an achievement hardly to be won, not a foregone conclusion. The incarnation of God in man is not yet as true of us as we pray that it may become. We are not yet as much one with God as Jesus was. Any theory of immanence that says we are ("Jesus is God and so are you") misses its aim:

W. WHITAKER

TOWARDS SOCIAL REFORM.

COLLECTIVE OWNERSHIP—ITS ETHICAL SIGNIFICANCE.

A FEW years ago one of the Bishops created a mild sensation by bluntly declaring his belief, the precise terms of which I forget, but which was to the effect that a Social system framed on the lines of the Sermon on the Mount would break down in a week. Many good people were rather shocked, but everybody of practical common sense admitted that it was true. Let us assume that the Bishop was right, and that it would be impossible to rule the British Empire, and conduct our social affairs absolutely on the lines of Christianity; must we therefore repudiate the principles and sentiments of Christ, and refuse to consider any practicable reform in our imperial and social system on Christian lines? I feel sure that Mr. Rawlins would emphatically reject any such conclusion. He would probably say that all government and all social systems are outcomes of the moral and mental conditions of the people concerned, and that a perfectly Christian social system can be attained only as the people gradually approximate to the Christian life.

Attempt suddenly to establish a universal system of Christian Government, and you will inevitably find your government beset by all sorts of difficulties and embarrassments arising out of the condition of the people, and it will certainly break down. That does not prove that Christian principles are all wrong, or that Christian sentiments are inapplicable to social life and public government. It only proves that the great mass of the people are as yet a long way off any real and effective acceptance of Christianity, and are unfit for such government. It does not show that we are wrong in trying to bring Christianity to bear on social problems whenever and wherever it is practicable, and it does not preclude the anticipation of the time when the splendid beneficence of the Christian ideal shall permeate every institution and animate every life. It may be a long way off, but when we pray "Thy Kingdom Come" all our failure and difficulties do not forbid or prevent the more hopeful and optimistic among us believing that even within their own limited range of observation that "Kingdom" has made substantial advance.

But Mr. Rawlins first assumes a sudden and universal subversion of our present social and commercial fabric, and then, without the least allowance for any change in the circumstances and motives and ideals of the whole body of the people, he conjures up all sorts of disasters and complications, and condemns the whole thing, principle and practice, arguing for individualism and free competition as though they involved no difficulties and were beset by no troubles and disadvantages. He doubts whether Collectivists have really thought out results so obvious to "deep thinkers," attributes to them the most asinine proposals, and implies that they are seeking to "convert us into a nation of slaves while assuming that we shall be a community of angels."

It is really amazing to observe how ready many good people are to assume that the most selfish motives are, and always must be, the mainsprings of all social life and activity. They themselves do good deeds and lead lives of exemplary self-sacrifice, and find ample reward in the delight of doing good and in the promotion of the altruism in which they fervently believe; but from what they sometimes say one might suppose they haven't the least faith in the possibility of kindling the same public spirit in other people. Here is Mr. Rawlins, a man of ideas and beneficent enthusiasm, who would, I have no doubt, freely spend himself in any cause likely to promote the general well-being and, if possible, quite apart from any pecuniary advantages to himself. Yet he cannot believe it possible that under any social system anybody would make an invention, however beneficial to their fellow-men if they personally got nothing out of it. Take away the incentive of personal gain, says Mr. Rawlins, and "human nature would say, 'What is the use of bothering about inventing when I shall get little or nothing by it?'" Seemingly, the possibility of a man of inventive ability exercising his faculty for the love of the thing, for the good of his fellow-men, and for the honour and delight of being a general benefactor never enters into his wildest imaginations.

But another curious thing is that a man so able and so desirous of promoting whatever is for the public good should sit down to write upon a subject of such momentous public importance without taking every care to be well informed upon it. Of course, collectivists do not propose to take away from inventors all the incentive of personal gain. On the contrary, they believe that they could make this incentive more certain and effective. They recognise in the inventive talent a faculty of the greatest possible value to society, and they would develop and encourage and assist it in every possible way. Under existing conditions they complain that more often than not the man whose inventive brain is a beehive of ideas only by sheer luck gets a chance of showing what he can do, and not infrequently ends a life of struggle and disappointment in poverty and obscurity. Where luck favours such a man, and he is able to bring his invention to market, capital snaps it up for its own benefit. The man of inventive genius gives all the time and study, makes all the experiments, takes all the anxiety and the cost of working out the idea, and the man with the money steps in and makes a fortune out of it, often giving the actual inventor barely enough to enable him to go on to his next idea. This is no matter of opinion. The history of inventions is full of facts showing—no doubt, with many exceptions—that this is the commonest course of things. Social reformers contend that such a "system" of rewards involves lamentable waste of most valuable talent and often the grossest injustice. From the moral point of view it is often scandalously wrong, and from the economic point it is not politic;

Every real inventor should have all the assistance the community can afford him, and should be sure of a reasonable reward for success. It would be easy to devise a system by which this could be done, and though it would not encourage men to take such gambling risks as inventors often do take, and would never inveigle a man to his ruin by lying hopes of fabulous fortune, it would do more for progress, and do it more wholesomely than the present savage scramble. The collectionist who should gravely contemplate any changes that would ignore inventive talent and fail to make due provision for its encouragement and reward would be a very shallow-pated noodle, and his Socialistic ideas would not be worth considering.

There is another point in this article of Mr. Rawlins which betrays a lack of information and observation very curious in a man so able. He does, indeed, dimly discern "that we are moving on to a more equitable state of things," but he seems to have no idea how far we have actually got, or what is the real secret of the social advances we have made. He does not perceive that practically every movement forward has been essentially a collectivist movement, and some of the most obvious of these he entirely misunderstands. He looks abroad to France and America, and finds that some rather cranky Socialist experiments out there have failed; but he actually seems to be unaware that the public roadway in front of his own house affords the most complete of all possible illustrations of a Socialist success. "The Post Office," he says, "the municipalisation of gas and water supply and trams are not Socialist undertakings any more than the streets are!" This is really extraordinary: The Post Office has been set up and is maintained by public capital, it is organised and worked by public servants, and the whole thing is run entirely for the public benefit. That is Socialism. Is it possible that Mr. Rawlins does not understand this? It is Socialism, and, what seems to be worse still in Mr. Rawlins's opinion, it is State Socialism; but, notwithstanding all the vaticinations of slavery and corruption, in which Mr. Rawlins indulges, if we are ignorant and short-sighted enough to be beguiled into other enterprises of a similar kind—it cannot be denied that upon the whole it works splendidly. And so do the tramways and water and gas supplies of our municipalities, though neither the officials nor the rank and file of these organisations are angels, but only very human men. These services, Mr. Rawlins will perhaps be surprised to learn, are also Socialistic or Collectivist, and they have not thus far resulted in slavery or ruin to anybody. Every Londoner ought by this time to know that the municipal tramway employees have had their week reduced to six days instead of generally seven, and their working day to ten hours instead of thirteen or fourteen. This has necessitated the employment of 800 more men at comfortable wages, while the service has been greatly improved, fares reduced, and a considerable profit carried to the relief of the rates. It has everywhere been pretty much the same with the gas and water supply; and as to the roads—it is really very funny to hear it gravely asserted that the modern postal, tram, gas and water service "are no more Socialistic than the roads are!" How could they possibly be? There was, I suppose, a time when every Britain made his own path to the door of his own wigwam, and one of the earliest of all Socialistic movements was no doubt taken when some long-headed radical reformer in woad and sheepskin suggested that it would be a good idea to make right through the hamlet a common road in which each man's pathway might terminate. This would, of course, be done at the common expense of labour and for the common good: That would have been the germinal ideal of all travelling developments—purely Socialistic—and from that time to this that germinal idea has propagated until the whole kingdom has been covered by a network of magnificent roads all created and maintained, and in the towns drained, swept, watered, paved, lighted, and patrolled by police—all at the public expense, all done by public servants, and all simply and solely for the common good. And yet Mr. Rawlins is unaware that our roads are Socialistic.

The fact is that he has conjured up a fearsome bogey that is to come upon us with chains and every attribute of tyranny and oppression, extravagance and corruption, and, when the bogey appears, bringing nothing but social order and harmony, comfort, efficiency, and economy, Mr. Rawlins quite fails to recognise the creation of his own brain. "This thing Socialism! Of course it cannot be. Postal service, trams, gas, water, roads—why such things come quite naturally in the inevitable and beneficent unfolding of society." Of course they do. They are part and parcel of social solidarity and human brotherhood, and are absolutely in harmony with the Christian ideal of mutual helpfulness and beneficent co-operation, as opposed to mere selfish greed and scramble. Mr. Rawlins is evidently himself a little perplexed, and has something rather feeble to say about the width of roads and quality of gas by way of explaining what is and what is not Socialism. But it really won't do. It is ridiculous to grant that water may be supplied by public capital and organisation, and at the same time to pretend to believe that we should be going the way of slavery and ruin if we were to attempt to do the same thing by milk. Everybody knows that the milk we get is often filthy and adulterated, and dearer than it need be, and that the unsatisfactory conditions of supply constitute one main cause of the excessive mortality of infant life. But if to-morrow it was proposed in Parliament to take over and thoroughly reorganise the milk supply of London either by the Government or through the municipal councils, the proposals would be bitterly opposed by some of the best and most beneficent people living. It is really high time that our Christian teachers showed a better lead.

Brixton, February.

THE RELIGION OF AMERICA:

BY DR. EDWARD EVERETT HALE, UNDER THE HEADING "GOOD NEWS" IN THE "CHRISTIAN REGISTER."

SUPPOSE a new town on the frontier: The wounds are not yet time-worn which the axes left when they made their first marks upon the trees:

If any "Minister of good tidings" arrives there, if he is worth his salt, he is not there an hour before he sees the leaders of the town, and arranges that he will "hold a meeting" there, perhaps, the same night, certainly in a day or two:

What is more, half the people come to his meeting. He holds his meeting. He proclaims his glad tidings, if he has any. He stays or he goes away as it may be ordered. And these people have avowed their interest, whatever it is, in God and heaven and duty.

More than half of these people who come to his meetings have never been connected with any organised ecclesiastical corporation: But all of them have more or less faith, and that faith has brought them to this elder's meeting:

In the average newspaper, particularly on Saturday, there is a column more or less, devoted to "religious intelligence." Every word of this intelligence is devoted to the Roman Catholic Church, or to the Episcopal Church, to the Presbyterian Church or to the United Presbyterian Church, or to the Reformed Presbyterian Church, or to the Second Secession from the Original Covenanters, or to some other of the various organisations. No word in the "religious intelligence" is ever given by any accident to that part of the people of America who, while they believe in God and heaven and duty, have never connected themselves with any of the denominations. (For some reason not known to me there is virtue in throwing the emphasis on the first two letters of this word.)

Now, in a city like Boston, there will arrive next Saturday, for the first time, twice as many people as will enter that frontier town in the next five years: Has the reader ever happened to ask himself just what provision is made for the unformed, unwritten aspirations, hopes, and fears of such people? Just what welcome will they have on their first Sunday in Boston?

In the last sermon which I preached in Boston, and in the first sermon which I preached in Washington this fall, I stated my theory of what every large city ought to do for these people. I am going to print this passage now, in the hope that it may reach the eye of some thoughtful and religious person in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Buffalo, Chicago, St. Louis, and San Francisco.

The American System.

The first, and so far the most imposing exposition of what I like to call the American System—the system of the Free Church of America—was a step forward and upward made by Harvard College five-and-twenty years ago. The college then divided the duties which are specially devotional, or what people call religious, between ministers of five religious communions: It was no fault of the college that the Roman Catholic Church would not condescend to be a sixth. The object-lesson thus given has since been accepted by the largest universities—by Yale University, by Cornell University, and the University of Chicago.

In this magnificent object-lesson the oldest college in the country showed what is meant by its motto "for Christ and the Church." It was no accident that her original motto was "Veritas" the truth. Every boy or man, every girl or woman under her training knows now, or may know that religion is the relationship of God with man, of man with God, of the Father with the child, or the child with the Father. Religion is not a matter of syllogism or of recollection of articles, of Orders in Council or of the multiplication table. Religion has to deal with the Eternities, with faith and hope, and, above all, with love. On these lines the Christian religion, which is absolute religion, will assert itself. The men of faith, of hope, and of love are in this matter in advance of the men of mere intellect, the men of historical creed, of statutes. Liberty is in advance of slavery:

I look to see very soon such agreement between the real leaders of religious life in America that every large city will maintain one religious centre, where not one preacher only, or ten, shall teach or persuade, but where in turn, as at your Lowell Institute or at the Brooklyn Institute, twenty, thirty, forty religious men from all parts of the nation may tell what they know and what they have seen. They shall tell men how to live. And the beggar from the street shall be free to hear all that this central church of the people can offer, its music, its appeals, its instruction. In every large city the Christian men and women, wholly outside of their separate churches, might add to their ministrations one such central metropolitan church. So the Christian men of Boston might gain possession of the Old South Meeting-house, where the people of Boston used to assemble with lesser duties, where the committee in charge should secure the service of men most devout, most eloquent, most convincing: As the Lowell Institute listens to Agassiz, to Walker, to Lyman Abbott, to Percival Lowell, this metropolitan central church, open to all sorts and conditions of worshippers, will meet to join in worship with the religious men of every school, from the Roman Catholic at one end to General Booth at the other, so only those men tell us what they know is true.

I look forward with absolute confidence on such restoration of the simplicity in worship in all the larger cities, especially in Chicago, where Dr. Swing made his adventure, in New York, and in Washington. As a university has its Latin professor to teach Latin, its electrical professor to tell of electricity, as it permits its German professor to say that German is the best language conceivable, and its Greek professor to say that Greek is the best; but as the university, first, second, and last, proclaims the Truth, so will the Church of Christ, in his own words and with his own authority, proclaim the kingdom of God and the righteousness of God. When men do seek these first, the things will be added unto them:

To be all One
When on the earth the will of Heaven is done;
As in their courses stars and planets run,
As sun with earth, and earth with sun,
Ruled by one loving God

United into One:
So all men with our Father live as one,
Loving and living in the perfect day,
Love with his love

And walking in his way,

Perfected into One.

EDWARD E. HALE.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

MANCHESTER DISTRICT.

THE storm around the "New Theology" is heard only very faintly here in Manchester. The ministers of our own churches have done their best to explain the significance of the movement, and a few of our "orthodox" brethren have also entered the fray. But there is no present hope of any wide expression of opinion or general movement here in Manchester. We are severely handicapped in these matters by the attitude of the Manchester Guardian. This paper, excellent in so many other respects, has a morbid fear of theological controversy. It cannot trust its readers in these highly charged fields of human interest. Consequently, it ruthlessly represses all letters bearing on theological questions, and, while we get columns of letters every day on the education controversy, there is nothing in this department about the "New Theology." In the "news" columns of the Manchester Guardian we are allowed to catch a few feeble echoes of the storm. There was apparently a lively meeting at the Central Hall last Sunday, when a valiant defender of the faith closed his critic by the suggestion that he was drunk. In this, at least, he was quite primitive in his methods, but the precedent in Acts ii. 13 was hardly one a Christian apologist should follow. Another report gives us a few sentences from the sermon of the Rev. J. E. Roberts, the successor of Dr. McLaren. Mr. Roberts was speaking on "the Virgin Birth." His conclusion was that the story was not generally known to the first Christians and Apostles, and therefore it could not be essential to the Christian faith. I wonder how far Mr. Roberts will follow this principle? Were not the Apostles, for instance, able to live as Christians without any knowledge of the doctrine of the Trinity? Meanwhile the Lancashire Congregational Union has confirmed its invitation to Mr. Campbell to preach the official sermon in March next, in spite of the protests of the more timid brethren.

The searchings of heart aroused over the "New Theology" will hardly incline our friends of the Evangelical Council perhaps to listen sympathetically to our appeal on the Cemeteries question. The matter has been raised in the City Council, we have held our Protest Meeting, letters have appeared in the papers; but our opponents make no sign. They are following a policy of studious silence. Whether it will be effective remains to be seen. At least it seems an admission that they have no case. The case has, however, attracted widespread attention. Letters have appeared in the London Press, and the matter has served to point the argument of a former Prime Minister. It is impossible that the matter can rest where it is, and steps will be taken to again bring it before the City Council.

Joint missionary meetings and pulpit exchanges are now being carried out all over the Manchester district. The plan followed is to group the churches in fours and to hold a Saturday evening tea and public meeting; special Sunday services and a Monday evening lecture at the different churches in turn. I have been to several of these gatherings, and, with a few exceptions, the attendance has been disappointing. Still, they have formed pleasant re-unions of our friends, and they have enabled us to get to know each other better.

It has been decided to postpone our united bazaar until Easter week in 1908, when it is hoped the Lower Mosley-street friends will be able to give us the use of their fine premises for it. Work is already well in progress in many of the congregations; still, in view of their local claims, the slight postponement will be very welcome. Meanwhile, the appeal for the Association Fund is to be immediately proceeded with. It is hoped it will meet with a generous response. There is much good work going on in our aided churches which the failure of the appeal would bring to an untimely end. That, however, is a catastrophe we dare not contemplate, and I hope soon to be able to report a substantial beginning for the fund.

The annual meeting of the Unitarian Home Missionary College was a very pleasant gathering. Not only was there rejoicing over the University distinctions obtained, but the fact that there are now more students under instruction than for many years past was also noted with pleasure. It was further allowed to leak out that a large number of exceptionally good candidates are interviewing the Committee next week with a view to admission in the coming session. The finances of the College still need strengthening, and it is earnestly hoped that the present year may see the completion of the Jubilee Fund, when the income will nearly overtake the expenditure.

During the past two or three weeks I have enjoyed exceptional opportunities of getting to see the actual state of some of our local congregations. If I may be pardoned the seeming intrusion of my own personality, I should like to record my experiences. I visited Willert-street first on a Sunday afternoon, in company with Councillor Pritchard. We found it a perfect hive, every room and corner being filled with teachers and scholars. In the chapel a fair audience of men gave an intelligent hearing to my address on "Some Social Problems." The Tuesday following I was there again addressing the guild. About fifty young men and women, bearing the signs of the strenuous life in mill and factory, were there, spending a quiet hour in simple devotional exercises and listening to my address on the "Moral Teaching of Shakespeare." At Longsight, on the Sunday evening, I found a good congregation largely made up of young men and women, and on the Monday evening at the same place I met quite a large crowd of children to whom I showed the pictures and told the story of our Holiday Home. Last Sunday evening I preached at Gorton, and I found our beautiful Chapel there well filled in every part. On the evening following I was in the equally beautiful schoolroom at Gorton. There also I found a good audience, who joined heartily in the discussion of my lecture on "Religion and the Labour Movement." In the afternoon of last Sunday I was at Lower Mosley-street, lecturing to the senior class on the Supernatural element in Shakespeare." There were nearly 100 adults in attendance, with a well known City Councillor in the chair. Finally, I visited Renshaw-street, to tell my well-worn tale of the Holiday Home, and to show the pictures of the lovely Derbyshire country in which it is situated. The story is an old one at Renshaw-street, its late minister, the Rev. S. Street, having been one of its founders; still I was delighted to find the large school crowded with children and adults. If there is any seeming egotism in this recital let it be discounted by its revelation of my neglect of my own congregation. But my object is just this: In all the places visited I found undoubted signs of vigorous life and energy. The same is equally true, I believe, of the remainder of our local Churches. We may not be making much noise in the world, but we are doing steady work which must tell on the life of Manchester.

CHARLES PEACH.

THE FABLE OF THE SUN WORSHIPPERS.

THERE was once a wild tribesman who went out into the forest every day to get wood for the fires of his tribe. It was his allotted work, as his brothers were stronger than he; for early in his youth he had slipped from a high tree and hurt himself very seriously, indeed, at the time it happened no one thought that he would ever get well again.

His name was Thekko, and because he was a silent person, they called him "The Thinker."

One summer, when the days and nights were warm and there were few fires needed in the camp, he thought that he would like to sleep out all alone in the woods; for he had never really been just by himself with the stars and trees at night time. When he told his brothers what he was going to do, they laughed at him and told him that it was quite enough to dream foolishness, without doing it.

"For," said they, "has not our tribe always slept near the wood fire, where the wolves come not for fear of the little red god who burns?"

However, Thekko went. He was not afraid of the wolves for he had made friends with them a long time before, and though they were ever so hungry, they would never have thought of hurting him any more than they would have attacked one of their own pack.

It must be said, all the same, that Thekko went to the turf bank he had chosen for a bed with some nervousness. The trees looked so very big, and the stars were so far away that he did not feel as though they were so much his friends as they used to be when he was not so alone with them. A long, long while he lay awake, until the fear which he had felt was lost in sleep, and he did not open his eyes again until after the sun had warmed the world for nearly two hours.

The next night he went out to the same place and soon went to sleep. When he awoke the sky had just the flush on it which means that the sun is coming soon, so he looked to the east, and there was a more wonderful light still which made him sit up expecting he knew not what, but something made him want to sing the most beautiful music he had ever imagined, and he felt like a lover who meets his lass on his wedding day. So he looked through the dark trunks of the pine trees to the brilliant yellow of the coming day, and he thought that the light which seemed caught up by the sun when he went to rest in the west was made purer during his nightly passage underneath the world, until it should be loosed again in the morning from the east. As he looked the red ball of the sun peeped over the distant hills and it was another real day again.

When he told his brothers how beautiful it was to see the dawn they laughed at him.

"It does not make us any better," said they, "to know that the sun looks over the world like that; we should be just as strong and want as much to eat if it only came up like a rabbit out of his burrow."

But Thekko thought otherwise.

Every morning he watched the new day coming, and every morning he thought how wonderful and splendid it was. But his brothers wouldn't come to look with him and the tribe smiled when he talked of it.

At last he could not keep this glory to himself any longer and he decided to paint it. No one had ever painted anything but their bodies and huts before, and he had often made strange shapes with his brush on the doors of his neighbours' houses, for they liked to have a picture better than bare wood to look at; but now he thought, "If I can only paint the dawn and show it to them they will believe and be glad."

So he tried. It was many mornings before he could make a picture which pleased him, but at last it came. No one could be more surprised at its coming than he, for he felt as though some great power were doing it for him, using his hands and his paints and, in part, his mind. As he painted he became very hot and excited, and in half an hour it was all done and a picture of the dawn such as he had dreamed of. He lay down flat on the ground and cried like a little child, he had never known what happiness could be until that moment.

Well, he went home and showed the picture to his brothers. They did not say much and Thekko was rather disappointed, but they kept on coming to take a look at the painting throughout the day.

When evening came two of the tribe said they would sleep with Thekko that night:

* * * * *

Many years afterwards a traveller in those parts came across a tribe of natives whose mark was a circle of gold, barred in red. They were friendly. He put his tent up in their camp. Before it was quite light he was surprised to hear a bell ring and to see all the tribe go out of their huts and sit silently looking towards the east. When the sun came, they bowed down to the earth for a few minutes. That was all, then the day's work began.

"For," said they, "Father Sun likes his children to work when he works and sleep when he sleeps, and we love the Sun."

And the traveller could not understand all that they meant, not even when they showed him a beautiful picture of tree trunks and yellow light as a dream of Heaven seen through the gates of Hell.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Colne.—The report for the year 1903 records many activities and steady progress. Twenty-nine new members were enrolled during the year. A beautiful christening font of Bolton Woods stone was placed in the church to the memory of Mr. James Hartley, who was church secretary and Sunday-school superintendent for over twenty-five years. The font was dedicated at a special service held on October 21, the second anniversary of Mr. Hartley's death. The thirtieth anniversary of the formation of the congregation was celebrated in December, when the Rev. Douglas Walmsley was the special preacher. (The regular services were commenced on October 15, 1876.) A series of "At Homes" was held on January 24, 25, and 26, and proved a great success, both socially and financially. Many friends from the other churches of the town were present on each occasion. The total income amounted to £83.

Crewkerne.—The scholars' annual entertainment at the Town Hall last week was most successful, upwards of 1,500 persons paying for admission, among whom were representatives from nearly all the churches in the town, including two clergymen of the Church of England, "Robin Hood" and "An Artist's Studio" were the plays given, and the acting of the scholars was splendid, the whole performance giving great delight. About £35 was realised.

Croydon.—A series of Sunday afternoon open conferences is being held at the Free Christian Church during February and March. The series opened on February 3 with "A Theosophist's Confession of Faith"; then, on February 10, came "Christianity and Socialism." To-morrow (Sunday) Mr. Maurice Adams is to be the opener, On February 24 the subject is, "Competition as a Moral Force."

Hinckley.—To reduce the heavy debt of more than £400 incurred last autumn by the installation of a new heating apparatus and considerable repairs to the chapel, the young ladies' sewing class organised a sale of work, which was held in the schoolroom on Saturday, Feb. 2. Concerts were given by the little girls in the lower class-rooms, and were well patronised. Although the sale was an unpromising one the effort realised about £17.

Hull (Welcome Meeting).—On Friday, February 8, Park-street Church was en fête to welcome its new minister, Rev. W. Whitaker, B.A., and Mrs. Whitaker. Councillor E. Hanger, J.P., presided over a large and enthusiastic gathering. After tea the proceedings commenced with the hymn "O God, our help in ages past," and prayer by the Rev. J. G. Patton (Congregational). Mr. S. Harris, on behalf of the congregation, and Mr. W. Bailey Holmes representing the Sunday-school, institute, library, social, and other societies, welcomed the new minister warmly and sincerely. Rev. J. G. Patton, Mr. W. Cass (Congregational), Mr. Henry Best (Swedish-borgian), all of Hull, each gave a cordial welcome to the town, and promised the right-hand of fellowship to Mr. Whitaker, their speeches being remarkable for the kindly, generous, and sympathetic tone displayed. Rev. W. Lindsay, who has occupied the pulpit for two months, welcomed on behalf of brother ministers. Letters were read from Revs. C. Hargrove, F. H. Vaughan (the late minister), T. Sykes (Primitive Methodist), Nicholas Knight (Congregational), regretting inability to attend, also a congratulatory telegram from Rev. E. W. Lummis. The Orpheus quartette party interspersed the proceedings with quartettes and songs. Mr. Whitaker replied, thanking warmly for the welcome accorded, and Mrs. Whitaker added a few graceful words of appreciation and thanks. The meeting closed with the "Doxology."

London: Forest Gate.—The Literary and Social Union began the latter half of the present session with a social evening on Jan. 16. One of the most interesting meetings of the society was held on Jan. 24, when Mr. A. A. Gomme gave a paper on "Women's Suffrage," and the presence in the chair of Mrs. Macdougall, one of the recent prisoners in connection with the movement, gave the subject a further interest. Mrs. Macdougall, at the close, dealt largely with the interesting discussion which followed the paper, and related some of her experiences as one who had lived and voted in the colonies. The Rev. H. W. Perris, speaking as one who had taken an active part for many years in the movement which still had his sympathy, could not help feeling that the way of those eager spirits who were trying to rush the question to an issue lay through troubled waters; and in this most of the audience appeared to think with him. At the close, a resolution in favour of political rights for women was carried unanimously.

London: Peckham.—On Tuesday, February 12, at a meeting of the Avondale Guild, Mr. Harry Quelch delivered a lecture on "Socialism" to an audience containing a large proportion of strangers. After an extremely lucid address the lecturer answered several questions put by Rev. Geo. Critchley and others, who expressed some misgivings as to the practical working of a Socialist system. A hearty vote of thanks was given to Mr. Quelch for his address.

Liverpool Postal Mission.—The annual meeting was held on Saturday afternoon, Feb. 9, in the Meeting room of the Ancient Chapel, when there was an attendance of about 80 people. Tea and conversation occupied the first half-hour, after which the chair was taken by the Rev. Charles Craddock. The report of the year's work shows continued increase in the number of those applying for literature, the new applications amounting to 223. Of previous inquirers there are still 489, making a total of 712, to whom 607 parcels were sent during the year. These contained 349 books, and 2,189 tracts; of the former, 39 were by correspondents. The balance-sheet shows a satisfactory decrease in the adverse balance of last year. Miss E. K. McConnell read some well-chosen extracts from letters, after which the Rev. Charles Hargrove gave an interesting address on the object and methods of Postal Mission work. A vote of thanks to hostess, chairman, and speaker, proposed by Mr. Harvey-Cook, and seconded by Mr. A. W. Hall, brought to a close a very pleasant and successful meeting.

Middlesbrough.—The sixth anniversary of the Guild was held on Thursday, February 7, 1907. After tea, at which about sixty were present, a public meeting was held in the church, and the Rev. W. R. Shanks, of Leeds, gave a most interesting address. The meeting was also addressed by the Rev. W. H. Lambelle, Messrs. W. Harrison, T. Falconer, H. Lowe, and F. Elliott.

Sheffield: Upper Chapel.—The annual meeting of the congregation was held on Wednesday, 6th inst., and successfully associated for the first time for several years with a soirée. Over 100 sat down to tea; after which an organ recital was given in the chapel. At the business meeting Mr. M. J. Hunter, chairman of trustees, presided. The annual report, presented by the hon. secretaries, Messrs. Edward Bramley and H. R. Bramley, showed that the past year had been one of steady progress in all the institutions, and it was gratifying to record a continued increase in the average attendance at the services. Reference was made to the opening of the Attercliffe School-church, free of debt, at a cost of over £1,850; the appointment of Mr. Arnold Bagshaw as organist, and the consequent improvement, with an enlarged choir, of the choral part of the services; the settlement of Mr. J. W. Cook as assistant minister; the successful inauguration of a scheme of associate membership, and the general appreciation of the new service-book, which had now had a year's trial. The statement of the treasurer (Mr. A. J. Hobson, J.P.) showed that, in his own words, "we have just about paid our way, but there is no room for extravagances." Mrs. Kirke, Mr. Richard Fisher, and Mr. W. G. Turner were added to the committee. A cordial vote of thanks to, and confidence in, the ministers was passed, to which the Rev. C. J. Street suitably responded. Thanks were also voted to the trustees, officers, and committee for their services; and a very enjoyable programme of music by the choir brought to a close what everyone felt was a record meeting.

Southend-on-Sea.—Last Sunday evening there was a larger congregation than has been seen for many months in the Darnley-road church, the preacher being Professor Bhair Parmanand, M.A., a missionary of the Arya Somaj, of India. The minister, Mr. Delta Evans, led the service, and read as a second lesson some appropriate verses from Max Müller's version of the "Upanishads." Professor Parmanand, whose subject was "The Great Religions of the World," gave an eloquent and impressive discourse, which he commenced with the proposition that the greatest religion in the world is Truth. He proceeded to show, by apt quotation from various scriptures, that the central thought in all the great religious systems is, "Do to others as you would have others do unto you." He pleaded for sincerity, for loving forbearance, for large charity, and for liberty of thought for all, and concluded by telling a striking Eastern story illustrating the pith of the sermon. This was the Professor's first public appearance in England, and it is believed, also, that it was the first time a minister of the Arya Somaj has ever preached in an English church.

Southport.—The report as to the Rev. F. B. Mott's intentions for the future, which we took from the Christian World last week, was a mistake, and we are sorry to have given further currency to it. He has no intention of giving up the regular ministry.

Walsley.—The first congregational tea and concert after the opening of the new school took place on Saturday, February 9. About 300 sat down to tea, which was followed by a concert of vocal and instrumental music and the domestic drama, "The Lancashire Weaver Lad." There was a very large attendance. The past year has been a very prosperous one for this congregation, and the number of young people full of enthusiasm for the good work prophesies well for the future.

The February number of the Mill Hill Pulpit is on "The Incarnation of God," the third of the Rev. C. Hargrove's course on "Thirty Years' Changes of Religious Thought."

Mind, which was formerly for so many years published by Messrs. Williams & Norgate, appears with the January number under new conditions, and will be for the future published by Messrs. Macmillan & Co. Professor G. F. Stout is still the Editor, and the price of this "Quarterly Review of Psychology and Philosophy" is 4s. a number.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

A LETTER from Mrs. Mottram as to the Martineau Memorial at Norwich, will be found in our present issue, and also a Provincial Letter from the Rev. Alfred Hall, minister of the Octagon Chapel, which contains a further reference to that subject: We are delighted to hear that Miss Gertrude Martineau has consented to lay the foundation-stone of the Memorial buildings, and that the ceremony is fixed for Saturday, April 20, to be followed by special Sunday services on the 21st, which is Dr. Martineau's birthday.

If omens might be trusted, the unopposed return of Mr. McKenna, the new Minister for Education, should promise well for his administration. No official statement has been made as to the intentions of the Government in his department, but rumours are rife and some action is as generally expected as it is certainly necessary. The notion is widespread that a period of rigour will set in, during which the lenient policy exercised hitherto in regard to defective "non-provided" schools will be given up. Whips of scorpions are spoken of. We cannot think that those responsible will succumb to the temptation to be other than reasonable; within such a limit there is plenty to be done. The latest rumours point to a short Bill to rectify some of the more glaring mistakes of the Act of 1902. Denominational managers, it is said, will have to refund the cost of sectarian teaching to the local education authority, who will be responsible for the full salary of teachers.

THE Rev. R. J. Campbell is irrepres- sible. He was supposed to be down in Cornwall for a holiday, though it was to be largely occupied in writing a book on the "New Theology." And on Tues- day, as he had engaged to address a series of meetings at Bodmin, he took the opportunity in the morning of reading passages from his new book, in the course of which he says:—"The New Theology is an untrammelled return to the Christian sources in the light of modern thought. The New Theology is not primarily theo- logical at all. Incidentally it is theologi- cal, but it is primarily a moral and spiritual movement which will send civil- isation back to God: Jesus never con- ceived of salvation as the fleeing from the City of Destruction. The Church has nothing to do with getting men into heaven. Her business is to get heaven into them: Many Unitarians are preach- ing the New Theology, but the New Theology is no surrender to Unitarianism. The New Theology is the Gospel of the Kingdom of God, and the churches exist for the realisation of this kingdom, and they exist for that alone."

THIS week's Christian World, giving an account of the Bodmin meetings, reports among the answers to questions, after this reading, one as to the place of Christ.

"Mr. Campbell said the Church thinks of Christ as the second person of the Trinity. The Eternal Son, co-equal with God, the other self, so to speak, of God. This, he said, he also believed, although it might be a surprise to some of his liberal-minded friends. But he did not believe in Jesus in any way that would separate Him from humanity as a whole."

Then, at an afternoon meeting, giving an account of the chief points of the "New Theology," he is thus reported in the Christian World on the "Divinity of Christ":—"Turning to the term Deity, he defined it as the all-controlling con- sciousness of the universe, the infinite reality from whence all things proceeded. Did Jesus possess this all-controlling con- sciousness? No, he did not, and if they meant that it was necessary to possess that in order to have God manifest in the flesh, then they had dethroned their God: But this is not necessary to Divinity: By Divinity we mean the inner- most quality of God. Jesus was the expression of that quality in God, which is love. The life of Jesus was the life of perfect love. That life is the life of the Father, and that life is love, and that is what I mean by divinity."

ON the other hand, Mr. Campbell de- clared, "If I think of God: I think in terms of Jesus, I pray constantly to Jesus. He is on the throne." Then someone asked him a rather idle question as to the difference between the New Theology and the Old Unit- arianism. It would be more to the point if people would ask as to the re- lation of his new thought to present-day Unitarianism, as it is represented by our own people, not by prejudiced critics. On Tuesday in Mr. Campbell's answer the notorious "gulf" appeared again, in which it should be remembered Trinit- arians as well as Unitarians are con- cerned. But perhaps in this matter it is better not to trust even to the best of re- porters, but to wait until Mr. Campbell's book appears. It might even be better if he himself would rest a little more com- pletely, and then let the book fully speak his mind.

A NEW case of exhibits of quite fascinat- ing interest has just been placed in the British Museum. Gazing into it we find ourselves back among the child-life of anything from fifteen to more than twenty centuries ago. Here are dolls, not of all sizes for they are small, some of them very small. There is, by way of compensa- tion, much skill in the finishing of a hair dressing or the expression of a face. One of them might be the very original for Cinderella's bad sister. They are terra- cotta dolls, bone dolls, and one at least a Roman rag doll from Egypt; stiff-necked dolls and flexible jointed ones. They do not lack their furniture, tables, chairs from the long perished dolls' houses of antiquity. Nor are these the only kinds of toys, for we find animals bearing panniers—"animals," we say advisedly, for the species is not always beyond a doubt. A boy with quite bewitching blue and red clothes is riding on a swan. Indeed, one feels that these children of long ago had their precious possessions.

BUT it is not all toys for mere children. There are knuckle bones and imitations of the same in bronze or crystal to witness to the perennial love of gaming and the cast of chance. Besides these, again, the dice of various sizes and colours. A graver interest is suggested by the tubes of colours and the palettes of the old-world artists. But we return in thought to the toys. There is an unexpected appropriateness in them as in the words of Stevenson's sentences. They jump out and surprise you. Instinctively we think of learned, serious, dignified things, when we think of Greece or Rome. These are simply the most trivial trifles of the day, and yet for all that they touch our senses with a crisp, cool feeling of the real life which was lived then as now among babies. There is something, too, to satisfy our sense of humour. So many notable works of art have perished, and linger only in some obscure fragment of a perished author. These things live. Such is the impartiality of the tutelary guardian of children's toys. And now these trifles of children are safe kept in a glass case under lock and key in the British Museum, gravely catalogued, and learnedly described. We turn away from them, and as we turn catch a half glimpse of the Spirit of Fun vanishing through the doorway with a British professor in one hand and a Greek baby in the other.

A SERMON by Dr. Crothers on "The Old Orthodoxy and the New" appears in this month's Seed Sower. Having spoken of characteristics of the old orthodoxy which have obscured the self-evidencing power of religion, he goes on:—"What I have said applies to that type of orthodox Christianity which rested avowedly on the belief that the revelation of God had been given exclusively in the past, and that to it nothing is to be added. But to-day this is giving way to what is called the 'new orthodoxy,' which is something altogether different, and which appeals not to the past, but to the present, or rather to those elements which are eternal. The new orthodoxy is not interested in documentary evidence, but appeals to the experience of living men. God is to it not a far-off power, who in the past interfered with the order of nature, but He manifests his power in nature and in the human soul continually. This faith finds its illustrations in science and its strongest confirmation in the lives which good men everywhere are living. It is so noble, so inspiring, that one hails it as the harbinger of a new day. And yet I confess that when I listen to the representatives of this type of religion, I am disappointed at the outcome of their thought. It seems to me that they stop short of a perfectly free and luminous religion. With great boldness of speech they appeal from tradition to reason, but they do not stop with perfect docility to listen to all that reason has to say. In their eagerness, they snatch the words out of her mouth and force them into harmony with their preconceived opinions. The old arbitrariness which has been the bane of theological reasoning reappears, though often in such charming form that we do not recognise it as the sheer dogmatism that it is."

In contrast to this attitude Dr. Crothers describes, in conclusion, the more consistent method in present-day religion, which allows no outgrown ideas to obscure the new faith:—"The change from a religion based on the idea of a special revelation to a religion based upon faith in a universal revelation, which comes slowly through the spiritual education of the race, is a great one. The transition is not yet fully accomplished, but we may see the direction in which the religious world is moving. It is something more than a new form of orthodoxy which is demanded. A free religion allows no standard of orthodoxy to hamper it in its untrammelled search for truth. Nothing short of perfect intellectual and spiritual liberty will satisfy. Not only must the mind be allowed to go freely to the facts of human experience, but it must treat these facts, not as an advocate, but as an impartial judge. But those who believe that man is essentially a religious being, and that God is in the world, not as an accident, but as the ever-present power moving all, will not fear the result. They find a hunger for righteousness, a love of perfection, an ideal of divine humanity. As light to the eye, so is goodness to the soul. There is a moral law that affirms itself. There is a spiritual life that justifies itself. By these elements the religion of freedom is being nourished. Recognising them, a great hope comes, and we speak with new courage as we turn from the glory that fades to the greater glory that dawns."

"BROWNING OUT WEST" is the title of a most interesting article in this month's Cornhill, in which Dr. Padelford, of the State University of Washington (in the extreme North-West of the States), describes the keen interest taken by his students in Browning's poems, and accounts for his general popularity in America. The first reason given is that Americans are intensely interested in men and women, and then that they have a passion for studying character. "Of all English poets, Browning is the one who most satisfies this craving for character unravelling." Browning's love of action also recommends him to Americans: "The life of action may not be the highest ideal; Browning's philosophy may be more pagan than Dante's, but it is the philosophy of Americans. : : : The ideal of the English University, broadly speaking, is culture; of the German University, scholarship; but of the American University, public service, the betterment of society. This may be called the working principle of our universities. In fact, as our economists have for some time recognised, it is becoming the new ideal of the American people as a people. The ambition of the younger generation is to be men who do things, rather than men who have things: They find their creed beautifully formulated in Browning."

FINALLY Dr. Padelford notes the recognition of spiritual conflict in Browning, a conflict in which there must be eventual triumph, as ground of his popularity with young Americans. "To many acquaintance with Browning means the revival of faith through the glad discovery that the spiritual life can be led without compromising the intellectual—indeed, can only be adequately lived when co-operating with the intellectual. I could tell of many students who, having come to confound religion with harsh categories, artificial standards, and hollow cant, have recovered their joy and their faith through learning from Browning that the spiritual life is not a thing of words, and not a thing apart, but the very essence of all living. Every thoughtful student must reconstruct the grounds of his faith, in fact, must be constantly re-adjusting, and to such students Browning proves of inestimable help."

In the same line of thought was the confession of a Rhodes' scholar to Dr. Padelford at Oxford recently (an old pupil of his) who took down a much-worn volume of Browning, and said: "To that man I owe everything. He taught me the dignity and the worth of life by demonstrating that nothing is trivial or meaningless; he revitalised my faith at a time when it was becoming dead, by showing me that spiritual progress is the very essence of living, and that for one who so wills it, there can be no defeat."

To a new edition of "The Dream and the Business," the last novel of the late "John Oliver Hobbes," Mr. Fisher Unwin is adding a letter addressed by Mr. Choate last September to the American publisher of that book, a very warm tribute to Mrs. Craigie's memory. Her career as an authoress began at nineteen, and she was only thirty-eight when she died. Towards the conclusion of his letter Mr. Choate writes as follows: "We can only conjecture how much more broadly she would have developed, how much greater work she would have produced, and how much higher her place in the world of letters would have grown to be, had her brief life been lengthened out. But in view of the growth and development of her intellectual scope, and the great advances she had already made, I cannot but think that a future awaited her more brilliant and secure than her past had been. It is not to be forgotten that if George Eliot had died at thirty-eight the world would hardly have heard of her as a novelist at all, for when she published her first great work, "Scenes from Clerical Life," she was already older than Mrs. Craigie was when she died, and it was in the next twenty years that she continued to create those masterpieces of fiction which have made her name immortal. It is sufficient to say of Mrs. Craigie that in her brief day and generation she contributed much by her charming intellectual productions to the entertainment and enjoyment of hosts of English and American readers, who deeply lament her early death, and in whose affections she will hold a permanent place, and that had she lived longer she would have achieved a still greater name and fame."

WE are very glad to see the announcement of a new book by the Rev. J. L. Haigh, of Liverpool, which is to be ready next month, or early in April. It is a story of Liverpool life entitled "Sir Galahad of the Slums," and is to be published by the Liverpool Booksellers' Company. Price 6s.

WE can only know what is akin to ourselves, but there is that in us which is akin to God Himself.—W. R. Inge.

TOWARDS SOCIAL REFORM.

COLLECTIVE OWNERSHIP:
ITS ETHICAL SIGNIFICANCE.

SIR,—If I may be allowed a word or two in reply to Mr. Millin, I should like to point out some errors into which he has fallen. With his first two paragraphs I quite agree, but his third one shows a complete misreading of my article in your issue of 9th inst. I nowhere assumed "a sudden and universal subversion of our present social and commercial fabric." It is true that many Socialists believe that Socialism can only be established by a violent revolution, and therefore more or less suddenly; but it was no part of my object to touch upon that question. There is much truth in the sarcasm that there are as many Socialisms as Socialists, and it is quite clear that Mr. Millin does not belong to the majority. I took for my text the Socialism of Marx and Lassalle, which embraces Collectivism, and is the only kind of Socialism at all formidable. It is known as "Democratic Socialism," and Marx's book, "Capital," is its "Koran." It is true that Marx was an avowed Communist, but Collectivism is only a mitigated Communism to the extent that it promises to permit of private property in those things destined only for consumption: Does Mr. Millin contend that an invention comes under that head? I simply took this Socialism as it is presented to us by its advocates, and pointed out what abler pens than mine have declared, that it would convert us into a nation of slaves while it assumed we should be a community of angels. If, as Mr. Millin seems to imply, we are to wait till we are angels before adopting Socialism, we shall not only have to wait a long time, but there will then be no excuse for urging it.

Mr. Millin accuses me of not taking care to be well informed upon a subject of such importance before writing about it; and he glibly asserts that "of course, Collectivists do not propose to take away all the incentive of personal gain. On the contrary, they believe they could make this incentive more certain and effective; and they would develop and encourage and assist it in every possible way." Mr. Millin, like all Socialists, is prolific in promises, but silent in explanation of ways and means; but he is at variance with all the exponents that I have read on Democratic Socialism, and he contradicts Mr. Edwards, whose article you published on 26th ult. Mr. Edwards says: "The ethical basis of Collectivism regards the personal gain of the individual as an incidental and secondary good: It aims only indirectly at the benefit of the individual." He is to be benefited only as society, for which he exists, is benefited. Social Democrats scoff at the notion of a mere atom of society working for personal gain. He will have to work solely for the good of society, and will be rewarded in the same proportion, and no more, as every other atom. Marx lays down the law that the sole measure of value is the amount of manual labour expended upon production. Manual labour he could measure, but the value of headwork by its duration was beyond him, and he therefore chose not to see that it had any. Hence, the Collectivism of Democratic Socialism means the national ownership of all means of production and distribution; to each individual, equal and by turns, all kinds of productive labour; all products to be the property of the whole community, "seeing that it has, as a whole, made their production possible," and "outside that portion of the entire result of production which society requires for its collective needs, distribution by the community according to the reasonable needs of each individual."

But, I take it, the object of these articles was not to discuss Socialism, but to examine the road along which we are travelling "towards social reform," and see whither it was leading us; and my reference to Socialism was only made with the object of showing that it was not leading in that direction: Mr. Millin, however, having doubted my knowledge of the subject, I have taken the liberty of referring him to the leading lights of Democratic Socialism. Let me now follow him into his criticism of my opinion as to the way we are going. He again ventures to accuse me of "lack of information"; contradicts my statement that municipal undertakings, as we have them, are not Socialistic (in the sense of Democratic Socialism); and boldly asserts that the roadway in front of me "affords the most complete of all possible illustrations of a Socialistic success," quite ignoring the fact that that roadway was made by private enterprise and capital, and was only taken over by the municipal authority at the request of those who made it at their individual cost. Mr. Millin not only confuses Social Reform with Socialism, but also Collective Management with Collectivism: I will again refer him to headquarters for information: When Dr. Shäffle published his book on the "Quintessence of Socialism" he was hailed by Socialists with a pæan of praise as a man who thoroughly understood and could clearly explain what Socialism really was: He says: "One cannot be too careful to avoid calling any and every development of the public management of industrial or social functions Socialism; in other words, confusing Social Democracy with systems of public management." And again, "The development of collective management with the object of best realising certain definite common ends under a sufficiently stable and authoritative guidance is not Social Democracy." I also refer Mr. Millin to the "Manifesto of the Joint Committee of Socialist Bodies," which says: "Municipalisation can only be accepted as Socialism on the condition of its forming a part of national, and at last of international, Socialism." I will only add that to accuse one's opponent of ignorance is not argument, is not legitimate debate, and it is frequently dangerous to the accuser:

W. C. RAWLINS.

WHAT Mr. Millin says about public roads seems to me very much to the point, but it is an example not of Socialism, but of Communism. That is to say, the State confers the right to use the highways on everyone, without payment or conditions. The other great example of Communism in this country is the right of the destitute to claim Poor Law relief, irrespective of merit or other conditions. These are big facts, with far-reaching consequences, and they show that it is now some centuries too late to object even to Communism: The only practical question is how far we shall carry it. Surely it is equally obvious that the only practical question is how far we are to carry State and Municipal Socialism, and Mr. Millin puts a most pertinent question when he asks, "Why not to milk as well as to water?"

Another aspect of the subject on which a few more words may be said relates to service, its joy and contentment as well as stimulus under satisfactory conditions, and the question what is required to make its conditions satisfactory. I have known a good many instances of young men freeing themselves from the service of an employer, and setting up for themselves in business: In nearly every case they have done well, and prospered after they took their part in the competitive struggle. I have no reason and no wish to disparage such a mode of life. But I have also a vivid recollection of words spoken to me more than thirty years ago by a man who seemed a prosperous shopkeeper, but who said that the worries of his situation were so great that he would gladly exchange it for a fixed salary of 20s. a week and clearly defined duties. It is obvious that the tendency of industrial progress is to narrow the opportunities for finding openings for carrying on a successful independent business, and to increase the demand for those who work for salaries. The only point at issue seems to be whether the employer, paying the salary, shall be a private company, ultimately a monopoly trust, run for private profit, or a Socialistic body, such as the State and the Municipality, working for the public good. Does Mr. Simon really prefer the former to the latter alternative? We have two magnificent examples of the worth of service under the State in our Army and Navy. Is it too much to hope that its best characteristics may be transferred from war to peace, from destruction to industry? We may not have achieved everything that is desired in our Civil Service, but has not enough been done to show the way to further improvement? In the Indian Forest Service have we not the same high tone and the same strenuous activity, which accord with the best traditions of our soldiers and sailors? In England is not the inspection of factories and schools carried on under conditions of which we have a right to be proud? May not the same be said, with rare exceptions, of the collection of our Customs and Inland Revenue? Coming to Municipalities, are they not served well by their Town Clerks; and for an example of the service of the rank and file, need we go farther than regard the enormous improvement in the conditions of the tramway men since the London County Council took over the working of the tram lines?

It is natural that young men should wish to quit service and set up for themselves when their employer holds out little prospect of advance, or even of permanency of employment, or, again, if the conditions of their service are in any way harsh or tyrannical. But these things need not happen, and as a rule would not happen, in Socialistic service. Hardly any employment would be less like slavery. The work, the hours, and the remuneration would be reasonable, and the leisure would be absolutely free. Under such conditions it ought not to be impossible to keep up the high standard which service inspires.

For the thought of service is an inspiration, and should be one to all the followers of him who came not to be served but to serve, and declared that the greatest should be the servant of all. Service has been the inspiration of every branch of Christ's Church which has achieved the true success. Every ecclesiastical organisation which has succeeded has done so by utilising the devoted service of those who were willing and eager to serve. Cannot the State do something on the same lines for the common good? It is essential that the direction shall be wise. A South German Colonel said that during the war of 1866 against Prussia he never made a useful march, and that during the war of 1870 against France he never made a useless one. We should want the direction of our best-trained and wisest men and women, who had risen to rule after learning all that obedience could teach them, and then they might command the services of earnest and well-contented followers.

THE CHURCH CATHOLIC.

THE conception of a Catholic communion which shall know no schism, of a Church comprehension which shall be all-including, has laid its spell in turn on the two great divisions of Christendom: The Roman Catholic believes in his "Holy, Catholic, Apostolic Church" as the only Church founded by Christ himself; but he claims for its every decree an impossible infallibility. The Anglican Catholic prays, and so do we all, for the good estate of the Church Universal; but then he bars its doors with creed and article which make its entry inadmissible.

But the average Nonconformist, not unnaturally perhaps, ejected from his national Church, has indulged in no dreams of being taken back into its arms. The Act of Uniformity he regards as a blessing, not a calamity; he is a separatist, and not reluctantly; he believes in sects, and denominations, and party loyalty. And when he calls his churches "Free" he means free from state control, and free for each to go its own way. Hence, the number of sects in England alone is ever to the foreigner a source of surprise and derision.

Is this state of our church polity to be deemed eminently satisfactory? If unsatisfactory, is it inevitably and permanently necessary? Would the religious life of the nation, would the spiritual condition of each man be made weaker or more strong, if union took the place of division, and the many Churches became the one?

These questions may seem academic, for there is manifestly no immediate prospect of this union being brought about. But if there should be even a distant future for some one constructive idea, which shall place this desirable union on a possible foundation, surely it is a theme with a present claim on our attention. Then our replies will depend, of course, upon the basis of union which is suggested, and the terms of comprehension proposed.

There are signs on many sides that a longing for larger communion is spreading and deepening. The traditionalist is holding more loosely his dogmatic orthodoxy, whilst the rationalist is perceiving hidden truths in the doctrines he has despised. The old terms no longer carry the same meanings, the old divisions are becoming blurred in many directions, a new vocabulary is found necessary for the "New Theology." Some reconstruction, some reconciliation, is bound to come out of the present disintegration and confusion. Devout spirits join hands across the sects and amidst the sundered churches, realising that differences have been exaggerated and agreements ignored. Despite the recent religious controversy, there is a growing willingness to see that amid doctrinal diversity there may be spiritual unity. Doctrine has its place admittedly in the various schools of theology, and theology must continue to be above any need of apology; but is the Church a lecture room for the defence of doctrine, or is it a place of worship, a home of Religion? Religion in itself, in its life and experience, in its essential meaning, is always a bond of union; it is a catholic affection.

We therefore welcome with especial gladness, a book by J. M. Lloyd Thomas, entitled "A Free Catholic Church."* Although comprised within small compass, it raises one of the greatest of all issues; though but a plea, and an appeal, it touches an ultimate ideal. Its main thesis, perhaps, may be summed up in few words. Religion is the basis of the Church, but religion is an emotion, an attitude, a mood, too elusive to be captured, too profound to be defined. Even the term Christian has no one accepted meaning, and there is much in high-minded agnosticism, also in some so-called atheism, which religion cannot disdain. Therefore, the Church may not be limited or enclosed, but must be allowed the fullest latitude for its sympathy and brotherhood. This religious catholicity is the fulfilling of Christianity, for it is the recognition of the divine in all humanity, of the universal incarnation of God in men. It is evident, hence, at once that no Church which imposes dogmatic tests, whether ecclesiastical or theological, can be sufficiently wide or liberal to include this catholic ideal. The only church possible is one which surrenders the dogmatic principle, and surrenders it, not grudgingly, but wholly and unconditionally. Such churches do exist, it is admitted, but they are few indeed, and some of these, alas! have fallen into the usages which have arrested their progress and disguised their free basis. The Free Catholic Church will arise from the catholic spirits in all the churches, and in greater numbers outside all the churches, who will be drawn together more intimately by their common catholicity into a communion of devotion, of life, of religion. "This Church of the Spirit is indeed the apostolic and truly Catholic Church, the Church of Faith, Hope, Love, wherein the greatest of these is Love."

No one, we think, will object that this argument is not sufficiently frank or optimistic. Its frankness is a rebuke in advance to any hypercritical retort; its optimism puts new hope into an oft-debated project. It is certain that this little volume will awaken a responsive attention, and that the thoughts of many hearts will be revealed in its reading.

But from whom, and in what form, will objections come? It will be said that this open religious basis is too colourless, too nebulous, to constitute a church. Moreover, theology cannot be kept away, and doctrine is a sheer necessity. The volume anticipates this objection, and devotes a chapter to "The Importance of Doctrine." We unhesitatingly accept its contention that theology and religion, although not to be divorced, can be distinguished and can be assigned respective precedence according to their time and place. In the realm of speculation and definition, it is theology which holds first claim, but in the realm of worship and communion it is religion. Surely the longing for love and righteousness, the offering of prayer and praise, the spiritual affinities of all devout souls, the beatitudes of Jesus, the hymns from every church, together constitute, or create, a sufficient bond of fellowship. But we think there is a further argument. The acceptance of the open religious basis carries with it, so it seems to us, not only the absence of dogmatic limitations, but also the knowledge that truth must be left free to advance, and cannot be tied down to any stationary position. This conviction within the heart of devotion keeps the intellectual and the spiritual at one; it leaves room for individual flexible doctrine, but it does not dictate its essential form, neither does it make that doctrine the ground of Church communion. A general correspondence of thought will commingle with this common sympathy of heart, uniting to make as its natural result that true worship which is both in spirit and in truth.

It may be urged again, and even by those who fall in with the foregoing position, that since public worship to be common must adopt some specific order and form, the inevitable disparities of taste and inclination will render it a difficult, if not impracticable matter, for all "Free Catholics" to worship together. Between the simple silence of the Friends and the richness of a cathedral service there are various grades and shades of difference, and each counts for so much that its absence would mean loss. But should not these varieties have ample space for exercise, and be left to arrange themselves at the wish of the worshippers? So long as they are not compulsory but perfectly voluntary, they need not, and do not, contradict the principle of the Church Catholic. Our author, however, makes bold to maintain in a most suggestive chapter on "The Need of Symbolism" that ritual and symbol are indispensable, and nowhere more so than in a religious gathering which does not assume either doctrinal definition or dogmatic precision. We entirely agree with him that the heights and depths of religion transcend definition, and can only find expression in symbolic suggestion, and also that this symbolic expression offers a legitimate medium for common worship and devotion; but we could also point out that many of the most cherished symbols of music and art, of liturgy and ancient rite only make their full appeal aright to a duly cultivated spirit; The old Puritan suspicion of all beauty of form is still a very live tradition, and we fear that the adoption of mere symbolism will remain with some a stone of stumbling for a long time to come.

Again, it may be asked whether this broad Church fellowship would not tend to produce a rather loose type of membership. Would the fidelity and the loyalty which are so freely given to a definite denomination, be equally spontaneous, and not less vigorous, in a church in which all denominational bonds are relaxed? The answer seems obvious. For those in whom the catholic faith has found a home, the lower denominational zeal must rise to a loftier and holier ideal, to an impelling sense of brotherhood and undivided fellowship no longer bounded or sundered by doctrine or sect. It is the glow of that prophecy, the imagination of this realised communion, the historic sense of the unbroken church of the past which will create "The Higher Churchmanship" for which Mr. Thomas pleads in the closing chapter of his book.

We accept this book as the convincing statement of a position, not a plan. Yet it involves more than one quite definite conclusion which, though negatively stated, has its very positive side. A Free Catholic Church will only come in proportion as a deep Catholic yearning prays and works for its coming; this longing must find expression and spread its contagion before any concrete scheme can be offered for acceptance. The idealists must first convert the denominationalists. No Catholic Church can be expected, further, on any basis of common dogma, whether of an infallible hierarchy, or a credal uniformity. Neither can it be brought into being by any process of uniting on a common residuum of doctrine after all other variant tenets have been conveniently withdrawn. There is no hope for this dream of a patched-up reunion of Christendom. Neither compromise, nor strategies, neither an armed truce, nor an easy indifference, have any place, or give any assistance, in a truly Catholic Church. The unity of the spirit is something far more deep than an affable amiability toward each and every theology. It is reached only by descending into that inner region of thought, of emotion, wherein conflicting opinion finds a centre of union, by trusting in "the under truth that feeds the roots of every faith," by relying upon some principle of comprehension which embraces both disputant and doctrine in one wider reconciliation.

That principle of comprehension demands as its first condition that the basis of a congregation and the trust of its church building, shall be free and open. That is the issue which the "New Theology" is forcing into the light of day. Let the existing Free Trust Churches cherish and publish their precious heritage; let the Evangelical Free Churches become Free Trust buildings, and their ministers free from stipulations; let the broad churchmen come out, if any are left, and demand further modification of the terms of subscription; let the excommunicated Father Tyrell bring out with him a following from Rome, and a Free Catholic Church, in essence, if not in name, will start on its way toward realisation. And it will not be another sect, but the waiting refutation of all sectarianism: It is at least something to feel you are on the right line, and heeding the future's beckoning. We are grateful to Mr. Thomas for his eloquent little treatise, and most heartily commend it to every thoughtful spirit: F. K. F.

SOME THOUGHTS ON A MIDSUMMER CHRISTMAS AND AN AUTUMN EASTER:

It is Christmas Day beneath the Southern Cross, and, as I write, the day will be beginning to dawn in the Northern Hemisphere, on which the Birth of Christ is observed. The memory of former years, of the customs and gatherings then in the home and in the Sunday-school, brings to my mind a strong sense of difference, caused chiefly by change of place, and the consequent alteration of season. Here it is mid-summer, and for Australia a cool and calm evening of rare beauty, such as is seldom seen in less sunny lands; the children are playing in the parks; the elders are lounging about the gardens, or reclining on the verandahs, as the swift evening comes on. That is to say, those who are left behind are so occupied; but the great majority have fled into the country or to the sea, and are now beginning to crowd into the trains, in which there is a fine jumble of picnic baskets, laughing children, and somewhat boisterous young men and maidens returning from their Christmas pic-nic. In England your Sunday-schools will soon be crowded for the Christmas festivals, and most homes full of welcome guests who will enjoy their feast of good things in rooms made warm and comfortable by a bright blazing fire. With you, if it is a feast of the Church, it is still more a feast of the home; with us, also, it is a feast of the Church, nominally at least, but in reality a feast of Pan, whose special ritual is the pic-nic.

This difference in custom points to something else, which goes deeper, and must tell its tale in the coming years: This "something" may perhaps be shortly described as a breach made in the traditions associated with the chief ecclesiastical feasts, Christmas and Easter. The sentiment associated with both, quite apart from any theological interpretation, is reinforced by well-recognised elements that have survived from a remote Nature worship. The "natalis solis invicti" goes with the winter solstice, and means lengthening days and the remote promise of new life. Here the symbolism is exactly reversed, and points forward to autumn and winter, to death and decay. An autumnal Easter seems not merely to reverse a tradition, but positively to be contrary to the nature of things. In Europe the appropriateness and joyousness of the Feast of Easter are heightened, more than is at once easily realised, by the spring in the blood, and in tree and flower. The observance appears to carry to a logical and spiritual conclusion the ever renewed parable of spring, and to be an appropriate continuation of the parables of the Master—the leaven, the sower, the mustard seed. These, as spring itself, hint at a truth that goes beyond the procession of the seasons which ever return upon themselves, and speak of a life emancipated from the pains of birth and death: The parable carries us beyond themselves.

In Australia Easter falls in Autumn, and it is difficult to escape the sentiment of the season; and, though the same hymns and anthems are sung as in Northern lands, they do not carry with them the same note of joy, largely because the season is against such a mood. Even where the faith in the spiritual reality is present, it cannot assert itself easily and naturally in the face of an adverse symbolism. This is true, though the transition to winter is not so clearly marked as it is in the colder lands: The native trees are not deciduous, but the "signs" of autumn are not less certainly in evidence on that account. So were there no European trees, which do not forget their habit, and faithfully remind us of the "Fall," we should know by the visibly shortening days, the increasing cold, and the touch of keenness in the air, that winter is at hand. Hence the Feast of Easter, in these Southern lands, not merely lacks the re-inforcement of natural symbolism, but finds such symbolism turned against it. Nature speaks of decay and death—these are her first notes—resurrection and a new life are in the distance: In a word, though we do not say it to ourselves, we miss those elements of Nature worship which the Christian Church, incorporated when she made the festival of Christmas coincide with the ancient "natalis solis invicti." It is too much to hope—it would be breaking another tradition—that we shall ever return to the natural order, and keep Easter in October and Christmas in June: Then Christmas might become once more a festival of the home, and the hymns, on an Easter morning, would sound all the sweeter and much more joyful, for the quickened sense of life in the creation around. What is so fair as a beautiful fine spring day in Australia? But that is too sensible a thing to suggest to ecclesiastics: As it is Christmas and Easter are secure in the popular regard, but not as Church festivals, but solely as the great holiday seasons of the year. The religious aspect of the celebration is quite subordinate to this its social use. It is probable that the holiday will become more and more, and the religious function less and less. Services are, indeed, held in several churches, but they are very thinly attended; the people are scattered near and far in search of rest or change or a little shade. It is a little startling to think what may overtake a religious festival when dissociated from a public holiday: In the "Old Land" Whitsuntide is the most popular, because it falls at a very appropriate season; but here there is no holiday, and, though the day yet stands in the list of feasts of the church, it has passed out of popular regard.

These changes are bound to have consequences of some kind or other, but it is too soon, as yet, to say exactly what they will be. The bare facts to which alone I have so far referred merely indicate a breach with the ancient tradition that still is a living thing in the older civilisations of the North; but here, for obvious reasons, it is weakened every year, because we ourselves have no tradition, and are not in love with any other: There can, however, be no doubt that one of the most considerable factors in the change is climate: There is a sort of magic about this word and one hears it used in every conceivable connection, and in excuse or in justification of most omissions and commissions too. The weakening force of family life, the emergence of the larrikin, the disappearance of child life, the prevalence of divorce—one hears them all explained by this magic word “climate.” But quite apart from this degraded employment of the term, which renders it the mere equivalent of “excuse,” it is a very subtle and indefinable “something” that inheres in the weather, in the soil, or the combined effect of both upon character. That it is a reality admits of no dispute, and one that is on the whole adverse to religion. Why, it is almost impossible to say. The climate is bright, and so are the people, but with rapidly alternating “moods.” The proverbial fickleness of the weather has its reflection in the national character. But most important of all is the fact that a hot climate seems to make for a purely secular view of life, much more than a cold or moderately cold one does. Cold, if it be not too cold, is a stimulus to action, whilst heat has a most depressing effect upon mind and spirits alike. There is a pitilessness about a brazen sky and scorching sun that none realise save those who have suffered from it. Every green thing is burnt up, and energy oozes out of every pore, till the strong man becomes quite limp. Desolation in Nature, exhaustion in man produce a certain note of sadness often heard in the Australian poets—

“The very dreariness seems rife
With low and stealthy undertones”

that are predominantly sad: Then, again, life in a new country is much nearer the bare realities of existence than in older lands, and consequently there is less inclination to idealise. But here, as in the case of Christmas and Easter, the influence of Nature on the human spirit is very marked. Shall religion prevail by becoming intensely supernatural? There are some who think so, not entirely without reason, but, on the other hand, the indifference of the people towards the religious aspect of Christmas and Easter scarcely justifies that hope.

Why more? It is Christmas Day in the year of grace 1906. He whose birth is celebrated to-day has become a living spirit: The historical event may mean much or little, but the spiritual reality cannot well be exaggerated. Jesus has been born into immortality, eternal life, and we follow him thither.

Now it is Christmas night. The hum of voices has slowly died away; the light breeze has ceased to stir the foliage; a silence that can be heard reigns over Nature; the world rests in the arms of God; men sink into slumber and dream—of what?

CHRISTIANITY is not a religion as religion has usually been understood. A system of worship abstracted from the common life of men: It came to bind men together in just and true relations, to infuse into their societies the Divine Spirit, to transfigure the coarse vesture of humanity with that divinity which is love, till it shall become a temple in which He dwells.—W. OBITUARY.

ALDERMAN THOMAS HOLT, J.P.

MEMORIAL SERVICE AT BANK STREET, BURY.

ON Sunday last, in spite of drenching rain and a heavy gale blowing, there was a large congregation assembled at Bank-street Chapel, Bury, to show respect to the memory of Alderman Thomas Holt, J.P. Almost every seat in the chapel was occupied; but it is safe to say that the chapel would have been overcrowded had the weather been favourable. Very many friends were prevented from coming, especially his workpeople from Walshaw, on account of the rough weather. It was similar on the day of his funeral, as the procession had to pass along three miles of slush and snow. The Rev. Priestley Evans conducted the whole of the service, and preached from the texts, Job xxxvii. 21, “And now men see not the light which is bright in the skies: but the wind passeth and cleanseth them”; and Hebrews xi. 1, “Now faith is the assurance of things hoped for, the test of things not seen.” And he concluded with the words: “Let some such faith as this be ours to-day. Let us never distrust our God, never lose our faith in Him that He is good, wise, loving, but believe that whatever He does He does it for the best. Without such a faith as this life will soon lose all meaning for us. It will become the darkest of riddles, the blackest of tragedies, and men will lose their nobility and become violent and reckless. But we never do lose our faith completely. It may get weak at times, but it never vanishes altogether. And we pray God to strengthen it now in our hearts. Let it be a firm foundation for our life now as we mourn the loss of one who was beloved of all of us connected with this church, honoured by all his fellow townsmen, respected by all who were acquainted or had any connection with him. His was a personality that made itself felt wherever he went, and his influence was always exerted for high and noble ends. He had some of the chief qualities that go to make greatness. He was in the best sense of the word a good man. But he was not only good; he also possessed the power of making that goodness effective. His was not merely a high character, but it was a strenuous character, actively interested in life's highest purposes, inspired with a spirit of generosity and self-denial, and ever ready to further the abiding welfare of his fellow-creatures. There is no need for me to enumerate the various activities with which he had been connected for many years in this town, and in the district generally. With many of these you are already acquainted, either from personal knowledge or from the accounts given in the local papers for this last week. It is no exaggeration to say that in all of them he will be missed—by some he will be sorely missed. But outside the circle of his own nearest and dearest ones he will be missed, most of all, by the church and schools, that were so dear and close to his heart. We all know how he loved them, and how he devoted his best energies to them. Of all the honours conferred upon him, perhaps there were none of which he was more proud than those of being warden of this church, chairman of its trustees, and superintendent of its Sunday-school. And perhaps his greatest wish, in connection with church and schools, was that the young people of our schools should attach themselves to our church. And if they sincerely wish to keep his memory more than in mere name, if they wish to make it a living influence, they will not do better than by remembering this wish of his and doing all they can to fulfil it. His presence here could always be depended upon unless there was very serious reason for his absence; and it was always strengthening, helpful, and cheering. His presence in our deliberations always meant wisdom, tactfulness and safe guidance. But it is needless for me to recount his good and great qualities; they are all so well known to most of us assembled here to-day to do his memory honour. They only make us keenly conscious of our great loss, and it will be difficult for some time yet to realise that we have him no longer to look to. We have sustained a severe blow; as the loss has been grievous to those who were most closely bound up in his life. There is, however, one consolation left to us, and that is the fact that he was spared to us so long. In the natural course of events we could not expect to have him with us for many more years. He was not cut down in the prime of life. His departure has been the dropping of the ripe fruit. And our chief concern now should be, if we had any real respect and affection for him, that his life shall not be of no account in our lives, that it shall not go for nought as though he had never lived; but we will try and think of him still as a presence in our midst—remember the pious dead, so that their spirit, like a living torch, shall be handed on, and never become extinguished. We will yield him back to God, therefore, not with the feeling of bitter regret, but with gratitude in our hearts for the gift He has given us in him. His brave and noble spirit has pushed off, and has sailed beyond the sunset, to touch the Happy Isles, and there to receive in “the joy of his Lord” the “well done” of a “good and faithful servant.” God prosper him in his new opportunities; and may He grant to those who knew him best and loved him most the faith that made him strong and trustful—the faith that will prove a light to them in the hour of darkness, and which will be bright in the skies of their inward life: God grant them His love whereon to rest, and wait in patience until the days shall come which shall unite them once more in God's Eternity.

ANOTHER veteran Sunday-school worker, Mr. John Chadwick, of Manchester, sends us the following tribute to the memory of his friend:—

It is hardly possible to allow a singularly useful and painstaking servant to pass out of the ranks of our Sunday-school system without bearing witness, as a humble tribute, to the worth of an honourable career in that department of labour. With the late Alderman that sphere of usefulness was cultivated with zeal and diligence in a very quiet and orderly way. With him there was no fuss or demonstration of power, no inattention to the needs of a big school, but rather more a growing awakening to its influence, with a firm resolve to be faithful in his post; Hence a connection of over forty years as a superintendent is a sufficient signal of a good and honest intention which places him in our foremost ranks with high reputation, making it impossible to give an exact portrait of steady, unassuming consistency to be pictured or fully displayed. Though not a man of many finely polished words, or of graceful utterance in speech, he was ever ready to enlarge his mind with exact knowledge, though it might not be after the fashion of modern days or the practice of our age.

Point, precision, and exactness were to him necessary, and all that appertained to sincerity of service was also a delight. He had the good fortune of being cast into a big school of distinguished worth, where in early life he came under the influence of the Revs. Franklin Howorth and John Wright, and with the help of a sound scheme of home-discipline and example he grew up to great vigour of mind and heart, which had an influence upon the lives of others. And thus to the beauty and nobleness of character of such good men he gave an additional lustre, with an inspiration to teachers who worked along with him. Whatever weakness he may have found in school he pronounced against it with the firmness of an upright judge, as he himself practised the virtue which he commended to others. Strong and reliable in his attachments, he became a sincere friend to the present writer, offering to him a hospitable home to save him from a long walk whenever he visited his school.

Though exercised in the commerce of the world, he found time for long-continued labour at Bank-street, Bury, and I am inclined to think that the example of the Grundys and the Wrigleys (men diligent in business) gave an added impetus to his work of love on Sunday, nor did his business place him beyond the duties of civic life.

He thus became a man of enlarged understanding, with experience in public affairs; active, useful, and industrious; with the good sense to wean himself from the frivolity of our times and the ingenious pursuit of ease and pleasure.

This is merely a short sketch in miniature of our departed friend, who to all was so constant, reliable, and sincere, and who, even now, is felt to be acting, speaking, pleading. Can a more interesting personality be presented to our imagination, or a more pathetic force felt by those who wish to go and do likewise? I pen my poor and imperfect words in loving admiration to a spirit so pure, devout, and strong.

The Welsh Church Commission seems to have experienced some rough weather, but is supposed now to have sailed into smoother waters, or at any rate to have arrived at some understanding on the part of its constituent members, which will render its future course easier. Last week the Rev. W. James, J.P., and the Rev. J. Arthur Thomas, of Llandyssul, gave further evidence as to the Unitarians in Wales, and apparently fared better with the Chairman than the Rev. R. J. Jones had done. Lord Justice Vaughan Williams was interested in the Model Trust-deed, and its entirely undogmatic character, as it appears in the Essex Hall Year Book.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

NEXT Wednesday, February 27, it will be just a hundred years since Henry Wadsworth Longfellow was born at Portland, a town on the coast of the State of Maine in America. He was one of the best known and most popular of American poets, but I think we all feel that he belongs to us here in England just as much. I expect you all know some of his poems, and I think you will like to read what follows here, from an article in the Christian Register, of February 7, on "The Childhood of Longfellow." It is written by a lady who was paying a visit to Cambridge, in Massachusetts, which was Longfellow's home for so many years.

One afternoon, she says, walking through Brattle-street, I passed Craigie House. Before it, as often happens, stood a group of visitors, come to see for themselves, as they had doubtless often seen in pictures, the stately mansion that sheltered Washington and became the home of Longfellow. These visitors, were not, however, the tourists with whose like I was familiar, but children, unwearied by much sight-seeing, and showing plainly in their eager faces the excitement of genuine interest. A lady, perhaps their hostess for the day, asked them, as I was about to pass:

"I suppose you all know by heart some poem of Longfellow's?"

The instincts of an old teacher led me to linger for the quick response of assent:

"I can say four poems," shouted one of the older boys, "besides a long piece out of 'Hiawatha.'"

"We can all say 'The Children's Hour,' I guess," declared a girl, whose brown braids were tied with a broad white ribbon. "Every class in school learns that, and we read some of the others, too."

"I can say the whole of the Village Blacksmith," murmured one of the little ones, keeping tight hold of the lady's dress as if to maintain the place by her side.

"Why, of course," concluded another. "Every child knows Longfellow's poetry, more or less," he added, thoughtfully.

That is probably true. Every child knows Longfellow's poetry, more or less. That is true, too, not only in America, but in other countries. When I was a student in Germany, I was surprised to find that one of the Longfellow poems, which I had then never heard nor read, although I had been familiar with them ever since I spoke. "The Old Clock on the Stairs," on exhibition day in the little red school-house down in Maine, was given to my German mates to be learnt by heart.

* * * *

I remember how kindly the poet himself once received a little girl who came from distant India to bring him greetings and a package from an admirer in that far-away country, and how he sent her away happy in his friendliness and in the gifts of his own books that he had pressed upon her. Many and many a story might be told of children, who, born far from America, have yet known and loved America's poet.

Children, then, have an especial interest in this year's centennial anniversary of Longfellow's birth. The main facts of his life are already familiar to them. They know that he was born in the pleasant town of Portland on the twenty-seventh day of February, 1807.

He grew up with four brothers and four sisters, showing even in childhood the traits that kept him serene and gracious into old age:

Little Henry Wadsworth Longfellow was neither saint nor prig. When he was eight months old, his mother wrote of him: "I think you would like my little Henry W. He is an active rogue, and wishes for nothing so much as singing and dancing."

When he was five years old, people were talking about an invasion of Canada, and his aunt wrote: "Our little Henry is ready to march. He had his tin gun prepared and his head powdered a week ago."

Not long before his seventh birthday he sent this message in a letter written to his father: "Oh, tell papa I am writing at school, a, b, c; and send my love to him, and I hope he will bring me a drum." You see that he was not different from other boys, either in his duties or his desires.

This is the first letter he ever wrote, sent perhaps to back up and emphasise the message in his mother's letter—

Portland.

DEAR PAPA,—Ann wants a little Bible like little Betsy's. Will you please buy her one, if you can find any in Boston? I have been to school all the week, and got only seven marks. I shall have a billet on Monday. I wish you to buy me a drum.

HENRY W. LONGFELLOW.

His brother Samuel, afterward his biographer, wrote of him in his childhood: "Henry is remembered as a lively boy, with brown or chestnut hair, blue eyes, a delicate complexion, and rosy cheeks; sensitive, impressionable; active, eager, impetuous, often impatient; quick-tempered, but as quickly appeased; kind-hearted and affectionate,—the sunlight of the house. He had great neatness and love of order. He was always extremely conscientious, — 'remarkably solicitous always to do right,' his mother wrote: 'True, high-minded, and noble; never a mean thought or act,' says his sister, 'injustice in any shape he could not brook.'" Yet he always disliked rough play and loud noises, and he is said to have begged that cotton might be put in his ears to deaden the sound of the Fourth of July cannon. But he was as fond as anybody of jolly good play, and he liked hearty outdoor exercise. His brother mentions particularly kite-flying, ball and swimming in summer, snowballing, skating, and coasting in winter. But his love of sports did not include the love of what is misnamed "sport." He grieved so much over the first and last robin he shot that he never tried to shoot again.

HENRY WADSWORTH LONGFELLOW.

TWENTY-FIVE years ago LONGFELLOW'S blameless life came to a peaceful close, and Wednesday next is the hundredth anniversary of his birth: In his old home in Cambridge, Mass., and in Boston, there will doubtless be worthy centenary celebrations, which will find a cordial response in this country also: LONGFELLOW spent a great deal of time in Europe in the study of romantic literature, and seems to us naturally to belong to old England almost as much as to New. He has been one of the strongest links between the people of the two countries, convincing them of their intimate kinship.

Professor WENDELL, in his "Literary History of America," quotes a passage from Mr. E. C. STEDMAN, in which he says, "A new generation may be at a loss to conceive the effect of LONGFELLOW'S work when it first began to appear." Its influence was like that of a beautiful Gothic church on a people accustomed to the barest meeting-house in a decaying Puritan village, where Sunday was a colourless day of restraint. "To the one relief hitherto afforded them, that of nature's picturesqueness—which even Calvinism endured without compunction—was added a new joy, a glimpse of the beauty and sanctity of human art. A similar delight awaited the first readers of LONGFELLOW'S prose and verse. Here was a painter and a romancer indeed, who had journeyed far and returned with gifts for all at home, and who promised often and again to—

'Sing a more wonderful song,
Or tell a more marvellous tale.'

So we also have found true pleasure in some of his "Tales of a Wayside Inn," his "Evangeline," "Miles Standish," and "Hiawatha," and many of his shorter poems; and there are verses of his that will be cherished when many more ambitious works have long since been forgotten.

We do not propose in these lines of grateful remembrance to dwell on LONGFELLOW'S limitations as a poet. Neither he nor WHITTIER can be reckoned among the great ones in the world of song, but they are both undoubtedly in the hearts of the people, and they help the children to see and to love things beautiful and good. LONGFELLOW did a great work for his people as chief among the poets of the New England Renaissance in the earlier half of last century, kindling imagination, touching true human sympathies, and giving a strong impulse to the love of good literature.

It is pleasant to recall at this time the cordial friendship which subsisted between LONGFELLOW and TENNYSON, to whom the elder poet, when he was seventy, sent as Christmas greeting, the sonnet "Wapentake to ALFRED TENNYSON,"

"in sign

Of homage to the mastery which is thine
In English song."

To which TENNYSON replied: "My dear LONGFELLOW, you have sent me a Christmas greeting: more than that, a Christmas gift in the shape of a very perfect flower from your own spacious garden: wherefore I exult and stick it in my cap, and defy my foes."

Some of the most beautiful things that LONGFELLOW wrote are verses in the shorter poems, where his own personal affections and sympathies have been most deeply stirred, and his words, simple though they be, go straight to the heart.

Such are his lines of "Resignation," on the death of a little girl,

"There is no flock, however watched and tended,

But one dead lamb is there!

There is no fireside, howsoever defended,

But has one vacant chair!"

with the verses of calm and tender faith which follow:—

"There is no Death! What seems so is transition;

This life of mortal breath

Is but a suburb of the life elysian

Whose portal we call Death:

She is not dead,—the child of our affection,—

But gone into that school

Where she no longer needs our poor protection,

And CHRIST himself doth rule."

And these other verses, in which the poet reveals himself in what he so truly admires:—

"Whene'er a noble deed is wrought,

Whene'er is spoken a noble thought,

Our hearts, in glad surprise,

To higher levels rise:

The tidal wave of deeper souls

Into our inmost being rolls,

And lifts us unawares

Out of all meaner cares.

Honour to those whose words and deeds

Thus help us in our daily needs,

And by their overflow

Raise us from what is low!"

Then he pictures the misery of the Crimean hospitals, and FLORENCE NIGHTINGALE, on her errand of mercy, passing from room to room as "Santa Filomena," "A Lady with a Lamp."

"On England's annals, through the long Hereafter of her speech and song,

That light its rays shall cast
From portals of the past.

A lady with a lamp shall stand
In the great history of the land,
A noble type of good Heroic womanhood."

Then there is the birthday greeting, when they both were fifty, to AGASSIZ, the Swiss naturalist, whose home was in New England, with the charming verses:—

"And Nature, the old nurse, took
The child upon her knee,
Saying: 'Here is a story-book
Thy Father has written for thee.'

'Come, wander with me,' she said,
Into regions yet untrod!

And read what is still unread
In the manuscripts of God.'

And he wandered away and away
With Nature, the dear old nurse,
Who sang to him night and day
The rhymes of the universe."

LONGFELLOW'S tribute to Dr. CHANNING remains as a memorial, not only of his reverence for that great teacher, but of his own life-long connection with the Unitarian fellowship, the religious ideal of which he has so happily expressed in his description of one of the company at his "Wayside Inn":—

"A Theologian, from the school
Of Cambridge on the Charles, was there;
Skilful alike with tongue and pen,
He preached to all men everywhere
The Gospel of the Golden Rule,
The New Commandment given to men,
Thinking the deed, and not the creed,
Would help us in our utmost need.
With reverent feet the earth he trod,
Nor banished nature from his plan,
But studied still with deep research
To build the Universal Church,
Lofty as is the love of God,
And ample as the wants of man."

With this we remember also the ordination hymn, which he wrote for his youngest brother, SAMUEL, who was a Unitarian minister, when he entered on his first charge at Fall River, in 1848:—

"CHRIST to the young man said: 'Yet one thing more:

If thou wouldst perfect be,
Sell all thou hast and give it to the poor,
And come and follow me!"

Within this temple CHRIST again, unseen,
Those sacred words hath said,
And his invisible hands to-day have been Laid on a young man's head.

And evermore beside him on his way
The unseen CHRIST shall move,
That he may lean upon his arm and say,
'Dost thou, dear LORD, approve?'

Beside him at the marriage-feast shall be,
To make the scene more fair;
Beside him in the dark Gethsemane
Of pain and midnight prayer.

O holy trust! O endless sense of rest!
Like the beloved John
To lay his head upon the SAVIOUR'S breast,
And thus to journey on!"

Some of the elder brother's verses have found a place in our hymn-books, but in that connection we owe much more to SAMUEL LONGFELLOW, who was twelve years his junior, and became one of the chief singers of the Liberal Faith. Few modern hymns are as perfect as that one of his which begins—

"I look to Thee in every need,
And never look in vain;
I feel thy strong and tender love,
And all is well again:
The thought of Thee is mightier far
Than sin and pain and sorrow are."

The memory of the two brothers will be always closely linked together through the Biography which Samuel wrote, and by his gift of sacred song we are glad also to remember in this centenary celebration how worthy his name is to stand beside that of his elder brother.

THE MARTINEAU MEMORIAL.

SIR,—So much kindly interest, over a wide area, is being shown in the Norwich Martineau Memorial, and especially by readers of THE INQUIRER, that I venture to ask you to find room for a little information up to date.

First, the £877 which I was able to report in your issue of January 26 as having been sent by outsiders towards the £1,300 appealed for on December 1, 1906, has now become £977 16s. This addition includes 50 guineas from Sir Edwin and Lady Durning-Lawrence, and 20 guineas from Dr. Crothers' Church at Cambridge, Mass.; as well as several smaller gifts. For all of these the Octagon Chapel Committee are deeply grateful. At the same time, it is impossible for them as yet to feel free from very grave anxiety as to the completion of the Fund, not only because, as was feared, the contractors have required an advance of about £60 in the price of the contract on account of the rise in the price of certain building materials, but much more on account of the undoubted fact that, in proportion as such a Fund as ours nears completion, a feeling is apt to get abroad amongst those who would otherwise send or increase their help that the congregation concerned may be left to finish it themselves. That feeling, should it gain ground in the present case, would simply spell disaster for us. The second £500 undertaken by the congregation (making their total contribution to the memorial up to £1,000) will tax their energies to the utmost for some time to come; and it has to be borne in mind that the architect's fees have not yet been included in any estimate of total cost. It is therefore only by continued generosity on the part of outsiders that the memorial can become that boon to the congregation and schools for their present and future work that they have so long hoped for—a boon whose value would be incalculably increased could they be open free of debt. Next, the work of demolition of that portion of the site required for the buildings has begun, and it is expected that the ground will be cleared this week. This progress has made it possible to commence arrangements for the laying of the foundation stone; and although full details of these must be left till later, it is with the very greatest pleasure and gratification that we are able to announce that Miss Gertrude Martineau has most kindly acceded to our earnest request that she would perform that ceremony. The date fixed is April 20.

We are glad that it can be so near to Dr. Martineau's birthday, which falls on Sunday, April 21, when we hope to arrange for special services and preachers, and also trust that not a few of those who, in all parts of the country, have so sympathetically watched with and helped us through our three years of planning, will feel drawn to come and share the spirit of quiet hope and fervent aspiration which, on such an occasion, we may surely expect to be abundantly ours.

F. A. MOTTRAM (Hon. Sec. to the Martineau Memorial Fund).

21, Bracondale, Norwich.

P.S.—We should be grateful if you could make the following correction as to a donation of £20 which appeared in the list published on Jan. 26. It should read—"From the bequest of Mrs. M. E. Taylor and Miss M. E. Martineau, £20."

THE PRESTON MEMORIAL AT ISLINGTON.

SIR,—In your full report of the opening of the Preston Memorial Rooms in last week's INQUIRER, I regret that, in consequence of the matter not being alluded to in any of the speeches, no mention is made of the excellent portrait of my late brother, generously presented by Mrs. Sidney Titford. She did not feel the rooms were complete without one, and all the family are very grateful to her for the trouble she took about it, and highly appreciate the kind thought which prompted the gift. The family would also like to take the opportunity of thanking the number of old friends who attended the meeting out of respect to my late brother.

STANTON W. PRESTON.

7, Eldon-road, Feb. 19.

COLYTON.

SIR,—In the annual report of the Sustentation Fund, as given in your issue of last week, the following passage occurs: "Another grant, they are sorry to say, has not been renewed owing to the discontinuance of services at the Colyton Chapel." I shall be glad if you will kindly allow me to correct this erroneous statement. Service is held every Sunday at the Colyton Chapel, nor has a Sunday gone by for nearly a quarter of a century without service. What the managers meant to say, I imagine, was that the congregation at Colyton was at present without the services of a settled minister.

ALFRED SUTCLIFFE.

Crewkerne, Feb. 16.

OBSOLETE CREEDS AND THEIR REMEDY.

WHILE we in the southern part of Great Britain have been interested, or even excited, by the "New Theology," a notable discussion has been, and still is, in progress in Scotland. Apparently, there is no connection between the two centres of disturbance, and their independence of each other serves to heighten their significance. That similar causes are at work is obvious, and, indeed, evidence might easily be presented of a concurrent movement in religious thought far and wide. What is specially remarkable in the Scottish discussion is the remedy suggested for the difficulty involved in the obsolescence of the creeds and confessions hitherto held to be binding. Our readers will hail that remedy with satisfaction.

The discussion we refer to has found expression in a series of articles under the general title "Creed Revision in Scotland," contributed to the Glasgow Herald. This ably-conducted and justly-influential journal is now edited, we understand, by Dr. WILLIAM WALLACE, brother of the late Rev. Dr. ROBERT WALLACE, M.P., who at one time was minister of the Old Greyfriars Church, Edinburgh, and afterwards Editor of the Scotsman.

It is evidently by the Editor's own wish that the series of articles has appeared, and the writers, without exception, are ordained ministers of the Established or the United Free Church of Scotland. There can be no suggestion, in this case, of extreme views, or personal vagary; doubtless there are many of the rank and file who might shrink from the candid expressions of their leaders, but after all it is a lead and not a revolt that is offered, and the results cannot but be far-reaching. In all the articles, of which the eighth appeared last Saturday, the admission is clear that the Westminster Confession is quite out of touch with modern thought and modern scholarship. For instance, the Rev. Dr. D. MACMILLAN, of Kelvinhaugh Parish Church, the writer of the seventh article, says: "It is notorious that the present age has witnessed a quickening of intellectual life no less striking than that which animated the times of the Reformation. It is not too much to say that modern science has in a sense created a new heaven and a new earth. A generation ago the religious world felt that the discoveries of science were of so fundamental and far-reaching a nature that, if the old faith was to live with the new, science must either be proved to be wrong or the creeds of Christendom must be torn to pieces. Science was found in the right, and the creeds still remain unchanged; hence the doubts and difficulties with which the faith of many is distressed and the distrust which is felt with the teaching and position of the Protestant Church." The same writer speaks of the demand for a reconstruction of the Church's faith as "clamant." While he characterises the confession as "a noble document, of which any church might well be proud," he adds, "But in many of its features it has been left far behind." It is proper to say, however, that this writer, who is typical of the rest, believes the "citadel" of the Christian faith to remain untouched by science and criticism.

It is when we turn to his successor in the series that we come upon the suggestion which has rendered the whole most noteworthy. This writer, the Rev. E. F. Scott, is the minister of Prestwick South United Free Church. He points to the extreme urgency of the question of creed revision. Doubtless, some relief has been given to consciences by such measures as the Declaratory Act of the United Free Church, and the change in the formula now adopted in the Established Church of Scotland. Such loopholes, however, by which, while ostensibly accepting the confession, a man is allowed the escape of indefinite mental reservations, are regarded by this writer as "not altogether ingenuous." There is, he says—and plain men will agree with him—"something repugnant to a candid mind in the whole idea of subscribing to articles of faith under reservation. A solemn promise ought to be absolutely binding, if it is made at all." Well, what is to be done? Can the Confession be so revised as to come abreast of present-day thought and knowledge, while still remaining substantially the old historic creed? But clearly, "such a revision would only result in patchwork which would leave matters in worse confusion than ever." The old creed is a "coherent whole—the precipitate of the religious life of a given age. To modernise it would change it into a hybrid creed, which could not be held consistently by any man." Then, secondly, can a new creed be drawn up to replace the old one, a new statement of belief "consonant with the religious thought of our time and wide enough to include many types of opinion?" The writer doubts it. A few fundamentals might be agreed upon, but they would necessarily exclude much that seems most vital to many people. Some new forms of creed have been tentatively offered already, so "simple and comprehensive" that "one can hardly imagine any man, short of a downright atheist, who would not cheerfully subscribe to these vague commonplaces." "But it would be equally difficult," he continues, "to find a single Christian, of any definite belief whatever, who would accept them for a moment as an expression of his faith. This is the rock on which all modern attempts at creed-making must necessarily come to shipwreck: They represent a compromise and nothing more: They endeavour to state, in language entirely colourless, the irreducible minimum of belief: This is unavoidable, in view of the growing diversity of religious opinion; but a creed made up of compromises is a contradiction in terms: It would give expression to no man's true belief, and, would appear, to the most earnest minds to be little else than a betrayal and a mockery." Reading these lines, we cannot but recall the impression produced by the study of the Free Church Catechism issued some years ago. Obviously couched in language capable of a double sense, that document was a very feeble imitation, indeed, of the old style of theological statement, which, whether it were wrong or right in regard to the truth, was at least straightforward, and meant to express one view, not to cover half-a-dozen!

But we return to Mr. Scott's third alternative. It is simply—"to dispense altogether with any written and formal creed." "The time appears to have come when we have to consider not merely the question of creed-revision, but the wider question—whether the Church ought to impose any form of prescribed belief." Appealing to the example of the Founder of Christianity, this writer declares:—"It is a simple fact of history that the necessity for a creed was never felt till the original message of Christ has been, in great measure, forgotten. Christian ideas had become externalised; the Church, as an outward authority, had taken the place of the living spirit. It was then that the individual Christian gave up his freedom and responsibility and took refuge in a formal creed." He claims, therefore, that to dispense with the creed is to revert to the true idea of Christianity. "The truth must needs reveal itself differently to every honest seeker, and the Church can have no right to dictate to him what he is bound to believe. It can assist him in his seeking; it can bring him into fellowship with others who are also striving in their different ways to reach a knowledge of the truth. But it oversteps its rights when it imposes its own formula in place of the personal creed, which each man must discover for himself."

We welcome these words. They express convictions not new, but dear, to us and to our fathers. At last, it would seem, the dawn of true Christian liberty is breaking, and if the full day is not yet, we have sure grounds of confidence. To convince his brethren, even those who are profoundly dissatisfied with the present position, may be a difficult one for such a bold adventurer as Mr. Scott. Yet the stars in their courses are on his side: We commend the whole of his ably-reasoned argument to the notice of all lovers of religious freedom, and we shall look with renewed interest for the sequel to his appeal:

W. G. T.

THE supreme happiness of life is the conviction that we are loved,—loved for ourselves,—say, rather, loved in spite of ourselves.—Victor Hugo:

FREE institutions contribute in no small degree to freedom and force of mind, by teaching the essential quality of men, and their right and duty to govern themselves; and I cannot but consider the superiority of an elective government as consisting very much in the testimony which it bears to these ennobling truths. It has often been said that a good code of laws, and not the form of government, is what determines a people's happiness. But good laws, if not springing from the community, if imposed by a master, would lose much of their value. The best code is that which has its origin in the will of the people who obey it; which, whilst it speaks with authority, still recognises self-government as the primary right and duty of a rational being; and which thus cherishes in the individual, be his condition what it may, a just self-respect.—Channing.

EAST CHESHIRE CHRISTIAN UNION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE annual meeting of the East Cheshire Christian Union for Missionary Purposes was held at Styal on Saturday, February 16. Not all the eighteen churches included in the Union were represented, and unfortunately illness and absence from home accounted for several vacant places. The Rev. H. Enfield Dowson is still abroad as a convalescent, and the secretary, the Rev. B. C. Constable, was also away through illness, and the Rev. W. F. Turland. The ministers present were the Revs. A. R. Andreae, E. G. Evans, W. Harrison, H. E. Perry, W. G. Price, H. B. Smith, and E. L. H. Thomas. The British and Foreign Unitarian Association was represented by the President, Mr. Grosvenor Talbot, and the Rev. V. D. Davis.

Service was held in the Norcliffe Chapel in the afternoon, conducted by the Rev. E. Gwilym Evans, of Dukinfield, whose sermon was from the text, John viii. 13, 14. It was an eloquent vindication of the ultimate authority in religion, which must be found in the testimony of the human soul. The controversy, he said, went on from century to century. Always, there was time-honoured tradition and brave innovation. In face of tradition and formulas of faith and the power of ecclesiasticism, the freedom of the spirit asserted itself, and the witness of the individual soul was borne. That was its inalienable right, and all sincere religious men had to bear witness of themselves. There were those who now claimed that Christ was the one authority in religion, but it was from Christ himself they learnt the higher truth: The secret of his faith and strength they saw when they contemplated the praying Christ, who sought for guidance, and in his own heart heard the voice of the Eternal:—

"O Sabbath rest by Gali ee!

O calm of hills above!

Where Jesus knelt to share with Thee
The silence of eternity

Interpreted by love!"

There they saw the truth. That was an all-sufficient vision. Nothing must come between God and the soul, the Father and His child, the Infinite Love and their finite trust. They must be free from the old dogmas and the authority of creeds, and have room to grow; there must be room for new thought and fresh revelation. For their ideal they looked not to the churches, but to Christ, and found it in his spirit of comprehensiveness and charity, and in the soul-value which they learnt of him.

A collection for the funds of the Union was taken after the sermon.

The annual meeting was held immediately after the service the Rev. E. L. H. Thomas, minister of Styal and Dean-row, in the chair.

The Secretary's illness had somewhat disorganised the business arrangements, and the Treasurer was also unable to be present, but Mr. Albert Slater, of Hyde, had thrown himself with great energy into the breach, and brought up the annual report and accounts, which had been printed, and were taken as read. He also read a letter from Mr. Constable, regretting that illness kept him away.

The report offered a welcome to the Revs. E. Gwilym Evans, H. E. Perry, and Jenkyn Thomas, who in the course of the year had settled at Dukinfield, Denton and Glossop respectively, and sorrowfully recorded the death of the Rev. H. Kelsey White, of Ashton, and Mr. James Howard Brooks, a staunch friend and Vice-President of the Union. The most notable work of the year had been the special mission services held in February and March at Ashton, Mossley, Mottram and Stalybridge; and later in the year, in October and November, united services and meetings at nearly all the churches in the Union: A special report as to these, by the Rev. H. Bodell Smith, who acted as Mission Secretary, concluded as follows:—

"In good done, in interest aroused, in increase of intercourse between the Churches in the Union, in the development of a warmth and zeal on behalf of our religion, in strengthening the attachment of the Churches to the Union, and in the deepening of the spiritual life of our people, the effort has been most satisfactory, and as an experiment has succeeded beyond all anticipations."

The foundation stone of the new church at Ashton was laid in April, and the building was only waiting the settlement of a new minister to be opened, but £900 of the £3,000 of the cost had still to be found. During the year Flowery Field, Stockport, Knutsford, Gee Cross and Styal had all made successful efforts to raise money by sales of work or other social means. The report noted that as the Union was founded on February 22, 1859, the time would soon come for a celebration of its Jubilee, and concluded:—

"May we all work together with hand and heart, and make this Union more and more a real bond of union, bringing light and strength and encouragement to every corner of its domains; and may we also bear in mind that many of the things herein chronicled are simply means to an end, the great end being the development of the religious and moral life of all our Churches and their ever-increasing power for doing good in the world."

Reports of the four aided churches, Ashton, Congleton, Crewe and Mottram, followed the general report. Denton is now independent of a grant from the Union.

The accounts showed a legacy of £200 from the late Joseph Greenwood, of Stalybridge, added to the Endowment Fund, which now stands at £1,487. Annual subscriptions amounted to £38 9s., congregational collections to £61 14s., grants from the B. & F.U.A. £114 3s. 4d., the total income being £335 13s. 7d., and the expenditure £283 9s. 10d. The adverse balance from 1905 was £8 17s. 7d., and the account closed with £43 6s. 2d. in hand.

The CHAIRMAN, in moving the adoption of the report and accounts, expressed the general regret at Mr. Dowson's absence, and their sense of loss in the death of Mr. Kelsey White and Mr. Howard Brooks. With reference to the former he quoted an old saying concerning the things of God, that they were like snow, which man could not touch without leaving on them the print of his hand. In his work among them, Mr. Kelsey White had left a mark, but no stain. Of Mr. Brooks he spoke as one of the most steadfast of men in all departments of life, whose loss they deeply felt. As to the coming jubilee of their Union, he thought they should begin to think of it in good time, so that it might be worthily celebrated.

The President, Mr. E. B. BROADRICK, seconded the resolution, which was unanimously passed.

Mr. H. P. GREG moved a vote of thanks to the out-going officers and committee. The Rev. Lawrence Scott was elected President, and the other officers were re-elected, a vote of sympathy with Mr. Constable in his illness being coupled with his re-election as secretary. March 10 was fixed for the annual collections for the Union. On the motion of the Rev. W. G. PRICE, a cordial vote of thanks was passed to the Rev. E. G. Evans for his sermon, and the meeting terminated.

EVENING MEETING:

After tea in the adjoining schoolroom, and an inspection of the new Council Room, which has been built on to the chapel, at right angles to the chancel, communicating with it through the vestry, a public meeting, which was well attended, was held in the chapel.

Mr. H. P. GREG presided, and after an opening hymn, offered a hearty welcome to the members of the Union to Styal. They had there, he said, a living congregation, though only small in numbers, and there were eighteen of such congregations belonging to the East Cheshire Christian Union. Union was supposed to be a sign of strength, and that was so, if the units were strong; but if the units were weak, so must the Union be. They were strong, he thought, in their mission, but weak in their means. No church, no school of thought, had a more glorious gospel, a more glorious message, simple, honest, straightforward, creedless, progressive, receptive of truth—the gospel preached by Christ, the sublime message of the fatherhood of God and brotherhood of man. Was that a message for the few or the many? Until twelve months ago, their experience might have led them to think it was only for the few. But since then a great and blessed change had taken place. A little experiment had been made, a tremendous object lesson. Mr. Spedding, of Rochdale, had bravely tested the situation. He started a van mission, and proved that their message was for the many, not for the few. It was a great achievement, for which they humbly thanked God. Speaking further of their method of appeal, Mr. Greg said that the ordinary course was to urge the individual to conform to a type; but for the sake of truth, for honesty of thought, they must rather urge upon him nonconformity. To save the individual they must develop and not conform him. He believed the development of the individual to be the supreme need of the present hour. Unity was strength only if the units were strong, and the units of their churches were the individuals. Individuals were dwarfed, starved, made negative by conformity, strengthened, developed, made positive by nonconformity. Let each individual be helped to think on the deep problems of life honestly on his own lines, fearless of authority, however hoary, freely on subjects however sacred, and they might rest assured that in the conflict of opinion thus nurtured, the movement was furthered by which the many approach the One, as the editor of the Hibbert Journal so finely expressed it, or in more homely language, by which the children approach the Father. That was their mission, to urge the pursuit of truth, wherever it might lead, and to encourage individual development. They had much reserve to throw off, to give expression to the deepest thoughts they had on the problems of life. He might, perhaps, be misunderstood, as anxious for the development of the individual, as against that of the community; but if they developed the individual, truly they need not trouble about the community.

MR. GROSVENOR TALBOT, President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, spoke of the great pleasure it was to him to be there, and at a meeting over which their chairman was presiding, for he represented the third generation of Gregs whom he had known. He had been at school with Mr. Greg's father, and knew his grandfather, who was remembered as one of the first to take up the crusade against the Corn Laws, before either Bright or Cobden were in the field. Referring to the Association, which he represented as its President, Mr. Talbot spoke of the intense interest they took in all the mission stations, and the sympathy they felt with all the workers, a sympathy that was a desire to help. It was no light work, and they must not think it was a small thing, in which they were engaged. If numbers were few, their influence was not small in the upbuilding of a high ideal of religious thought and feeling. During the past fifty years a great work had been done in the study of the Bible, to give them a new understanding of it and a truer reverence for God and Jesus Christ. They were thankful for that work, but it was not the end of what they had to do. They had now to go on and live the lives which their new reading of the Bible taught them they ought to live. Christianity would never reach the people unless those who professed to be Christians acted up to their high ideal. He rejoiced in Unitarianism, because by teaching the love of truth it made people think, and carried that truth into actual life. He urged them to have faith in their Unitarianism, belief in the one God and the good Christ; and concluded with another reference to his memories of fifty years ago, and congratulated them on the work they were doing there.

The Rev. H. E. PERRY spoke of the need there was for them to go forward, and to take their message out into the world. They must take the spiritual truth which possessed them out to the people, to resist the growing power of secularism; and he referred especially to the power of helplessness there was in Mr. Armstrong's "God and the Soul," which he would gladly see distributed among all their churches and by them among the people.

The Rev. V. D. DAVIS also spoke as, with the President, representing the British and foreign Unitarian Association. They who had the duty of administering the funds entrusted to the National Association, welcomed such opportunities of coming into close touch with workers in different parts of the country, and he congratulated them on the success of the United Missions, which had been held by the churches in that district. It was an encouraging sign of what might be done, and still more so was the experience of the Van Mission, which undoubtedly must react upon their congregational life and on the preaching power of ministers. In conclusion he pleaded for more practical interest in the publications of the Association, and especially urged a wide distribution of the new sixpenny edition of Martineau's "Endeavours," the first volume of which was now published, and the second would very soon be out. For the strengthening of the lives of individuals in their churches, of which Mr. Greg had spoken, there could be no better means than the earnest study of those books, with their fine moral stimulus and religious inspiration.

The Rev. W. HARRISON moved and the Rev. H. B. SMITH seconded, a vote of thanks to the speakers. The Rev. A. R. ANDREAE moved, and Mr. LEONARD NEW seconded, a vote of thanks to the Styal friends, and a vote of thanks to the chairman, moved by Mr. E. B. BROADRICK, and seconded by Mr. R. T. HEYS, brought the meeting to a close.

PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY OF LONDON AND THE SOUTH-EASTERN COUNTIES.

MEETING AT MANSFORD-STREET.

At the annual meeting of the Assembly, held at Lewes, last October, the President and others spoke of the desirability of drawing the various congregations, which compose the Assembly, into closer union and co-operation. These congregations are scattered far and wide over a large area, and for the most part, it is to be regretted, see and know little of one another. Some of them are not even represented at all at the annual meetings, which are held at various places, alternately in London and the country; and many others are represented only by the minister and perhaps one delegate. It would of course, be impossible, and perhaps undesirable, to hold the annual meeting of the Assembly at some of the chapels in small country towns, or at some of the struggling mission-centres in the East End of London, and yet it is just these very churches and chapels which need most of all the sympathy and encouragement of the Assembly, the enthusiasm that is born of largely-attended meetings, the joy of knowing and feeling that they are not fighting the battle of religious freedom alone, but are closely associated with others, who are of one mind and one spirit with them.

So it was decided that a beginning should be made in this direction, and last Saturday a meeting of the Assembly was held at Mansford-street, Bethnal Green, and another gathering is to be held at Effra-road, Brixton, for South London, on March 14. But will the Committee of the Assembly take into consideration the desirability of holding these meetings at regular intervals at different centres: during the summer, for instance, in the country, and during the winter at some of the churches in London? Why should not we in the London district follow the example of our friends in Lancashire and Cheshire, and visit some of our interesting and delightful country chapels on Saturday afternoons in the summer? The success of last Saturday's meeting should encourage the Committee to go forward with this side of their work.

It was at the invitation of the Mansford-street Chapel Committee that this meeting was arranged, and it was attended by some 250 or perhaps 300 people. These were mostly connected with one or other of the congregations in the East of London, for whom, of course, the meeting was specially intended. In addition to Mansford-street, the congregations at George's-row, Stepney, Limehouse, Stratford, Walthamstow, and Ilford were well represented, and in addition there were several friends present from Essex Church, Rosslyn-hill, Little Portland-street, Hackney, and Stoke Newington-green. The large number of young people present, who seemed thoroughly to enjoy the meeting, is a hopeful sign for the future of our churches.

The proceedings began with an organ recital in the church by Mr. John Harrison, who presided at the organ during the service. At 7.30 the opening hymn, "We come unto our father's God," was sung very heartily by the congregation. A short lesson was read by the Rev. Gordon Cooper, the minister of the chapel, after which prayer was offered by the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, the minister of the Assembly. The Mansford-street choir then sang the anthem "The strain upraise of joy and praise." After this simple service four short addresses were given, dealing with the work of the Assembly.

The Rev. F. K. FREESTON, of Essex Church, was the first speaker, and he gave an interesting historical address on "What the Assembly Is." But first he explained the object of that gathering. They had come, he said, that they might feel the joy of meeting together, and might, at the same time, arouse fresh interest in the Provincial Assembly. It was most fitting to begin, as they had done, with a service of praise and prayer. The Assembly was an organisation of the churches and congregations in London and South-Eastern counties, which were on the roll of the National Conference; and its formation was the outcome of the paper read by Dr. Martineau at the Leeds Conference in 1888. In that paper Dr. Martineau had pleaded earnestly for a better organisation of the churches. His suggestions gave rise to considerable discussion, and were warmly taken up by the leaders of the London churches. Dr. Sadler presided over a meeting called to consider the question of co-operation among the scattered churches in the London district; and a resolution was carried to the effect that "it is expedient that a Provincial Assembly be formed as in the Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire." It was further agreed that the body of Presbyterian Ministers should be asked to carry out the resolution. A meeting of this body was called, Dr. Martineau presided, and again spoke strongly of the need for more co-operation among the scattered congregations. And a resolution was carried that a Provincial Assembly be formed. A general meeting of the congregations was called together, and Dr. Drummond moved a resolution that "with a view to closer union and co-operation among the churches, a Provincial Assembly be constituted." This was on October 23, 1889. The Assembly is thus a representative organisation, consisting of the ministers of the churches on the roll, and of two delegates duly appointed by the congregations. Its object has already been made sufficiently clear: it is to bring the churches and congregations into closer union and co-operation, that the strong may help the weak, the rich, the poor. The Provincial Assembly brings them all together into one organisation, and helps them to realise that they are one church in many places. In connection with the Assembly there was a Sunday School Union, an Advisory Committee, and a Ministers' Pension and Insurance Auxiliary Fund; all of which helped to create a sense of common life among the churches. In conclusion Mr. Freeston expressed his conviction that the Assembly was, in a small way, meeting the needs of the churches, and preparing the way for a larger future. It had been started under the happiest auspices, and all the leaders of thought and life in the London churches had worked for it—Martineau, Drummond, Carpenter, Nettlefold, and Wicksteed. The question of open trust-deeds was one that was coming prominently forward, and our principles were gaining ground; and he appealed to those who believed in these principles "to count it a pride, an honour, and a joy" to work for the Provincial Assembly.

The Rev. F. H. JONES, President of the Assembly, was the next speaker. The subject of his address was: "What the Assembly hopes to do," and he emphasised the remarks made by the previous speaker, explaining more fully the meaning of the term "non-subscribing," which he thought was perhaps not understood by some of the younger people. To subscribe meant literally "to write one's name under," and was the word used when men signed a declaration of faith, or series of articles of belief; by writing his name under them a man showed he believed in them. Almost all the churches to-day required their ministers, if not their members as well, to "subscribe" in this way to certain doctrines; but in our churches membership was perfectly free and open. He told of a Jesuit father, who had been expelled from his Order because his preaching was not in accordance with the creed of the Catholic Church; such a thing could not happen among us; we were free to teach and to live our highest and our best. Mr. Jones then spoke of the earnest desire of the Assembly to bring the churches and congregations closer together. Many of them were small in numbers, some were very isolated, and felt they were almost powerless. By every means in its power the Assembly wanted to unite them, so that the few members of one congregation, meeting perhaps in one room, might feel that they were part of a larger church, working in the same spirit for the same principles.

Mr. JOHN HARRISON gave expression to the regret which all felt at the unavoidable absence of Rev. Henry Gow, who was to have spoken on: "A Free Church." He would not attempt, he said, to take Mr. Gow's place, but would say a few words on what he thought "The Assembly ought to do." He maintained that it was the duty of the Assembly to care for the welfare of its ministers. He had attended meetings to consider the question of the supply of students for the ministry, and had asked what prospect they held out to young men of earning a decent living. As President of the Assembly he had inquired into the position of the ministers on the roll, and had been shocked to find that some were working for stipends which a merchant would be ashamed to offer to a clerk! This was a matter for the Assembly rather than for individual churches: they expected many things of their ministers; and the duty of caring for their welfare was one they must not neglect.

Mr. ALFRED THOMPSON, the treasurer of the Mansford-street congregation, was the last speaker. He gave an earnest address on: "What the young people can do for the Church." He thought the young people should fully understand the principles for which their church stood before they joined it; but having joined it they should live for it, and be ready to sacrifice a great deal for it. They did not meet together merely to worship; they must prove their love to God in the service of man. And so the young people must be ready to enter into the larger life of the churches—into the larger life of the community. Thus would they become leaders of men. Happy is the church that is rich in young life that looks forward in that spirit! If the spirit of the young people is right—if they understand the power they will have in the future, and fully realise what it means—the work they can do in the church is endless. If they do their best they will be living members of a living church, with a living faith in the living God!

At the conclusion of Mr. Thompson's address, Ebenezer Eliot's hymn, "When wilt thou save the people?" was sung, and the benediction brought this part of the meeting to an end.

An adjournment was then made to the schoolroom, where refreshments were served, and a delightful hour was spent in social intercourse. Everyone had thoroughly enjoyed the meeting in the church, and a fine spirit of enthusiasm pervaded the whole gathering, which was a great success.

THE tale of the Divine Pity was never yet believed from lips that were not felt to be moved by human pity.—George Eliot.

PREACH the Truth, and for this end you must seek and get it; and this is among the hardest labours of life. To see things as they are, to see them through a clear, uncoloured medium, to strip them of every disguise, to put to silence our own passions and prejudices, to resist the intolerance, the servility, the established errors and earthly modes of thought, the arrogant pretensions and the nervous fears of the multitude around us, and, amidst all these hindrances and obscurations, to discern the truth in its simplicity and majesty; this is a labour which turns to sport the toil of the hands and the sweat of the brow; and to hold fast this truth openly, fearlessly, amidst outcry, scorn, desertion, persecution, is a heroism before which the exploits of conquerors grow vulgar and tame.—Channing.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

EASTERN COUNTIES.

THE "New Theology" has created some excitement in the Eastern Counties. The correspondence in the newspapers has been exceedingly poor, but ministers of most denominations have had something to say about it, including preachers in the Cathedral. The orthodox sermons have been somewhat apologetic in tone; they have not revealed any strenuous effort to grapple with the subject, and they have not condemned the movement in the old, spirited, confident way. Some preachers have dealt with the fall of man as though they had never heard of Darwin. Others, like the old aristocrat who declined combat with the expert swordsman on the ground that his challenger was "too little of a gentleman," have avoided the issue by asserting that one combatant is "too little of a theologian." The local papers have given full reports of our ministers' sermons, and some people outside our churches have recognised that our ministers are the best authorities on the subject. Good congregations have gathered to hear them, despite the inclemency of the weather.

There is generally some theological discussion being carried on in the Eastern Daily Press. This week the topics are "Infant Baptism" and "Our Common Christianity." Startling ideas are occasionally expressed. A plea for more union was recently put forward by one of our ministers, who pointed out that in the early Christian Church the Lord's Prayer was an adequate devotional bond and, as Dean Stanley said, "the whole Liturgy." This brought from a High Churchman the reply: "If one may just speak for oneself, to me, personally, the Lord's Prayer is utterly meaningless apart from the sacramental worship of the Church, and the implied faith in the Divinity of Christ and the truth of the Blessed Trinity." Statements of this nature lessen one's hope of union on the things we have in common, but, in spite of them, we find signs that the general outlook is becoming broader.

The other churches of the district will pardon me if I mention Norwich first. Friends will be glad to know that the house on the right of the chapel is being pulled down, and that by the end of this week the site for the Martineau Memorial will be cleared. The contract for the building, according to the plan which appeared as an inset to THE INQUIRER, was signed a few days ago by Mr. Stevens, the chapel secretary, on behalf of the congregation. Naturally, there is some excitement over the event; the young people are already talking over special work for next winter. But the feeling that is deepest in some of us is the desire that this memorial, which will perpetuate a noble name in the district, may be opened free of debt. It would be unfortunate if, after having received generous subscriptions to the fund, we were to fall short of the required amount by a few hundred pounds. It will be seen from the next published list of subscriptions that the appeal outside the congregation is now for £300. The congregation are doing their best; they have raised the £500 to which they originally pledged themselves, and are on the way towards their second £500.

Some of us would not have been so bold in our appeal, if we had not felt that there is the possibility of building up a strong Institutional Church here, which will be a great moral influence in the immediate neighbourhood, and a source of strength to the other churches of East Anglia. We have lost heavily through the deaths of old and respected members, the last to be taken being Mr. D. C. Betts. The minister has officiated during the last six years at the gravesides of a quarter of the congregation, but for every old member who has passed away two young ones have stepped forward to take his place. There are eighty-two subscribers on the present list whose names were not there six years ago. The sums subscribed are smaller than those of the older members, but the amount now being raised is larger than it has been for some years. There are about 300 children and over 30 teachers in the Sunday-school; 50 young people over the age of sixteen in the minister's class. It was the possibility that such facts implied, as well as the desire to erect a worthy memorial to Dr. Martineau, that strengthened us to make the appeal we did. We cannot fully express our appreciation of the earnestness and ability which Mrs. Mottram has brought to this work.

Her letter, which will be found in this week's INQUIRER, gives further information as to the progress of the Memorial Fund, and makes a most welcome announcement as to the stone-laying on April 20, the day before Dr. Martineau's birthday, on which, being a Sunday, special services of commemoration and thanksgiving will be also held. Then we shall look forward with good hope to the autumn, for the opening of the building.

The Rev. W. J. Pond is leaving Long Sutton to take up the ministry at Whitchurch at the beginning of March. It is now sixteen years since he re-opened the chapel at Long Sutton, spending the first Sunday waiting in vain for someone to join him. He has been settled in East Anglia longer than any other minister now in the Eastern Union, and has had a good and religious influence upon the long, straggling village, having done all that could be done, and kept a congregation together under peculiar difficulties. We trust the change to Whitchurch will give him the larger opportunity he merits.

The Rev. Richard Newell lives in the sleepest town in the sleepest part of England. Even his natural enthusiasm cannot rouse the people of Framlingham from their drowsiness. His chief work is done at Bedfield and Monk Soham, where he acts not only as minister, but as business agent to the villagers, and so prevents the middle man from getting much profit out of their produce. He must be one of the few ministers in England who finds the best market for his congregation's eggs.

At Hapton, for the first time in the history of the chapel, which dates back to Cromwell's time, an evening service has been conducted throughout the year; the attendance at the afternoon service has been larger. Mr. R. B. ...

a member of the Local Board of Guardians. He writes: "In the country, perhaps more than in the city, a great effort is always being made to raise the moral tone of the people; overcrowding and the want of proper cottage accommodation opening a wide door for lapses into a state which does not bring credit on a Christian community. The cry, 'Back to the land,' is not repeated here, the minister and his wife having been almost compelled to help the overplus population in migrating to districts where they can be useful. Cottage property is not in favour with the landlords, a new cottage is nearly a miracle, and the walls of some of the old ones let in both daylight and plentiful wind." Yet this district strikes one as most under-populated. Here is a problem for social reformers.

A course of Sunday evening addresses has been delivered at Braintree. On some occasions people have not been able to find room in the iron building, and have gone away. Mr. Fuller is arranging another course. The interest in the "New Theology" has been keen at Yarmouth, and Mr. Birks has not been backward in seizing the opportunity thus afforded of making our beliefs more widely known. Some new members have been added, and it seems probable that within a few years Yarmouth and Filby will be lifted out of the difficulties which have hampered them during the last few decades. Mr. Connell has made a good start at Bury St. Edmunds. We are looking forward to his welcome meeting, which will be held, we suppose, during next month. That may draw some of the Bury people away from the thought of the forthcoming pageant. The special services at Ipswich have been well attended. Some years ago an attempt was made to exclude Mr. Tavener from the Ipswich Social Settlement, on the ground that he was not a Christian. He has successfully fought this prejudice, and is lecturing at the Settlement again next month.

There are certain difficulties in the East. The chapel at Lynn is closed. That is our chief problem. But on the whole, despite heavy losses, we are moving forward.

ALFRED HALL.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Brighton.—A distinctly cheering and optimistic tone rang through the proceedings at the annual meeting of the congregation which was held on Wednesday, Feb. 13, with the Rev. Priestley Prime in the chair. The only drawback was the announcement that Miss Boys, who has been connected with the Sunday-school for so many years, felt compelled to give up the greater part of her duties. An admirable superintendent, however, has been found in Mr. Dallaway. The Treasurer, Mrs. Brown, presented a financial report very favourable on the whole, and other members of the congregation who undertake the management of the various institutions affiliated to the church, such as the Monthly Calendar, the Ladies' Working Party, the Reading Circle, &c., spoke very hopefully of their different sections, and the Rev. Priestley Prime, proposing the vote of thanks to the various officers, expressed the conviction that if all the members of the congregation were pulled well together, he would in church at every service. Altogether, it was a very encouraging and hopeful meeting. There was also a very gratifying attendance of members and friends at the services on Sunday, Feb. 17, the second anniversary of Mr. Prime's taking up his duties at Brighton.

Clifton.—At a Lenten service at Oakfield-road, Church, on Friday evening, February 15, the Rev. John Hunter, D.D., of Glasgow, was the preacher. The Rev. E. I. Fripp, Minister of the Church, and the Rev. Donald B. Fraser, of the David Thomas Memorial Church, also took part in the service. "Are we forgetting God?" was the subject of Dr. Hunter's sermon, from the text Deuter. viii. 11. The man to whom God was a real presence, he said, was the truly religious man, and towards the close of a very earnest appeal he said that the duty of the churches was to arouse in the hearts of the people the sense of God and their responsibility to Him. He felt more and more that the great and critical battle was not between forms of religion, not between the old theology and the new, but between religion and indifference. Let them pray and work for a revival in the churches for a real faith in God, that would manifest itself in the world around. Instead of vexing and hindering one another, instead of giving themselves up to small problems and sectarian issues, let them do their utmost to turn the thoughts of men to the reality of the living God. They must not forget God in the education of the children. It would be a pity if denominational rivalries and strong party feelings should drive them to exclude religion from the schools. Then they needed to discipline themselves to habits of meditation and prayer. In his concluding remarks the preacher appealed especially to the young people not to forget God, to rob their life of its greatest need. Let them come face to face with God, and take up all that faith in Him meant. It would mean illumination and strength to them, joy, and eternal life.

Dover.—Mrs. Ginever gave a lecture on Hungary at the Town Hall, on Monday evening. There was an audience of nearly 1,000 persons, who listened with rapt attention to the thrilling story of Hungary's trials and heroic achievements, as told in the eloquent language of the lecturer. Excellent music was provided at intervals by M. Géza de Kresz, the distinguished Hungarian violinist, to the accompaniment of Mr. Aylmer.

Dundee.—The forty-first anniversary of the revival of the Unitarian Society in Dundee was celebrated last Sunday, the Rev. H. Williamson taking both services. On the following evening the event was further celebrated by a pleasant social gathering.

Halstead.—The Rev. T. E. M. Edwards preached at the Free Christian Church on Sunday, February 10, and afterwards presided at the annual business meeting representing the Provincial Assembly, from which society the congregation has supplies. The secretary reported the same number of members as last year, and a very slight increase of the average attendance; and the treasurer's balance in hand compared favourably with last year. The usual officers were elected, and votes of thanks passed to the Provincial Assembly; the voluntary band, and the chairman.

Knutsford (Opening of New Rooms).—A tea-meeting was held on Wednesday, Feb. 20, to celebrate the opening of a Ladies' Room, which has been added to the schoolroom, and which can be used for committee and other small meetings. Beneath this a most commodious kitchen has been arranged and also a heating chamber, while the whole building has been supplied with a hot water apparatus. Nearly 90 sat down to tea, and at 7 o'clock the chair was taken by Mr. Travers Hadfield, who was supported by the Revs. A. Gordon, D. Agate, and G. A. Payne, and Mr. M. Allen. Letters of apology for absence were received from Mr. Alfred Holt and Mr. George Holt. An excellent concert followed, consisting of songs, pianoforte duets, banjo and violin solos. The alterations and additions have cost nearly £600, towards which £442 has been raised during the past year by donations and sales of work.

Leeds: Hunslet.—The second conference of the session of the Yorkshire Sunday School Union was held on Saturday last, when representatives from Leeds (Mill Hill, Holbeck, Hunslet), Bradford, Pudsey, and Wakefield, to the number of seventy, were present. After tea, the president, Mr. E. O. Dodgson, called upon Mr. Charles Stainer to read a paper on "Childhood and Theology." The paper was a thoughtful plea for a return to the serious teaching of religion based upon definite doctrine. The reader advocated the grouping of the scholars into three sections according to age; the first, including scholars under ten, second, under sixteen, with subjects and class books graded to suit those ages. An interesting discussion ensued, in which Messrs. Dodgson, Brook, Jackson, Clayton, Hill, the Revs. C. Hargrove, H. MacLachlan, and W. R. Shanks complimented the reader, and generally approved the plea of the paper. Votes of thanks followed.

London: Bermondsey.—The annual meeting of the Port-road congregation was held on Thursday, Feb. 14. The chair was taken by Mr. George Callow, in the place of Mr. John Harrison, who was prevented from being present. Satisfactory reports of progress were presented, and a resolution of thanks to the Provincial Assembly and to Mr. John Harrison, for his constant interest was moved by Mr. Seymour Marks and seconded by Mr. J. Jeffreys. Rev. T. E. M. Edwards replied on behalf of the Assembly, and said they had been greatly cheered by the report of improvement that had lately come to them. It was then moved by Mr. John Jones, and seconded by Mr. A. Crocker, "That the congregation congratulate the minister, Rev. Jesse Hipperson, on the improvements shown in the attendance and the interest taken by the young people." Mr. Hipperson replied, expressing his gratitude for the kindness shown to him and his wife, and for the help of faithful workers attached to the church. A further resolution of thanks to those workers concluded the business, and an enthusiastic meeting was brought to a close.

London: Stamford-street.—(Visit of the Rt. Hon. R. K. Causton, M.P.)—On Monday, Feb. 18, the Rt. Hon. R. K. Causton, M.P., paid a visit to Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel, and occupied the chair at the Ballad Concert given under the direction of Mr. and Mrs. C. W. Hudson. In the course of a short racy speech, Mr. Causton spoke of the pleasure it gave him to come once again amongst his old friends at Stamford-street Chapel, where he was quite sure a splendid work was carried on under the supervision of the Rev. W. Lyddon Tucker. Mr. Causton alluded to the increasing interest which was being taken in mission work by the ladies, and remarked, that for many duties they were much better fitted than gentlemen. He regretted that it was impossible for him to stay till the conclusion of the programme, as he had to get back to the House of Commons to be present at an important division, but he assured his audience that should he again be asked to take the chair he would endeavour to remain with them throughout the whole evening. The Rev. W. L. Tucker, in proposing a vote of thanks to Mr. Causton for his kindness in being present that evening, remarked that the keen interest shown by him in all matters connected with the welfare of the Borough of Southwark, had endeared him to the hearts of all his constituents, to whatever political party they belonged. They all congratulated Mr. Causton on the honour conferred on him by the Prime Minister in selecting him for the important post of His Majesty's Paymaster-General, and they all hoped that he would live long to fill the office. The concert then proceeded, and was greatly enjoyed, as the Popular Concerts at Stamford-street always are.

Newcastle-on-Tyne.—Mr. John Henry Slater, who, after a long and painful illness, passed away on Friday, Feb. 15, in his thirtieth year, was in his boyhood a scholar in the Sunday-school of the Church of the Divine Unity, and afterwards became a teacher. For some time he acted as treasurer, while his father, Mr. Charles M. Slater, was superintendent. The funeral service at Jesmond Old Cemetery on Monday was conducted by the Rev. W. H. Lambelle, an old friend of the family, in the presence of a large number of friends.

Preston.—The annual congregational party was held on Monday evening, February 11, and about 130 sat down to tea. At the subsequent meeting, Councillor Parkinson took the chair, and said it was the largest meeting he had known at the church. The Rev. Charles Travers, in a review of the past year, spoke with much satisfaction of the healthy condition of the congregation, and urged the importance of the Sunday School. Councillor Rawsthorn dwelt upon the great end of religion as the deepening and strengthening of their moral and spiritual life, and Mr. Crookall spoke on behalf of the school. Mr. W. Haslam, J.P., moved, and Mr. F. Chadderton seconded, a vote of thanks to the chairman. In the annual report the committee stated that the year 1906 had been one of persistent and harmonious effort, with very gratifying results. Mention was made of the fact that the alterations had cost over £900, of which sum £200 had been borrowed. The total income for the year was £612, including £272 on the building fund. As compared with 1903, there had been an increase on chapel income account of over £60. The number of members was 123.

Southend-on-Sea.—The annual meeting of the congregation was held on Wednesday evening, Feb. 13. In the unavoidable absence through indisposition of Mr. John Harrison, of London, the chair was taken by Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, who was supported by Rev. Frederic Allen, Rev. F. Summers, Professor P. N. Chatterjee, M.A., Mr. Delta Evans, Mr. T. Sloman (treasurer), and Mr. M. J. Frankland (secretary). The secretary's report stated, that at the end of October last, Mr. Evans having completed his twelve months' engagement as their minister, the committee had passed a unanimous resolution of thanks to him for his services, and earnestly requesting him to continue his oversight of the church for another year. Mr. Evans had replied that, as he felt the strain of the work almost too much for him in addition to his ordinary business, he did not think he could tie himself down for a whole year, but was willing to stay on for a time. Heartly thanks were accorded to Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence, Bart., Miss Emily Sharpe, Mr. John Harrison, and the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and others, for financial help to carry on the work; also for lectures and pulpit service during the year to Principal Gordon, Professor Sen, Dr. Ghosh, Revs. Dr. Mummery, T. E. M. Edwards, John Page Hopps, L. Jenkins Jones, Messrs. H. G. Chancellor, W. J. Clarke, and George Ward. The financial statement, which was considered eminently satisfactory, showed that whereas twelve months ago there was an old debt of £20 owing to the treasurer, that had now been wiped off; £50 had been paid for a new pipe organ: all the general expenses had been met, and there was a balance in hand of £4 14s. 2d. The treasurer added that never had they had such a prosperous year before. Of course this was mainly due to the success of the bazaar held last spring, and the generosity of outside friends. The officers and committee were re-elected. Capital speeches were made by the chairman, Revs. F. Allen, F. Summers, and Professor Chatterjee, A programme of music was then gone through, under the genial chairmanship of Mr. Summers, Mr. Edwards having had to leave to catch a train. On the motion of the minister, cordial thanks were passed to the friends from London and those who had contributed to the enjoyment of the evening.

Torquay.—The visit of the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, who took the morning service on Sunday, Feb. 10, and spoke on "The Bible To-day," was much appreciated. There was a large and attentive congregation.

To understand any man, we must have sympathy for him, even affection. No intellectual acuteness, no amount even of pity for his errors, will enable us to see the man from within, and put our own souls into the place of his soul. To do that, one must have passed more or less through his temptations, doubts, hunger of heart and brain.—Charles Kingsley.

SLEEP rests and restores the body to a fuller and fresher life. Christ would not have called death sleep merely because of its external likeness. His thought struck deeper than that; he meant that death does for us what sleep does for the body; repairs, invigorates, and repeats for us the morning of life.—T. T. Munger.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

SATURDAY this week, that is to-day, is the decisive day of battle for London, in the County Council election. It will be most lamentable if, through any neglect to vote, the forces of progress should suffer even a partial defeat. Calumny has been busily at work. The more determined must every citizen be, who desires to promote the well-being of this vast community, to do his duty at the poll.

The terrible catastrophe which befell the G.E.R. steamer Berlin on the morning of Thursday week, at the Hook of Holland, actually at the entrance to the harbour, comes very close home to those who have frequently cross by that route. Profound sympathy with those who are mourning for the victims of the wreck, both passengers and crew, mingles with admiration for the endurance of the little remnant that was ultimately saved, and especially of the three women who passed two nights in that dreadful plight, and no less for the noble courage and persistence of the men who at last effected the rescue;

Mr. McKenna's Education Bill dealing with "Special Religious Instruction" is now before us. Its intention is to relieve the scruples of Passive Resisters, and it attempts this by directing that, while the local authority shall pay in full the salaries of teachers in non-provided schools who have given this special religious instruction, the managers of these schools shall repay one-fifteenth of the salary to the local authority. The proportion named is considered roughly equivalent, on the average, to the time taken for direct denominational education. Those who favour the Bill do so because it will prevent the use of the rates to support Sectarian teaching; and though other grievances remain unredressed, such as the continuance of tests for teachers and the denial of full public control, the removal of one grievance is better than the removal of none.

On the other hand, the Bill is regarded as unsatisfactory by others besides the clergy and their friends, whether Anglican or Roman Catholic. These latter, of course, protest against being made to pay for special denominational teaching, while the "Cowper-Temple" Bible teaching, which they say is equivalent to Nonconformist teaching, is to be given freely in provided schools. But strong criticism has been already expressed by such Liberal educationists as Mr. Hirst Hollowell and Lord Stanley of Alderley. Lord Stanley urges that the crux of the situation is public management. The local authority should not be called upon to pay for what it does not control. In his opinion the intention of the Bill can easily be evaded, should it be passed; and it is clear that, simple as it looks, the measure will undergo stormy discussion.

MR. G. CHESTERTON devoted a column of Monday's Daily News, under the heading "A Book of the Day," to a characteristic notice of the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas's little book on "A Free Catholic Church," concerning which Mr. Freeston wrote in these columns last week. "If the men of the New Theology," says Mr. Chesterton, "desire a clear and intelligent book, a book maintaining much of their position, but maintaining it with an almost antiquated clarity and courage, they could get nothing better than this book. With much of the ultimate drift of it I cannot myself agree; but differences from its matter are almost swallowed up in my primary approval of its manner. Mr. Lloyd Thomas has all the real scholarly independence and the real spiritual sense of honour which was the glory of the great Unitarians."

A SERIES of articles by Mr. G. R. Sims, in the Tribune has been attracting a good deal of attention, and the subject is certainly one of the gravest importance, namely, the ruin and destruction of young children, due to the haunting of the public-house by their mothers. When, as is so often the case, they are accompanied by their offspring, the evil is manifold. Often the children are given poison to drink, or, at any rate, they are accustomed to the bad surroundings, and as is well known the air of the public-house is itself a menace to health. The question is to be followed up in a conference at the Tribune Rendezvous next Monday evening, to be presided over by Sir Thomas Barlow. The subject is strictly limited to the one point, and it is proposed to get an expression of opinion in favour of a Bill in Parliament to abate the evil. Among the responses to the Tribune's invitation was one from Dr. Carpenter, Principal of Manchester College, Oxford, who wrote: "I am convinced of the urgent need of raising the age at which young persons shall be served with intoxicating drink in ordinary public-houses or beer-houses. The question must be kept constantly before public attention, and every effort made to support an effective demand for further legislation."

EXETER HALL is no longer to be the familiar temple of "May Meetings." Whether its name will continue is uncertain, but its function as a place of secular entertainment will take from it the peculiar interest so long attached to the big and dingy meeting-place of innumerable philanthropic and religious associations. The announcement comes almost as a shock to our sense of security and permanence. It sounds like the closing of an era. But, perhaps, to our readers there is no shock; if so, that only the more emphasises the change. People, chapel folks as well as others, now flock to London in the evening for varied places of amusement. Time was not very long ago when, for large circles of the religious public, a concert hall, to say nothing of a theatre, was taboo; while a music hall was a term of vague reproach for an unimagined worldliness. Then Exeter Hall was an excitement as well as a pilgrimage, to which people resorted early in the morning provided with crochet materials and sandwiches. The long, long meetings were an event in many lives.

WE do not forget the Sacred Harmonic Concerts. These were also held at Exeter Hall, and many middle-class families from the suburban chapels attended these concerts because they were given in that Exeter Hall, which was to them a place of quasi-sacred memory. There they might go without offence—there, but there only.

Then an exception was made in favour of sacred oratorio at Albert Hall, and so the process continued.

LEAVING Exeter Hall the Y.M.C.A. is to have a magnificent new building in Tottenham Court-road. It is to be a memorial to the late Sir George Williams, with whose name the Association has been so very intimately connected. One feature of the new building is to be the provision of about 300 bedrooms to be let at 5s. a week. They are intended to serve the use of some of the 15,000 lads who every year come up from the country and find a difficulty in obtaining lodgings. The George Williams Memorial will be quite near to the renovated Whitefield's Tabernacle, and it remains to be seen whether its competition will be adversely felt by Mr. Sylvester Horne and his colleagues. We know that the institutional work carried on at Whitefield's has seriously affected similar efforts made in at least one neighbouring church.

THE following interesting note, under the heading "Religion in Business," appears in the Chicago Unity of January 31. It is the substance of a leaflet which gives the matter in four languages, for the employees of the Bourne Mills, Fall River, Mass., and is issued by the treasurer:

"You will receive herewith the thirty-fourth semi-annual dividend upon wages. Profit sharing will be continued another six months. I feel myself happy to congratulate you upon the recent advance in wages, which placed Fall River again upon record as paying the highest wages known to the cotton industry in all the world. I sincerely hope there may never be another reduction of wages here. There ought not to be. The business should be adjusted to this schedule.

"I trust this may be the merriest Christmas ever known here. May all try together, manufacturers and operatives, to make Fall River the most attractive spot on earth for textile wage-earners. Having this thought in mind, the board of directors of the Bourne Mills have unanimously authorised me to announce to you the experiment of a vacation week in August, 1907. While I have not made it a habit to take vacations myself (except a short trip to Europe in 1900), I can see that in these strenuous days it is becoming more and more a wholesome practice.

"The mills will close Saturday noon, August 24, and reopen Tuesday morning, September 3, allowing you ten days of rest and recreation.

"In lieu of regular pay, the directors have also unanimously authorised me to offer you an extra dividend upon your wages, payable just before the vacation, to the amount of 50 per cent. of average weekly wages earned by each one of you, computed from the record of your wages during the present profit-sharing term closing next June.

"Like all our dividends upon wages, the August vacation dividend will be paid to you upon the single condition of continuous faithful service. It will be in addition to the regular Fourth of July dividend."

THERE is no service like his that serves because he loves.—Sir Philip Sidney.

TOWARDS SOCIAL REFORM.

COLLECTIVE OWNERSHIP: ITS ETHICAL SIGNIFICANCE.

THE point I indicated, rather than laboured, in my previous letter was that, as municipal management inevitably drifts into the hands of autocratic officials, imperfectly supervised by elected representatives of increasingly restricted capacity, the supposition that such control would be better than that of private enterprise is manifestly unsound. Mr. Edwards fails to understand this, but Mr. Solly has found that private benevolence is killed by State action. It follows that, if the field of State or Municipal enterprise be widened, similar causes will multiply officials and still further limit ability in positions of control until the whole nation is divided into two classes—the more or less inefficient Governors and the Governed; and, before long, the latter would find that they toiled only for the benefit of the former. That this is so follows from the ordinary workings of human nature, and may be seen exemplified in the pages of history, a sadly neglected study. Ancient Peru afforded, I believe, the most perfect example of a State entirely organised on socialistic lines. Regulations, meant for the good of all, resulted in the officials becoming tyrants, so that the enslaved people despairingly welcomed Cortes as a deliverer. Equally, when I said that the bureaucrat is necessarily sterile, I expressed what is historically true, and what also follows from the situation. Given a man appointed to administer certain duties in a prescribed way, obliged to please those set over him, and equally obliged to keep those below him to their defined tasks, a mere link in a chain, he must soon become merely a part of a machine whose wheels run in the grooves of routine, and, if he is proud of his work (as Mr. Edwards triumphantly quotes) he comes to believe that that work, his office, and he the official, are the main objects of the State, and the people whose affairs he can influence mere pawns in the game. This, again, is the inevitable sequence of the working of human nature. We find it in history, and can see it in those countries where the bureaucratic system is more firmly established than in England; but even in England those who have had business with municipal committees or officials, or Government Departments, will have often noticed tendencies in that direction.

That Mr. Edwards adduces minor improvements made by Government employees to show that bureaucrats are not sterile, shows only that he has no sense of proportion. It would be more to the purpose if I told him how Sir W. Preece, the eminent electrician in the service of the Post Office, years ago sent messages across the Bristol Channel by induced currents (without wires), and no practical advantages resulted. It was reserved for Marconi, youthful and unaided, to invent wireless telegraphy and make it generally useful. Mr. Edwards proposed to disprove my view of free competition, but, instead, of doing so, presents only lurid assertions of his own which are entirely arbitrary and unprovable. In his letter, declamation takes the place of reasoning and facts wear new faces. He speaks of private employers discharging their workmen when they have no work for them, but forgets that the State must at times do the same, as at Woolwich recently. Yet even the most advanced socialist would not argue that the South African war should have been kept going indefinitely in order to provide work for artisans at Woolwich.

The conditions of employment vary, and must vary everywhere and always, with the ever-varying requirements of mankind, the seasons and the harvests. No officials can be wise or capable enough to forecast these or to evade their effects. On the contrary, rash interference only aggravates unavoidable evils. This also we may learn from the pages of history. "Socialism," quotes Mr. Edwards, "maintains that industrial operation should be made subservient to human good." Precisely. The individualists say that that is what takes place now, so far as the arena is left open to the free play of competitive influences, which words are the economic expression of the law which runs through the world—"the survival of the fittest." Given a fair field and no favour, those things which are not subservient to human good must disappear. Only, people must be left free to judge for themselves what they consider to be to their own human good. No official can do it half so well for them. If, after reading Mr. Edwards' letter, we look round and see that there is far more generally diffused wealth, comfort, health, ease, morality, and of all else that is good everywhere, and far less crime, poverty, suffering, disease and other evil things than ever before, we must conclude that Mr. Edwards has made a mistake, and that Individualism is not a ghastly failure after all, but a well-tried friend, worth keeping.

One difficulty in arguing on Socialism is that so many call themselves Collectivists or Socialists only because they would like to see social conditions better than they are, without having realised all that Socialism implies, and without having studied serious works on the subject; hence their views are vague and shifting. A really Socialistic State would be an organisation covering, directing, and limiting all the most trivial as well as the most important details and events in the daily life of all men and women, and inevitably reducing all things to a dead level of drab monotony. If any doubt this, it can only be because they have not thought the matter out. Yet it can be made clear easily enough. If, for instance, the State is to find employment and subsistence for every man and woman, it must necessarily appoint to each his particular place and function in the social organism. No individual preferences could be allowed to interfere with the smooth working of the whole scheme. But, as places and functions are not unlimited, it follows that the State must be able to regulate the number, character, and position of its citizens.

Mr. Solly's remarks on competition show how great is the influence which words have even on the best minds. Since Carlyle presented it in ugly guise, well-intentioned reformers have always spoken of competition as the evil thing; yet, as I have said, it is but the equivalent of Nature's law, and, if we postulate a beneficent Deity, that law must be good. If there were no competition, all progress could only be at the pace of the slowest. Mr. Solly has the remedy in his own hands—let him persuade people to become Christians. When they are that, they will hold all things in common, as of old, and there will not be any need for legislation. But the reform must come from within, not from without. It is precisely because our spiritual guides, clerical and lay, have, on the whole, been unsuccessful, that so many of them look longingly to the State to come and help. It was the same feeling which drove the Church in the fifteenth century to appeal to the Secular arm. In those days it was thought that soundness of theological opinions was essential, and the heretics were burned for the good of their souls and those of others.

As opinions became less important, morality advanced to the front. Preachers preached it, and turned to Parliament to enforce it. They do so still. But a later school has arisen which preaches comfort, and, too, calls for State help. Men are losing their hold on the next world, so, not unnaturally, try to make the most of this one; and, therefore, our guides tell us that environment is a necessary modus for moral growth. Their thoughts turn to ease and comfort, which they want the Municipality or State to provide. Work is spoken of as if it were an evil instead of being, as it is, the salt of life. They no longer tell us that we are weak, selfish, indolent, and the rest, but they pat us—that is to say, the greater number of us, the so-called working classes—on the back, and tell us how gentle, good, and patient we are, and how wicked landlords and capitalists wrong us, and that all we need to be happy is to have municipal tramways and the rest.

Kingsley tells of a rustic to whom some one left a pound a week for life. He passed the twenty more years he had of it sitting on a gate smoking. That is not the ideal which has helped the old world along, and most men will prefer to believe that

But iron dug from central gloom,
And heated hot with burning fears,
And dipt in baths of hissing tears,
And battered with the strokes of doom.”

If life were all ease, all certainty, all arranged for us, such as Socialists would have it, what need for souls? We should be as happy as are the beasts of the field.

Mr. Millin speaks scathingly of Socialists who would deprive an inventor of encouragement or reward, which he thinks could be easily devised. He forgets that under Socialism all wealth would belong to the State, and that no man could have material advantages over another. It is but another instance of how little Socialists know about Socialism. This is apparent also from the illustrations which they adduce to prove its practicability. Without any exception, they rest their case on the success of the post office and municipal gas, water, and tram schemes; but it does not follow that a Government department could work cotton mills or engineering shops equally well. Indeed, it is known that Government shipyards and the like are surpassed by private enterprise; and the experience of the Wholesale Co-operative Society has shown that success in administration and success in production are not equally at command.

Whether the postal service is a boon for which we owe admiring gratitude to the State, and whether it does more for us than private enterprise would have done, may be learned from history.

Firstly, no State has ever originated an inland postal service. That has always had to be done by private enterprise.

In 1606 Lord Stanhope obtained a patent—that is, a monopoly—for that purpose. In 1626 the Company of Merchant Adventurers received one, and in 1638 Thos. Withering improved the service and extended it to the Continent by contracts with the Count of Thurn and Taxis, whose family started a postal service there in 1560, and maintained it until it was taken over by the Prussian Government in 1867. Stamp collectors will remember the Thurn and Taxis Stamps.

It was not until 1657 that the Government undertook the monopoly, charging twopence for a letter conveyed eighty miles.

Meantime, J. Hill, a York attorney, had placed post horses between York and London, and attempted to introduce a penny post for all England, but the State (!) had stopped him, as it stopped, in 1688, T. Dockwra, who established a penny post for London, with seven sorting and four or five hundred collecting offices, and ten deliveries a day; and Thomas Povey, who established a halfpenny post in London in 1697. When, in 1782, Thos. Palmer started mail coaches for the safer and speedier conveyance of letters, the State officials pertinaciously opposed him, maintaining that the existing system was all but perfect (which is characteristic of the attitude of officials towards all change, then and now, as it always must be). The Post Office was finally constituted a Government department in the reign of Queen Anne, but the public did not get a penny postage until two hundred years after Hill attempted it, at his own risk, and Londoners have not got a halfpenny letter post yet, more than two hundred years after Thos. Povey established it and was stopped by the State. Even now the much-vaunted State Post Office depends almost wholly on private enterprise railways to carry its letters, and could do nothing without them. Water supply also owes its birth and development to private enterprise. A Dutchman—Peter Moris—started the first waterworks in London in 1582; and when Hugh Myddelton, in 1612, had spent his means in bringing water from the New River, King James had to come to his aid, for the City Corporation considered the scheme unnecessary.

Gas lighting was, of course, invented by a mere individual, who got no State aid, but much hindrance. The marvellous profits which municipalities are supposed to derive from gas manufacture are produced by the sale of gas tar to German aniline manufacturers. When, under Socialism, the demand for bright colours and other tar products ceases, the profits on gas making will cease also.

Corporations which owned gasworks hindered the introduction of electric lighting, and the State hindered that and the introduction of electric trams by penalising private enterprise to favour municipalisation. Thus, knowing the past, we may forecast the future.

RICHARD SIMON.

Nottingham, Feb. 19, 1907.

SIR,—I am sorry if I hurt Mr. Rawlins by what he refers to as an “accusation of ignorance,” but I cannot think that in pointing out what he seemed to be unaware of I exceeded the bounds of “legitimate debate.” I said that he assumed a sudden and universal subversion of our social and commercial fabric because he urged objections to any Socialist advance that could not possibly arise apart from such subversion. When he referred to Socialist failures in France and America, surely there was nothing illegitimate in pointing out that there was a splendid Socialist success in front of his own house of which he seemed all unaware. Even now he apparently cannot see that roads are a development of Socialism. He says that I quite ignore the fact that roads are originally made by private enterprise and capital. Well, they generally are. But the reason of it is, of course, that at present nearly all houses are built by private enterprise, and some sort of road must necessarily be made before the building can be commenced. Society has already made advances in the Socialist direction by regulating the width of roads and controlling many of the details in the building of houses, and it has begun to build them outright. When the community builds whole streets—as it has actually begun to do in London—it will, of course, make the roadways from the outset; but they will be no more Socialistic than they are now when they are taken over, as they practically always are. The point Mr. Rawlins says I ignore does not in the least affect the matter.

Mr. Shaen Solly says that the public road is an example, not of Socialism, but of Communism. It is astonishing that there should be so much confusion of thought on the distinction between “Collectivism,” and “Socialism,” and “Communism,” or what is supposed to be the distinction. “Collectivism” and “Socialism” are merely two words for the same thing—working together, by common means, for the common good. “Communism” is Socialism in its fullest development. How far we can attain to that ultimate development or how far it is desirable to do so, is, and always must be, a matter for consideration as we advance. It depends on circumstances. In our roadways we have pushed our Socialism to the point of absolute Communism. They are maintained at the common expense and are free to everybody without any direct payment. There are many reasons why our water supply should be placed on the same footing, and some day there can be no doubt everybody will be as free to use water as everybody is now to walk in the street. Our present system is an intermediate one. It demands payment calculated on a rough estimation of supply. That is Socialism that has not yet advanced to the Communistic stage, though there would be no difficulty in making the advance tomorrow if we cared to do it. Municipal tramways are in the same intermediate stage, and perhaps when people live in a less feverish condition of hurry and worry and come to a more intelligent understanding of the conditions of health and the value of walking as a means of promoting it, it may be possible to communalise the tram services and to add free rides to free roads. In the gradual reduction of fares we are clearly approaching this, but as long as everybody is in a hurry and everybody is tired, and everybody will eagerly take everything he can get for nothing, it will be impracticable to abolish fares, because the existing tram service would be simply swamped and overwhelmed.

Mr. Rawlins quotes from Mr. Edwards's article of the 26th ult., and says I contradict him. "The ethical basis of Collectivism," says Mr. Edwards, "regards the personal gain of the individual as an incidental and secondary good. It aims only indirectly at the benefit of the individual." Well, we shall never attain to that ethical attitude by the mad scramble of competition; but it would be downright good Christianity if we could get to it, and as the far-away ultimate issue of a well-ordered social system it looks to me to be far more probable than the slavery with which Mr. Rawlins threatens us. We may hope that society will attain to that in the end—every man for the public good first, and for his own interests only secondarily and indirectly; but I still maintain that under existing conditions no rational Socialist would think of so applying his principles as to deprive the inventor of all personal motive for inventing. It is not necessary, and it would not be common sense, and if any "Joint Committee of Socialist Bodies"—whoever they may be—say that "municipalisation can be accepted as Socialism only on condition of its forming a part of national and international Socialism," all I can say is that they are talking nonsense. Why should so acute and clever a man as Mr. Rawlins allow his thinking and writing on social reform to be influenced by such utterances? This pronouncement should to him be obviously untrue. Why should he be the one to urge it against social principles which—however impracticable he may think them—are essentially Christian?

BOYS' BRIGADES.

SIR,—I am anxious to learn of any of our schools and missions up and down the country, in which there exist Boys' Brigades for physical drill and training in first aid, or similar instruction, other than distinctly military exercise; and I shall deem it a great favour if any of my brother ministers, or school superintendents, who have had experience of such, will kindly communicate with me.—CHARLES ROPER.

WHATEVER 'tis good to wish, ask that of Heaven,

Though it be what thou canst not hope to see;

Pray to be perfect, though material heaven

Forbid the spirit so on earth to be:

But if for any wish thou dar'st not pray,
Then pray to God to cast that wish away.

AT THE FEET OF THE CHRIST.

EXTRACT FROM THE "WEISSNIGHTWO ANZEIGER" OF JAN. 2, 1907.

YESTERDAY our representative was permitted the honour of an interview with our venerable chief magistrate, whose long life has witnessed the transformation of our city from what was little better than an unenlightened mediæval town to a prosperous commercial centre of modern life. Remembering how much of this beneficial change has been due to his activity and example, we thought our readers would be interested in any particulars of his career which he might be willing to offer for publication. It is with some hesitation that we have decided to publish the results of this interview, but we have been influenced by the fact that it shows how much superstition and prejudice had to be overcome, even in the case of so enlightened a man, before we could enter on our present path of progress and prosperity. Moreover, from an antiquarian point of view, there is much interest in what he said. Our representative found him alone, as is his custom when not engaged in business or public work, in a well-furnished but somewhat gloomy apartment, on the tables of which lay many statistical and official papers. On the wall hung a single picture, understood to be the portrait of his deceased wife. He seemed to be in his usual remarkable health both of body and of mind. He said:—

"You ask for some details of my life. There is only one that has any real interest. I have always doubted whether it would be wise to say more of it than became public at the time. Now I fear the time has gone by when it could be of any use to do so. I am well aware that my fellow-citizens regard me with much respect on account of my success in business and my public services. They are about to erect a statue of me in the Dom Platz, so that, when the end comes, as it must soon do, my memory may, as they say, be perpetuated as an example to younger men. It is this which decides me to speak now. It may be they will, perhaps wisely, countermand the statue. But no, I think not; they will not sufficiently understand.

"I am, as you know, a Protestant, yet I have always had much sympathy with our Roman Catholic brethren. If we are right in some things, they seem to be so in others. And are we not agreed about the great things, agreed, alas! to profess, not always to perform? I have specially loved our great Cathedral and its solemn services: The great churches beyond the Alps I have not seen; but Köln, Strassburg, Mainz—they are larger, yes, but not more beautiful than ours; and they have no such statue of the Christ: You know it, how it stands by the great pillar at the junction of the north transept and the chancel? A sitting figure, the idea taken, they tell me, from a great picture by Michael Angelo in a chapel in the Vatican, I forget its name—Christ in judgment, stern, threatening. But in our statue, so they say, is something which suggests a tenderness behind, ready to break forth upon him who will submit, which is not in the picture: It may be so. I do not know the picture; but I know our Christ: I know his majesty and sternness. I have sometimes thought I saw his tenderness, but that was long ago.

"In my younger days 'Our Christ' played a great part in the life of the city. Not often, it is true; but now and again his presence was felt with strange power among us. That is long ago, forty years since the last time. You will not remember; most men have forgotten.

"Always the great west door stood open day and night. It is so still. They would have closed it at nights long ago, but that I have prevented. Why, I hardly know, for surely it is all past history now. Such things have ceased to happen.

"An ancient superstition which cost the lives of many unfortunate people," so writes the latest historian of our city. We did not think so in my youth. You will know the story. How from time to time in the early morning hours one would be found lying dead at the feet of the Christ—sometimes of the poor and humble, sometimes of the rich or distinguished classes, more often women than men. Yet always we deemed it well with such, for we believed of them these two things, that they had been sinners (in that not greatly differing from the rest of us), and that they had submitted and found peace. For, even as the cold form was lifted from the marble floor, there was upon the face a look of youth and peace.

"Death came not to all who lay at the feet of the Christ. Now and again a great and sudden change would come over one of the citizens. His manner of life would be altered. He no longer sought wealth or honours. Content with what he had, he would devote himself to some manner of quiet service of his fellow men. On his face would come something of the look of those who had died at the feet of the Christ. None ever told, but we knew that such also had lain there. To Catholic and Protestant alike it might come, and when it had come, behold! he seemed to be neither Catholic nor Protestant any more, but to have passed out of himself and beyond both. Such was our ancient superstition. No doubt, no doubt, we are wiser now.

"Forty years ago I was already a rich man. I was also a public man, and had filled many offices in the city. Into business I had put my strength and wits, and had reaped a large reward. It is not difficult if you will have it so and are not a fool. Yet none has accused me of dishonesty. They could not. Who more than I has been the cause of our extended commerce, our new industries, our growing wealth? In that and in my growing honours I was almost wholly absorbed. Yes, they will do well to erect the statue. Have I not given my life? I grew steadily to a point. What should come next? They say you must either continue to grow or begin to decline, grow better or worse: I doubt it. It seems to me that where I was then, there I am now. I was rich, powerful, respected, not much loved, I think. Now I am indeed richer, more powerful, more respected—not more loved. But in all this is no growth, I think.

"Did I say not much loved? Let me qualify that. By one I was tenderly loved. The world has forgotten my wife. She left no children to keep her memory green. That is her portrait, but you do not see the soul in the face, and she kept her soul alive. To her the growing wealth and dignity brought little satisfaction. She would say that it was taking possession of us and would strangle our life—that we must move on to higher planes of life. Ever she tried to win me to some change, but always sweetly and tenderly. I could not then understand her—can only dimly do so now. Slowly we grew more and more apart, notwithstanding our love, which no quarrel ever defaced. I thank God for that. He knows I loved her to the end, and do so still. Yet I knew she was inevitably moving from me, in spite of all her wish to help and cherish me. I think we shall scarcely meet again, the distance is too great. Yet the door still stands open:

“So it was forty years ago. On the last day of the year I had been chosen for the chief magistracy; in the morning I was to be formally installed in that office which I have ever since held. All day my mind had been full of affairs. When night came I felt myself too fatigued and excited to rest. I scarcely noticed the absence of my wife. It was so common for her to be summoned away on some errand of mercy while I was occupied in business details. I went out into the night, and soon found myself in the Dom Platz.

“That was before the days of electricity and trams. In winter time the Platz would often at a quite early hour be very dark and still. So it was then. The snow lay deep upon the ground. It whitened the gabled roofs and cornices of the old houses, and picked out the buttresses and corbels of the great towers of the Cathedral. The frost was keen. A full moon shone brightly in the south. Now and then an occasional wind moaned rather sadly among the spires and pinnacles overhead.

“The great west door stood, as usual, wide open, looking like the entrance to a gloomy vault, save that far away up the nave a shaft of moonlight, piercing the window of the south transept, lay aslant the darkness:

“It was not any doubt about my life or the wisdom or rightness of it that drew me within; little more, I think, than a vague curiosity. Yet, as I passed up the long nave, a sense of something about to happen, of an impending crisis, grew upon me: Was I to witness one of those strange events? Was I perhaps to be myself summoned by the Christ? But no, there I felt secure. My path was too clearly marked out for me, notwithstanding what she felt about it. Then I fell to musing about my future. I would do more to win her sympathy, more to make her happy in this life which opened so full of promise before me: It could not really be incompatible with hers. More money to do good with should be hers, in my new position more opportunities of doing it. I had much faith in money. Yes, she would come to see the wisdom of it all yet. So thinking, I reached the last pillar in the nave on the south, and stood looking across the moonlit space beneath the open lantern, which rose high into the darkness above my head.

“There was the Christ, and, as I gazed upon the figure, a feeling of relief came upon me, for no impulse drew me to its feet: The call was not to me. I, at any rate, stood free from this delusion: Why, I thought, should such a call come to anyone? Should I not use my new influence to prevent the possibility of it in the future? Even as I thought thus there returned upon me a sense of oppression and fear. From above my head in the great darkness there seemed to come low sounds as of birds moving softly to and fro; and, looking up, faint flashes of light seemed to break the gloom. Presences of some kind were surely there: With an effort I turned to go, and then stopped suddenly, for far down near the open door I saw the faint outlines of a figure moving slowly up the central aisle. Nearer and nearer it came, until, just as I had resolved to remain and deliver this poor victim from the impending fate, it moved forward into the moonlight, and I beheld my wife. Ah, God! my wife!

“I started forward, and at the sound she turned towards me with a look of infinite tenderness and yearning. Then, with a look I knew so well, she held out to me one hand, just as in the early days when we wandered among the mountains it had been her habit by a gesture to invite me to clasp her hand in mine and run lightly side by side down some flowery slope. It was not necessary she should speak; only too well I knew that now she would have me join her at the feet of the Christ, and my choice was already, was irrevocably, made. For a minute she stood mutely pleading, while I, frozen into silence, made no sign or movement. Then slowly she let fall her hand, turned away her sweet face, surely none has ever been so sweet! and moved on.

“Then I moved also, determined to draw her away; but again she stopped and turned towards me with a different look. I saw that she knew my purpose and forbade it, and I dared not disobey. That strange power, too weak to draw myself, was strong enough to hold me from her. I knew that already she had passed beyond my reach, that the irrevocable had come to pass: Slowly she knelt before that awful figure, bowing her gracious head. Then, as she knelt and I stood powerless, the moon passed behind a cloud, darkness filled the place, and out of it I heard for the last time her beloved voice: ‘O my love, farewell! and now, go!’ And, blind and stumbling, I made my way out of the great west door.

“The next day she was found dead at the feet of the Christ, and I became chief magistrate of this city: Forty years have passed, and none have died there since: Yet the door still stands open.

“That is the event of my life; there is nothing else that matters: Tell it, if you will.”

Such was the strange story of our venerable chief, on which we do not think it well to offer any further comments of our own.

FROM THE “WEISSNICH TWO ANZEIGER”
OF JAN. 3, 1907:

It is with the deepest regret that we have to record the recrudescence amongst us of a most painful form of superstition, and that in a most unexpected quarter. Early this morning our much respected chief magistrate was found dead in the Cathedral at the feet of the well-known image of Christ. Dressed in his official robes, he was found lying full length on the marble pavement, with his arms extended, and his long white hair flowing on the ground: In one hand was clasped a small miniature portrait of a remarkably beautiful woman. His face, save for the white hair, seemed to have become singularly young, and to have lost much of the sternness which was so characteristic of it:

We forbear all personal comments, especially in view of the singular interview with him reported by us yesterday. But we shall, we are sure, be only voicing the general feeling of the city in demanding that something be done to prevent such occurrences in future. It is, we suppose, too much to expect that the Cathedral authorities will remove this painful statue, which is so completely out of harmony with modern sentiment; but at least steps may be taken to prevent access to it except at stated hours, and under proper supervision.

SUNDAY SCHOOL REFORM.*—I.

PROFESSOR PEAKE’S book grows out of a controversy with which we have no immediate concern, since it is of the nature of a family disagreement next door: Rather more than a year since, Mr. Peake addressed to the Primitive Methodist Leader a series of articles criticising the International Lessons so largely used in orthodox Nonconformist Sunday-schools: Correspondence followed, and “Reform in Sunday-school Teaching,” which contains the Leader articles in an expanded and revised form, is the result. The criticism of the International Lessons—a criticism directed mainly against their snippy character and the “incoherent knowledge” which they foster—is interesting and suggestive even to those, like ourselves, who do not use them; and something may be said later on of these Lessons: But the opening chapter of the book on “The Task of the Sunday-school,” and the three closing chapters, take a wider range, and are of real value to all Sunday-school teachers:

Mr. Peake says he writes the book “from an urgent conviction that the intelligent hold of the next generation on Christianity depends largely on the reform of our Sunday-school teaching.” He touches on the deficiencies in secular teaching with the remark: “The test of successful education is that, after a boy has been working at a subject for several years, he should be able to show some adequate result for it: After all the years spent in the Sunday-school, to say nothing of the numerous sermons they have been forced to hear, what have our young people to show for it?” What ought to be the outcome is summarised under three heads:—

- (1) A clear and definite apprehension of what Christianity means:
- (2) A reason for the faith that is in them:
- (3) Instruction in the Bible:

On all these points the writer has things brief but wise to say. Thus, on (1): “I am not, of course, pleading for such a training as is given to the ministry, but

*“Reform in Sunday-school Teaching.” By A. S. Peake, M.A., B.D., Dean of the Faculty of Theology in the University of Manchester (James Clarke & Co. 1s. 6d.)

I do plead for something that shall be systematic and precise. It is undesirable that the fundamental tenets of religion should be learnt at haphazard, out of connection with each other, and in a very crude and undigested form. We should consider it the primary duty incumbent upon us to instruct our children in Christianity as we understand it. Let us see that they are able to give an intelligent account of the leading principles of the Gospel, instead of a bald caricature, marked alike by inaccuracy and disproportion." And on (2): "Let them see that their religion can be defended on grounds of reason, and is not merely to be based on authority or the prescription conferred by long possession. If a man fails to understand the Gospel, he cannot enter into the fulness of its enjoyment; and if he does not know how to defend it, there is a peril that it may be wrested from him." As to Biblical instruction, "The Bible is a vast literature, and at best only a beginning can be made." There are "essential things that ought not to be neglected. . . . Assured results ought not to be ignored. . . . It is not the latest novelties, but well-tested conclusions which have been accepted by the vast majority of scholars, that ought to be set before our young people. We pay too high a price for traditional views when we make our children bankrupt in faith." But, "while Biblical criticism is important . . . we should not overrate its importance or put our emphasis in the wrong place." Another point insisted on is that "the children should have an outline of the leading events in Hebrew history arranged in chronological order and dated"; so that they may be saved from "a confused jumble in their minds," of which jumble pathetic instances are given.

Our author goes on to remark that it seems to him "a matter of great moment that our young people should be familiar, in its main outlines, with the growth of the religion of Israel, and it is still more necessary that they should understand the various types of teaching in the New Testament. . . . A sense of the Bible as a whole ought to be given to our children, and," says Professor Peake, "I rank that as second only to the importance of the understanding of Christianity and a knowledge of the lines on which its defence should be conducted. But there is one thing more which I feel sure that we should aim at in the religious teaching of our young people. We ought so to teach the Bible as to create an enthusiasm for it. . . . Viewed simply as literature, it must always rank as one of the world's great classics, and many may be won to love it through a feeling for its literary qualities who would not be attracted by its religious and moral teaching. It is a great thing to get them to love the Bible for any reason; if they begin with appreciation of it as literature, we may trust that by-and-by they will be aroused to a sense of its value for religion. To make it distasteful to them is the worst service that the Sunday-school can render."

Starting from these principles, Professor Peake—one of the gentlest and most courteous of men, as well as one of the most accomplished of modern Biblical scholars of the broad orthodox type—proceeds to criticise very effectively in his three following chapters the method and the details of the International Lessons. The general schemes for successive years seem to him badly chosen in their relation to each other, and the detailed working out is open to constant objection. Some of the selected passages are too long for one lesson, others are too short; for no obvious reason, some fine passages are excluded altogether. And the result is confusion in the mind of the scholar, while he misses the sense of unity. If he learnt English history on the same principles, "he would begin with the story of Julius Caesar's landing in Britain. In all probability he would not learn whether the invasion had any consequence or not, because the next lesson he would have would be on King Alfred and the cakes. From this he would pass to the story of the Norman Conquest, and the next thing he would learn would be the story of Henry I., who 'never smiled again.' From this he would skip to the story of Richard and Blondel, and then to King John's treatment of Arthur, though probably he would learn nothing of Magna Charta. . . . We cannot, indeed, be sure that he would get to know anything about the English Reformation, but he would probably learn that Mary expected that after she was dead Calais would be found written on her heart. But what kind of knowledge of English history would such a course give? The sense of it as a great connected movement, as a mighty development, would be absolutely wanting, and even the very stories the boy was supposed to learn would lose half their meaning from his ignorance of their historical setting. Moreover, to make the parallel complete, we should have to assume that not merely were the stories chosen quite disconnected, but that many of them were only half told." Yet with all these faults, Mr. Peake regards "the International system as, on the whole, a large improvement on older methods," although "these methods, in the hands of a judicious teacher, had this advantage, that the amount of text read was very much greater." There is much more of detailed criticism of the International Lessons into which we must not enter. The interest for us of all this earlier part of the book lies in the questions which it suggests as to our own Sunday-school methods. Probably not many of our schools have ever had for any length of time anything half as systematic as the International Lessons of our orthodox friends, and it is not disrespectful to say that in many of our scholars we might find instances of fragmentary and incoherent knowledge. The reasons why we should desire our young people to be well grounded in Bible history and Christian doctrine are not, perhaps, exactly the same as those which Professor Peake sets forth; but do we not feel that our young people would gain immensely alike in sympathetic understanding of religious and doctrinal truths, and in personal religion, if we could steadily set ourselves to teach them on different lines from those which we usually adopt? I, who write these things, have by no means always done what, as I have read Professor Peake's book, I feel I ought to have done. In a second paper

I hope to gather some further wise counsel from his pages, and to suggest some matters for our practical consideration.

SHORT NOTICES:

The Schoolmasters' Year Book and Directory, 1907, is the fifth annual edition of this admirable reference book of secondary education in England and Wales. "The hubbub of our sterile politics continued . . . our secondary instruction is still the chaos it was," is an apt quotation from Matthew Arnold at the beginning of the Introduction, referring to the educational history of 1906, and the summary of the Parliamentary year, having given an elaborate account of the progress of the Education Bill, closes with a significant note of its rejection by the House of Lords on December 19. At the end of the first part of general information there is an interesting list of Foreign Holiday Courses, with particulars as to cost, &c. Then follows the Schoolmasters' Directory, and the list of Secondary Schools, in which, under Nantwich, we find Willaston School duly chronicled. "Boys, 25 (all boarders)." (Sonnenschein & Co., 6s. net.)

The Pioneer Biographies of Social Reformers.—The advertised list of these brief biographies contains six names—Holyoake, Kingsley, Mazzini, Owen, Toynbee, J. S. Mill. The idea is a good one, for handy and cheap little summaries of this kind serve a purpose. Elder classes in Sunday-schools, for example, might use them; each scholar having a copy of his own, reading it at home, and coming prepared with thoughts about it. Mr. W. Henry Brown, however, the writer of the first four, should not say that "Robert Owen was the founder of social science in this country" (Socialism would be correct); nor "The atmosphere of the years following Waterloo was sultry (!) with a desire for knowledge and an anxiety for liberty." But he writes with real enthusiasm for his subject, and that is what beginners most need. (C. W. Daniel, 11, Cursitor-street, E.C. 1d. each.)

Synthetica: being Meditations Epistemological and Ontological. By S. S. Laurie, Emeritus Professor of Education in the University of Edinburgh.—These volumes are based on the author's Gifford Lectures, given at the University of Edinburgh. Their main object is to set forth belief in God, Freedom, and Immortality, on the basis of a philosophy true to the traditions of common sense. Unfortunately, Professor Laurie has chosen to clothe his argument in a terminology calculated to "startle even the elect" in the world of metaphysics. The first volume traces the development of knowledge. The second volume unfolds a doctrine of God as the Absolute Being and Infinite Mind "externalising" himself in finite beings, and appearing as the ruling ideal within finite beings. Among the almost innumerable points that might be selected for comment, we can mention only one, arising out of the author's mode of dealing with the problem of evil. "I seem forced," he says, "to the conclusion that God is a Spirit, but a Spirit in difficulties. . . . God Himself, I repeat, is in a difficulty from which He is slowly extricating Himself and us. His life is, in truth, a strenuous life. Every victory we register is a victory for Him. This is not rhetoric. If the One of Being was to pass into the Many of Existence, there was no other way that we can see." The idea seems to be that the "difficulties" are involved in the creative movement as such, not purposed; but that they are not equally eternal with the Divine Being (otherwise there would to all intents and purposes be two gods); they are at length to be swallowed up in victory and ultimate achievement. "If we are not only fellow-workers, but fellow sufferers with God, we then become reconciled with the Universe. We gather ourselves together, and fortify ourselves with a great faith, a generous trust, and a resolute will." This is chiefly interesting as another symptom of the growing recognition that the omnipotence of God, understood as a theological dogma, and taken literally, is of no religious value whatever; it has no place in religious thought. As long as the dogma of creation out of nothing was supposed to have a meaning, the omnipotence of God was a possible conception; but it would seem that the one conception must go along with the other. It has been justly said that "The Almighty" is one of the great words of religion; but its greatness does not lie in its being a precise metaphysical dogma. The "problem of evil," however, is not in any way lessened by this line of thought; it only rises again in another shape. (Longmans & Co., 2 vols., 21s.)

THE UNITARIAN VAN MISSION.

Appointment of the Rev. T. P. Spedding.

SIR,—The experiment made by the Unitarian Van in the North of England during the summer months of 1906 showed that there exists a great opportunity for helpful missionary work in towns and villages where at present there is no Unitarian Church. There are evidently large numbers of men and women all over the country prepared to listen to ministers who will speak about the deep things of religion in a reasonable and reverent spirit. The Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association felt impelled to respond to this new call for missionary work. In order that the work might be energetically and efficiently carried on, the Rev. T. P. Spedding has been appointed "Field Agent," or Missionary of the Association; and his engagement will begin on March 1.

Three new Vans will shortly be built, making four in all. It is proposed that during the present summer two Vans will be engaged in Lancashire, Cheshire, Yorkshire, and the North Midlands; one in the district surrounding London; the fourth in the South of Scotland and the extreme North of England. Other districts will receive attention later.

The Committee would bespeak the sympathy and co-operation of the District

Societies, ministers, members of congregations, and others in this important work. Mr. Spedding will be pleased to give careful consideration to suggestions that are made to him; and he will be ready at all times to render any service in his power in connection with Unitarian Missionary work in any part of the country. On Sundays he will preach as opportunity offers, especially at churches and missionary stations where there is no settled minister.

Mr. Spedding will reside in the Manchester district; for the present his address is 91, Tweedale-street, Rochdale; and it will save time if communications respecting Van Mission work are forwarded to him direct.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

THE TREE.

"Oh! mummy, mummy, do come out!" cried Tommy and Lilian, rushing into the room where their mother sat; "they are felling a tree in the kitchen garden—such fun!"

Mrs. Weldon rose, smiling, and the children hurried her down the garden, each holding one of her hands, and dancing along in great excitement. Smutty, the black kitten, ran after them, for she dearly loved a game in the garden.

Kitson the gardener was aloft in the tree sawing off branches, while another man stood below holding a ladder. A rope was tied near the top of the tree to guide it when it should fall, and Mr. Weldon stood by directing the operations.

Tommy shouted with glee as the great branches fell slowly one by one from the beautiful tree.

"Doesn't Kitson look like a great black rook up there in the tree?" cried he. "Do let me go up and cut off boughs too!"

"You would look like a little robin red-breast up there," said Lilian, in allusion to Tommy's favourite red tie, which, as usual, he had on.

"No, dear," said his mother, "you would only get in Kitson's way. We will just stand here and look on."

Presently Kitson came down and both men began to saw at the root of the tree. Further and further in went the saw, and the children almost held their breath as they watched their father pull at the rope. At length the great tree began to sway slightly, then more and more, until suddenly, with a great crash, it fell heavily to the ground.

"Hurrah! hurrah!" shouted Tommy, but Lilian held fast to her mother's hand and was silent as they went back into the house.

That evening the family party was, as usual, gathered round the fire, on which a log, big enough for yuletide, burned cheerily.

Mr. Weldon was deep in his newspaper, and Tommy lay upon the rug reading "Dog Crusoe," which was one of his Christmas presents, happily fingering, at the same time, some bits of string, marbles, and other treasures which he had in his pocket.

Lilian sat on a little stool by her mother's knee, the firelight glinting on her fair long hair and thoughtful face.

"What makes my Lilian so quiet to-night?" asked Mrs. Weldon.

"I'm so sorry for that poor tree. This morning it was so beautiful, and now it lies there on the ground just an ugly dead log." There was a little catch in Lilian's voice as she spoke. "Mummy, why did they cut it down?"

"Dear," said her mother, stroking the soft hair, "it was a very beautiful tree, but it isn't enough to be beautiful; we have to try to be useful and helpful too to those around us. But this poor tree was injuring those around it. It threw its shadow, and dropped the moisture from its branches down upon the fruit bushes beneath so that they could not grow and flourish and bear good fruit. So the gardener said it must come down, and father said, we will sell the trunk to the coach-builder, and he will use it in making his carriages, and we will burn the big branches as logs in our parlour grate."

"You see, dear, the tree is going to have a new life now. It will carry the people about the beautiful country as part of a carriage, and it will make a bright blazing fire evening after evening for us, and we shall sit round it and watch the red blue flames leaping over it, and it will make us feel warm and happy."

"It was beautiful before, but it was doing harm, not good. Now it will be doing good, it will be useful and helpful. Is not that the better part?" And Lilian answered softly, "Yes."

VIOLET SOLLY.

A MEETING will be held on the premises of the Home Missionary College, Summer-ville, Victoria Park, Manchester, on Thursday next, for the purpose of unveiling a portrait of Dr. J. R. Beard, the first Principal, and one of the founders of the College. The portrait is a copy of one painted in 1851 by George Patten, A.R.A., and it has been made by Mr. J. Binny Gibbs. All friends of the College are invited to attend the unveiling, which will take place at 4.30. Tea will be served at 4.

DUTY is our ladder to the skies;
And, climbing not, we fall.

—Robert Leighton.

You must accustom yourself to concentrate thought on the truth which you have gained; you must cultivate the hard but necessary art of meditation; and must exalt meditation into prayer to the Father of Light for His quickening spirit. Nor is this all. You must inwardly and outwardly live up to the truth. You must strive against those appetites and passions which cloud the inward eye and shut the inward ear. You must be true without compromise to your convictions of duty. You must cherish and express disinterested affection. It is only by this joint and vigorous action of the moral and intellectual nature, that spiritual vision becomes clear; that the spiritual world is opened to us; that God, and duty, and immortality come forth from the clouds which ordinarily envelop them, into clear and beautiful light; that God's spirit becomes a distinct voice in the soul.—Channing.

THE IMPULSE TO SERVICE.

A SUBSTANTIAL volume has recently been issued by the Central Bureau for the Employment of Women (9, Southamptons-street, Holborn, W.C.), entitled, "The Fingerpost. A Guide to Professions for Educated Women, with Information as to Necessary Training." The price is 1s. 6d., post free. Of the book as a whole we shall have more to say in a further notice, and simply mention it here for the sake of referring to one special article which it contains. There are altogether more than seventy articles, telling of what educated women may do in various kinds of public work, in teaching, in medicine and nursing, in various kinds of business, in lecturing, in secretarial work, in gardening, &c.; and always the stress is laid on proper training and the need for systematic and steady work. Whether it is a public, professional, or business career that is described, there is one constant purpose kept in view, to show to educated women in how many ways there are openings by which, with capable diligence, they may secure for themselves a place of honourable and independent service in the world. But with this seeking for an independent career, especially in connection with the public work, there goes the further thought of unselfish contribution to the general well-being of the community. It is a question not only of a career for oneself, but of doing something for the common good. This may certainly be a strong motive power and an inspiration to the doctor and the nurse, and the teacher even of gymnastics, as much as to the sanitary inspector, or the rent-collector or hospital almoner; but also to those who go in for business of a humbler kind, even in laundry work, or gardening, or cookery. All such work, honourably done, with unselfish thought for its wider aims, may have the secret of inspiration, no less than work which has a more directly charitable aim, and does not furnish income for the worker.

And it is with this larger thought that the one contribution to the "Finger-post," to which we desire here to call special attention, is chiefly concerned. It appears to have been originally an address given to young workers preparing to devote themselves to social service as members of a Women's Settlement in London. It is the eighth article in the section on Public Work, on "The Training of Settlement Workers," by Miss M. A. SEWELL, formerly head of the Women's University Settlement in Southwark. The greater part of this address deals with general principles in such a way as to be very helpful to all those who feel the impulse to service, and desire more fully to realise the meaning of their life, not in self-centred interests, but as members of a community in the largest sense of human fellowship. There is truth in what Miss SEWELL says, which it is good for us all to ponder, whatever be our place in Society, and whatever kind of work we have to do. And we will add, that in the special interest of a living religious faith, we are bound to attend to these things, and by this way most surely shall find deliverance into a more strenuous and confident life and a larger vision of Divine truth.

Miss SEWELL notes at the outset a slackening of readiness in educated people to devote themselves to religious and social work, while yet the interest in the problems of society is as keen as ever. It is not, she says, "that less money is forthcoming, or less desire for happier social conditions expressed or even felt; on the contrary, perhaps there never was a time when people were more willing to give largely for social ends, whether in the shape of rates and taxes or of voluntary offerings." What is lacking appears to be just the impulse of self-consecration to actual work in personal service. The reasons for this are by no means all blameworthy. Miss SEWELL notes the growing passion for self-development, which takes hold of many educated people, to which the larger opportunities for education and general culture and for travel give so much more scope than formerly, and carry interests away from the immediate calls to service. When this implies a serious desire for greater knowledge and better trained capacity for the sake of service, and the hesitation is simply as to whether one is yet fit to begin to work, it is altogether admirable; and yet there is a danger of carrying this too far; and often it will be found that to begin to work in simple ways is the best training for a larger capacity.

"It is right," Miss SEWELL says, "that the immense interest in one's own life with which one begins it should find its natural development in self-culture and in as wide as possible an experience, and it is surely a true instinct that teaches us that the better we are and the more we know, the better and the more we may hope to do. But sooner or later the moment comes to each of us when we should realise that the time has arrived to take up our share of the world's burden, that we must apply what we have learnt, must turn to account for the service of others the knowledge and experience we have acquired. 'Service is our destiny'—if we miss it, life turns out to be a barren thing—all the eager self-absorption, the grasp at life's treasure, once so all-sufficing, ceases by and by to satisfy; whether we know it or not, if we develop as we should we need stronger meat, namely the food of a soul's self-sacrifice: But it sometimes seems to happen that the healthy transition to the life of service is missed—some never seem to know where to stop, or how to combine self-culture with constructive work—like misers who have got such a habit of hoarding that they never know the joys of spending. Then the very means which were at first the instruments of expansion of mind and soul become the means by which life is contracted and belittled, and those who started by meaning to be, and who one might have expected would be, enthusiastic pioneers and leaders never enter the ranks."

Such "entanglement in self-development" is, then, one of the dangers to be guarded against, and another is allowing oneself to be daunted by the greatness of the problems to be faced and the immense forces at work in the making of society. Little and insignificant enough we may each one of us be, but we have each to do our own part, and to keep in living touch with the community to which we belong, and that is most surely done through the work of unselfish service. We have no right to stand aside and wait until large measures of reform have produced (as we hope) better social conditions. We are all members of the one body, and it is a wicked and selfish thing, as Miss SEWELL earnestly pleads, "for the favoured ones, so to speak, of society to stand aside and leave the rest alone to fight out their own deliverance." She adds wise words as to the need for training—training by steady practice and persistent faithfulness under wise guidance—and for the discipline of loyal co-operation and the happy spirit of comradeship: "Social service," she says, "has been cursed, is cursed still, by its irresponsibility, its poor estimate of its own importance, its lack of ideal. Training implies all the contraries of these."

The ideal grows clearer as we begin to do the simple things of immediate duty—and among these in our common life is any act of kindness, any outgoing of helpful sympathy for which we find an opportunity—anything by which we can practically acknowledge our sense of brotherhood and good-will. Amid all the confusions of our crowded world, and its many conflicting interests, and the insistent claims of a gross selfishness, the Divine Spirit is moving in the appeal of all that is implied by social service, in the going out from self in mutual helpfulness. We shall find our surest strength and quietness of heart in that thought, and in surrender to its appeal. And if any reader of these lines asks where to make a beginning in some definite work of helpfulness, that shall give a new reality to life, we would say, go down to one of the Domestic Missions, and make the offer to teach a class on Sunday or on a week evening, or to help in a boys' or girls' club, or in the household-house collections of a Provident Society, or in any other of the many efforts of sympathy and brotherly kindness which centre there. Nowhere will you realise more fully the deep need, and the power there is in the simplest helpful effort, both to quicken faith and the love which hopeth and endureth all things, and to train insight and capacity for much larger service.

THE National Testimonial to Dr. Clifford was presented at a great meeting in the Whitefield Tabernacle on Tuesday evening. The amount was £6,100, the greater part of which is to provide an annuity for Dr. and Mrs. Clifford. Dr. Horton, who could not stay for the presentation, had an opportunity of speaking earlier in the evening, and compared the two Dr. Cliffords, the fighting man, the Malleus Episcoporum, as he appeared to those who only knew him in his public work, and the man whom his friends knew in private friendship and in his home life as one of the tenderest, most gentle and sympathetic of human hearts. There were many other warm tributes of honour and affection, and Dr. Clifford was deeply moved when he made acknowledgment of the gift. He concluded characteristically by saying he was not sure that they ought not to be out canvassing for the Progressives. He was taking a holiday on Sunday that he might put in his whole time till Saturday night helping them.

THE death of Mr. Hodgson Pratt takes from us not only a great apostle of peace amongst nations, but also a man of a truly liberal religious spirit. He was in earlier years closely in touch with Unitarians, and his voice has not seldom been heard from our pulpits and platforms: Not long ago he gave an address to the London Unitarian Ministers' Meeting, in which he pleaded for renewed devotion to great ideals. Originally in the service of the East India Company, he had a mind quickly responsive to the varieties of national and racial sentiment, and sensitive to their underlying unity of needs and spiritual aspirations. The little company of pioneers of peace will greatly miss him.

PSALMS OF THE WEST

WE noted a fortnight ago the re-issue of the last edition of "Psalms of the West," in a cheaper form. (Longmans, 6d. net.) To many of our readers it has been a cherished possession. In services of devotion, where lessons are read from other books besides the Bible, this one has furnished beautiful and helpful passages. One of these we printed last year in the INQUIRER of January 20, as part of the article on "An Enlarged Lectionary." Friends who do not yet know the book we would strongly urge not to lose this opportunity of getting it. Copies may be had at Essex Hall, and many who know and value it will be glad of this sixpenny edition, that they may make it more widely known. Here are two more of the "Psalms" as further examples of what the book contains:—

The Unseen^{alone} hath Power.

Rejoice, ye children of the divine; lift up your voices, ye sons of the everlasting spirit.

Live in the joy of his countenance, O my people, and delight in the wisdom of his creation, the glory that encircleth the heavens, and the kindness of his infinite love.

He resteth not from hour to hour; he offereth salvation from the beginning to the end of the world.

Every soul doth he call to his labour, every conscience doth he bless with perception.

He looketh for the guileless to protect them from evil; he longeth for the poor to seek righteous knowledge, that they may rise from their heavy distress.

He remindeth the prosperous of imperishable things; he calleth them again and again to forsake vanity, and to animate the multitude with reason.

He rewardeth the worker with peace, the temperate judgment with security, and the self-denying with the pleasure of bestowal.

Full of beauty and aspiration are the thoughts of the righteous, the strong souls whose wings are lustrous with touches of hope.

Great is the power of man to love thee, to worship thee, to glorify the High Unseen.

Lovely is the sacrifice of the saints, who gave every sweet comfort to the fire, and died that we might better believe thy will.

Round about thy throne is everlasting strength, and from thy kingdom shall the kingdoms of the earth be nourished.

Thou shalt found justice where oppression was strong, and equality where the guilty were princes.

Thou shalt pour freedom on the nations that groaned, and healthful intelligence on the people that trembled in darkness.

The cruel shall be turned to mercy, and in the spring of graciousness the unthankful shall open his heart.

The mean shall be lifted up in the zeal of the noble, and the weary ones shall sing unto thee in the worship of thy courts.

Mighty shall be the will of the least of the children of faith, exalted the honour of the humblest among the loving.

Love hath naught to lose, for loss of all is gain, and in perfect sacrifice the world hath been redeemed.

Surely the seen is an image, and the unseen alone hath power; the invisible hath created, and remaineth for ever, though the fixed stars be melted and moulded anew.

We will not mourn for death, we will pass to thy presence with thanksgiving, and our lives shall be hymns of gladness ascending to the home of souls.

The Great Nation.

Methought I saw a nation arise in the world, and the strength thereof was the strength of God;

And her bulwarks were noble spirits and ready arms, and her war was in the cause of all mankind;

And the living flame of purification illumined land and sea, and her light was a beacon to the coasts afar off.

And against all the ills of heart and body her power went forth, and consoled the weak in the extremity of their need;

The chains fell off from the oppressed, and comfort came to the toilers in their misery, and the bondsmen of iniquity felt the breath of freedom on their brows;

In the remote desert the children cried for joy, and the mother returned to her loved ones, and the curse of the robber was heard no more;

And instead of war there came amity over all the earth, and the energies of man were turned against the foes of all.

And the captains were captains of industry, and of noble skill in all manner of work, and of high thought for the good of brethren under every star.

And that people sought the truth, and cast the idols of superstition into the oblivion of error, and their souls were set free from the corruption of imposition.

And they cast forth out of the land plagues and diseases of every sort, for they were strenuous in science and in hatred of every foul thing;

And every child was trained in the beauty of a clear spirit and an open mind, and in the use of reason rightly, and in living for the ideal good;

And the sad crowds of cities were dispersed over the fields, and new generations grew up to a fairer life, and every man rejoiced in his garden and in the kindly fruits of the earth;

And the rich and poor laboured together, and foresaw evil, and armed themselves with care and temperance and frugal pleasure, and trouble gave place to merry and worthy days;

And the harvest of the mind was esteemed a higher care than the harvest of the earth, and the getting of riches was less than the spending of instruction.

And factions and parties were turned to one cause, the transformation of evil to good, the first duty of every man, the great reform, the regeneration of himself;

And bitter words and bad words, the utterance of hate and shameful despair, and envy and false conceit, were heard no more in the land, for all the people devoted themselves to the supreme good, and strove in humility towards the divine example.

And all opinions were free and gently heard; there was neither scorn nor unkind displeasure, but in charity every fabric of reason was judged, and the noblest minds were the statesmen, the leaders in sublime thought, the teachers of saving knowledge.

And creeds and heresies of all thinkers and all epochs were refined in the furnace of truth, and there came forth the beauty of each, so that upon all the world shone the message of heaven to man.

THE TEMPLE CLASSICS DANTE.

LAST year saw the completion of a notable work, greater than one might think from the modest appearance of six little volumes of the "Temple Classics" (J. M. Dent & Co., 1s. 6d. a volume, net). It is, says a note at the end of the last volume, "the only complete edition of Dante's works in any modern language"; and it is more than that, for the works are edited with notes by scholars of the first eminence, and in the three volumes of the Divina Commedia, as in that of the Vita Nuova and the Canzoniere the Italian text is given face to face with the English translation on corresponding pages. Only the Convivio and the Latin works appear in the English translation alone.

The name of Dante stands alone on the title-page of each volume, and so modest are the editors and translators that it is a matter of some search to discover who they are; but, having made this search, we find that chief among them is the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed, whose Dante lectures have long been an inspiration to his University Extension students in many parts of the country. Fully a half of the work in these six volumes is due to Mr. Wicksteed, and we have little doubt that his hand has been upon the whole. Dr. H. Oelsner edited the Italian text of the three parts of the Commedia, and of the Paradiso, which was the first volume to be published, in 1899, Mr. Wicksteed was the translator. The Arguments also are his, while for the notes the two editors are jointly responsible. The translation of the Inferno, published in 1900, is a revision of Dr. J. A. Carlyle's classic work, and that of the Purgatorio, published in 1901, is by Mr. Thomas Okey. To both of these volumes Mr. Wicksteed contributed special notes at the end, and he alone is responsible for the next volume, a translation of the Convivio (1903). In the volume of the Latin works (1904) the De Vulgari Eloquentia is translated by Mr. Ferrers Howell, the rest by Mr. Wicksteed—the De Monarchia, the Epistolae, the Eclogues, and the Quaestio de Aqua et Terra, a good deal more than two-thirds of the volume. Last year, as we have said, saw the completion of this work, by the publication of the sixth volume, containing the Vita Nuova, together with a translation by Mr. Thomas Okey, and the Canzoniere, translated by Mr. Wicksteed, and forming the larger half of the volume. Only trained scholars and students of Dante can fully realise how much this means, but the ordinary person who wishes he knew more of the great things of literature, can rejoice in the accomplishment of such a work, and may be permitted warmly to congratulate those who have had part in it on their achievement. We, who know and honour Mr. Wicksteed, not for his Dante work alone, have special reasons to be glad, both on account of this work, now happily finished, and for our hope of fresh gifts from him of things that are of the highest worth.

LONDON SUNDAY SCHOOL SOCIETY.

THE annual meeting was held at Essex Hall on Saturday evening, February 23. From 6.30 to 7 the teachers and members were received by the President, the Rev. John Toye, and there was a very good attendance when he took the chair at 7 o'clock.

MR. ION PRITCHARD, the Treasurer, presented the balance sheets. The general account disclosed a much more satisfactory state of affairs than a year ago. The subscriptions had increased by £4 15s., and the receipts from meetings by £4 11s. 1d., a total increase of £9 6s. 1d. On the other hand, the expenses showed a decrease of £5 2s. 9d., and the balance due to the Treasurer had been reduced from £7 17s. 3d. to £2 10s. 2d. The Southend Home accounts showed a decrease in subscriptions of £6 11s. 6d., and a reduction from £15 2s. to £13 10s. 9d. in the balance due to the Treasurer. A special fund, amounting to £12 15s., had also been raised to meet the cost of renewing flooring, crockery, kitchen utensils, &c.

In Miss Pearson's absence Mr. Pritchard also presented the Country Holiday Movement account. This showed subscriptions amounting to £120 13s. 6d., grants to schools amounting to £94 12s. 6d., and a balance carried forward of £27 16s.

MR. R. ASQUITH WOODING, the hon. secretary, then read the committee's report for the year, which had been one of quiet and uneventful progress. It had only been found possible to visit nine schools but these were typical of all the 24. There were 3,786 scholars on the books of the affiliated schools, as against 3,647 a year ago. The scholars over 16 numbered 290, as against 295; and the teachers 348, as against 352. From the visitors' reports it appeared that the discipline and order in the schools were good, and the singing hearty and of good quality, especially in those schools which had regularly taken part in the Society's Musical Festival. The character of the teaching continued to show the improvement noticed during the past few years. Many of the schools still suffered from the lack of sufficient teachers, and more help from those who had both leisure and culture was urgently needed if the schools were to be ready for such increased responsibilities as the future might hold in store for them. It was very much to be regretted that only at Newington Green was there a regular morning school, and the teachers at other schools were urged to consider whether they could not have their schools open and well filled twice on Sunday. The Committee recorded with great pleasure the success which had attended the resuming of the Society's Country Holiday Movement. Grants had been made to 11 schools, to enable 255 scholars to be sent away for a fortnight each. As it was probable that more schools would apply for grants next summer an even larger fund than that collected last year would probably be required. The Southend Home had been fully utilised by elder scholars during the summer months, and altogether 125 guests had been received during the year, a number well up to the average, but more visitors could be received during the spring and autumn months. The meetings of the Society during the year (the annual meeting, the musical festival, the aggregate service, and the autumn social meeting) had been well attended, and had proved successful. The Musical Festival had produced a thoroughly interesting competition between the eleven competing choirs, and the banner had been awarded to Highgate. Dr. Little, the adjudicator, had warmly praised all the choirs between whom, he stated, there was but little to choose. The report concluded with an appeal by the committee for as liberal support in the future as had been accorded to them during the past year, so that they might be able to carry on efficiently the important and increasing work which had been placed in their charge.

In moving the adoption of the reports, the PRESIDENT spoke of the pleasure which it gave him to meet with so many friends and colleagues. He referred to the great debt of gratitude which the Society owed its Treasurer for his unflagging work on their behalf, and congratulated the Society on the work which was being carried on in London by the Society and its affiliated schools. The Rev. F. SUMMERS briefly seconded the motion, which was adopted unanimously.

On the motion of the Rev. W. COPELAND BOWIE, Mr. Ion Pritchard was elected President for the ensuing year, and the officers and committee were then re-elected.

MISS MARIAN PRITCHARD expressed the general feeling when she rose to offer the President the loving thanks of all for his work for the Society during the past year, and for his many years of quiet and devoted though unseen labour in the East of London.

At the close of the business meeting a conference on "Thrift in the Sunday School," was opened by the President, who trusted that his few words might quicken his young friends to a greater desire to possess, to get, and to give all that was wisest and best to the children they were trying to help and to guide. Thrift, in its widest sense, signified much more than mere saving, it meant the state of prospering. Teachers should try to enter into the lives of their scholars, and fit them for the life that was before them. They would do well to ask themselves, were they thrifty with their time, making the best use of the hour they had with their scholars each Sunday, so as to train them up into good citizens, and to equip them for that rude awakening which would come to them when they were first brought face to face with the work-a-day world, and the real battle of life would begin. Coming to the practical, he urged that each school should deliberately set itself the task of teaching the children true thrift. Savings banks and provident and benefit societies should find a place in every school, and all scholars should be taught the value of life insurance. In these and in all other ways possible to them the teachers should train the scholars in the ways of thrift, so that they might grow up into men and women resourceful, thrifty, honest, and, above all, God-fearing, with the knowledge that the kingdom of God was written within them.

MR. TURNER spoke on the subject of school savings banks and also on "thrift" in the wider sense in which the word had been used by Mr. Toye. MR. BARNES said a few words on thriftlessness in matters intellectual, urging that the scholars should be taught how to use their leisure time to its fullest advantage. The HON. SECRETARY described the working of a society for providing medical attendance and sick pay in cases of illness which had been in successful operation for many years at Newington Green; and the REV. F. SUMMERS endorsed the President's remarks as to the desirability of the schools making the teaching of thrift a real part of their work.

A successful meeting was then brought to a close with the Benediction, pronounced by the President.

BIRMINGHAM: HURST STREET MISSION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE annual meeting of the subscribers and friends of this Mission was held on Monday evening under the presidency of the Lord Mayor of Birmingham, Mr. Councillor Sayer. The report of the committee and the treasurer's statement were read by the secretary.

The Missionary, Mr. W. J. Clarke, in presenting his twenty-second annual report, stated that the separate Mission agencies now numbered forty-two, and included: Religious services every Sunday morning, afternoon, and evening, Sunday-schools, chapel and Sunday-school choirs, classes for Biblical study, vocal music and dress-making, recreation room, cricket club, pierrot troupe, magazine circulation, flower distribution, senior and junior Bands of Hope, girls' social club, gymnasium, dramatic society, social gatherings, mothers' meetings, advice bureau, Guild of Sympathy, aged people's and poor children's summer and winter parties, rambling and cycling club, window gardening association, holiday home, sick, savings', and benevolent clubs (numbering fourteen), ladies' committee, &c. It would thus be seen that the mission endeavoured to come into direct contact with the lives of those whom it was sought to influence for their good at every available point, by striving to get the life itself dominated and guided by religious aims and hopes, by placing educational facilities within their reach, by affording them opportunities for healthy and innocent recreation and amusement, by encouraging them to cultivate the love of the beautiful in their homes, by gladly offering them counsel whenever the need arose; by extending not merely sympathising words, but practical material help to such as might need and deserve it, and in these and all other possible ways striving to give practical exemplification to the Apostle's declaration that we are all members one of another, and that the mightiest power, the divinest thing known either to angels or to men is that love which "beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things." He mentioned how great was the happiness, how real the inspiration, he derived from the religious services which were held every Sunday morning, afternoon, and evening, attended throughout the year by a total weekly average of about eight hundred worshippers. With respect to the directly philanthropic work of the Mission, he reported that during the year 3,770 medical notes and 2,571 garments had been distributed, that 11,355 visits had been paid to and received from the poor (the help given in these ways and in weekly pensions, occasional money advances, food, &c., involving a total outlay of not less than £1,750), and that by the agency of the Police-Aided Association for Clothing Destitute Children 3,410 children received among them 12,261 garments and 3,333 pairs of boots. By the agency of the Court and Alley Open-Air Concerts Association 25 open-air concerts were given in courts situated in the most poverty-stricken districts in the city, and attended in the aggregate by not fewer than 20,000 people, the greater part of them belonging to that unhappy class of the population known as "the submerged tenth." By the agency of the Walliker Society some 36 garden parties were organised for poor aged men and women, 1,611 of whom were, for the time being, treated as the guests of some of our well-to-do citizens, and provided with a pleasant drive, a bountiful tea, and a brief companionship with the blessed sights and sounds of the country. By the agency of the Military Veterans' Association a sum of £510 was raised and distributed in relief and various ways among 65 men who, in the prime of their manhood, had served their country in the Crimean campaign or the Indian mutiny, or both, and who, in their helpless old age, are experiencing the cruel and relentless pinch of poverty, in addition to which 11 pensions, chiefly of 9d. per day, were obtained. Reckoning the number of people attending the Sunday services and the various week-day agencies, and making reasonable deduction for those who would be attending two or more of the agencies, he calculated that there were not fewer than 2,000 human beings whose lives were in one way or another directly affected by the Mission week by week the whole year through. Gratifying evidence of the measure of public confidence reposed in the Mission was supplied by the circumstance that towards the close of the year, and in less than five weeks' time, he had the satisfaction of receiving over £1,200 in response to two personal appeals made by himself—upwards of £700 for the Mission, and upwards of £500 for the Police-Aided Association for Clothing Destitute Children.

The report concluded as follows:—

"And now, before concluding, may I say how fervently I trust that the longer we are permitted to join in the work of the Mission together the more firmly we may get rooted in our minds the truth which Carlyle, with such passionate depth of conviction, and such powerful and rugged eloquence, strove to bring home to us—that 'life is for none of us a gift, but rather an invaluable loan, of which we must all take heed, which we must in all carefulness employ, and which will, with high recompense, or else with heavy penalty, one day be required back.'

"Those who note and endeavour to grasp the real significance of the signs of the times cannot fail to be aware that views of human life, and of the duties we owe, and the obligations we are under to each other, are surely finding their way into the minds of the people generally, which must inevitably bear fruit in vast and sweeping changes in our present social system. With a force and a measure of unanimity never previously known, it is being urged throughout the whole civilised world that the rights and the privileges of wealth are small matters indeed compared with its duties and responsibilities. Statesmen are being given to understand that the noblest task to which statesmanship can put its hand is that of promoting the happiness, the material and the moral well-being of the great majority of the people. Ecclesiastics are being warned that the religion which concerns itself very much with the future life, but which troubles itself very little about hastening the reign of justice, peace, and righteousness in this, which will waste precious time, and squander vast resources in wrangling over disputed points of belief, and with respect to which, so long as human nature remains what it is, absolute unanimity is impossible; while innocent children are perishing with cold and hunger, while vast numbers of the people are forced to drag on existence under conditions which make comfort, health, and even common decency impossible, while a positively appalling proportion of the population have nothing to look forward to in their old age but the workhouse or semi-starvation outside it, and a pauper's grave at last. Ecclesiastics are being warned, and in no uncertain tones, that the religion which acts thus stands self-condemned, and has now to choose between espousing the cause of the people or forfeiting the allegiance of the people.

"For my own part, I am among those who believe that a better day is dawning, that the time when juster laws and truer equality shall prevail, when wealth incalculable shall no longer abound in one direction, and poverty indescribable in another, when each shall be for each and all for all. I am one of those who believe that this blessed, this long-hoped-for time is nearer to practical realisation than ever it has been in this world's history before.

"Having regard to the colossal, the firmly rooted character of the evils which need to be conquered, and the wrongs which have to be righted, it is perhaps but little that one single institution such as ours can do in quickening this coming of the hour when the divine petition taught by the Master—'Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done on earth as it is done in heaven'—shall no longer be the burden of man's prayer, but the actual realisation of his hope; but great indeed will be our responsibility in the Eye of the All-Seeing if that little be withheld. Nor do I know of any surer way in which we may earn for ourselves the loving welcome, 'Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord,' and escape the dread condemnation, 'Depart from me, I never knew you,' than by readily and cheerfully extending to those who need it, as far as means and opportunity may permit, kindly sympathy, friendly counsel, and practical help; and endeavouring to inspire the souls of all whom we are able to influence at all with that passion for the loving, unselfish, compassionate service of man, which is ever and always the truest love, the noblest worship of God."

The Lord Mayor, in moving the adoption of the reports, paid a high tribute to the Missionary, Mr. W. J. Clarke, and his co-workers, expressing his conviction that they were doing a truly Christian work in a truly Christian spirit, on a scale which he described as stupendous. The resolution was seconded by Mr. G. Smith, and carried by acclamation. The attendance was a very large one, the chapel being crowded, and the proceedings from first to last being of the most enthusiastic character.

ROCHDALE FAREWELL TO MR. SPEDDING.

THE REV. T. P. SPEDDING, having accepted the office of Field Agent to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, bade farewell to his congregation at Blackwater-street, Rochdale, on Saturday and Sunday last, after a ministry of twenty years.

A joint soiree of the members of church and school was held on Saturday evening in Clover-street school, and the occasion was taken to present Mr. and Mrs. Spedding with a handsome silver rose bowl and a purse of gold as some recognition of their enthusiastic and successful efforts in Rochdale during the past twenty years. There was a very large attendance, the large room being packed.

Mr. F. HALL, superintendent of the school, presided, and spoke very warmly of what the congregation had owed both to Mr. and Mrs. Spedding.

The Rev. CHARLES PEACH, as a college chum of Mr. Spedding's, revived some pleasant memories of their unbroken friendship of twenty-five years, and hoped the church would obtain a successor of the same high public spirit, and of the same unflagging energy, and that Mr. Spedding might realise the high hopes they all had of the great work to which he had been called.

The Rev. D. O. DAVIES (Baptist) and the Rev. T. B. EVANS having joined in the expressions of high regard for Mr. Spedding, the Rev. J. Hirst Hollowell (Congregationalist) said Mr. Spedding had been a worthy minister, a staunch friend, an able thinker, a prodigious worker, a fearless reformer, a genial presence, a kind-hearted and lovable man.

Other friends having spoken, Mr. W. W. HADLEY, chairman of the church committee, made the presentation on behalf of the church and school. He doubted, he said, if any other Rochdale minister had done as much work as Mr. Spedding in the Sunday-school. In the pulpit he was an honest and faithful preacher of the truth. At all times they found him sympathetic and helpful, and he was unselfish to a rare degree. Mr. Spedding left the church united and prosperous, and this great gathering showed that whoever took his place would have a bright and glowing prospect. They remembered also Mrs. Spedding's work for the church and school, and trusted that she would soon be completely restored to health. In making the presentation, Mr. Hadley said they would all follow Mr. Spedding's career with affectionate interest. The inscription on the bowl was: "1886-1907. Presented to the Rev. T. P. and Mrs. Spedding by the Rochdale Unitarian Church and Sunday School as a token of esteem and goodwill. Feb. 23rd, 1907."

Mr. Spedding acknowledged the gifts with much feeling, and, looking to the future of the congregation, said he hoped they would feel it was the dawning of a bright, glad day, and that they were going on to the fulfilment of those dreams and aspirations they could not realise under the old conditions, which his hands were not strong enough to help them to grasp for themselves.

FAREWELL SERMON.

The Blackwater-street Church was crowded on Sunday evening, when Mr. Spedding preached his farewell sermon. The text was from Phil. i. 5. Thankfulness "for your fellowship in the Gospel from the first day until now." He knew no better guide, Mr. Spedding said, on such an occasion of farewell, than the spirit and intention of that letter of Paul's to the church at Philippi; and in the course of his sermon he said:—

I am thankful for your fellowship in every sense of the term: the strengthening of my weak hands, the willing co-operation in the work that needed to be done, the tolerance of some futile efforts I have made. And now that I have come to the end of a ministry to which I owe practically all that I am, I cannot put aside the thought that, as the years roll by and life takes on its deeper hues, a fellowship like this has been counts for more than all the prospects of success that lie in front. There ought, I suppose, to be no sadness of farewell in any word I say if one could only take the proper view of things; for it ought to be a source of gladness to a man that his time has been long and good. And, in the main, that is my feeling. Sorrow might be legitimate if a man were prevented by some untoward event from continuing a work that promised well, but when there has been no such interference there should be only gratification that he has been permitted, weak and unworthy though he was, to serve in any noble cause his fellow-man. But, after all, we are only human, and one needs to be made of cast iron if he is to be unmoved and passionless at a time like this. And, however I find myself at the moment, an hour ago I was weak; and I make no pretensions of that kind.

I want to take a further view also: to think of the day when another man will stand here and call you together for happy hours of work and worship; one who will remind you of the traditions of this place, and urge you, in the spirit of the men and women who loved it long ago and of those who love it now, to gird yourselves for the coming day. It will be a better time because of the good spirit that is in your hearts, and the strength that is in your hands when you are ready to exert it.

These are the memories and the anticipations that I would cherish, and I pray that the dearest hopes of all of us for this cause may be realised to the full. For myself I cannot lose what I have enjoyed of that fellowship until now; it is the half of one's life, and it can never be effaced.

"We let the years go; wash them clean with tears. . . ."

Or look them carefully by, like dead friends' clothes,

Till we shall dare unfold them without pain,

But we forget not, never can forget."

Another word and duty and I have done. You entrusted me with this work long ago; you dared to call me here as an untried youth; you bore with my inexperience and rashness; and through all the ups and downs of these happy years I think that in your hearts you were good enough to say, "He means well." And I thank you. To-day is the day of my sorrow, but that is only another name for gratitude.

I received my office from no ecclesiastical authority: it came of your goodwill, and that has never failed. I restore now to your hands that charge which has been my pride and my delight. In so far as I have failed I am sorry, and for what little measure of success has been ours I would share in your satisfaction. I have done my utmost to serve the faith that the men who have ministered here, and all their fellow-labourers, toiled for and lived for; and I shall have my reward if, out of the goodness of your hearts, you can say of me, "He was not less faithful than the least of these."

"And so farewell!"

A word that must be and hath been;
A sound which makes us linger; yet—
Farewell!"

The closing hymn was "Nearer, my God, to Thee," and then Mr. Spedding pronounced the Benediction: "And may the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the fellowship of His Holy Spirit bless and abide with you and your church now and for ever."

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

LIVERPOOL.

IN reporting from time to time on the condition and doings of the group of churches and mission stations peculiarly "ours," there is a possible danger of overlooking that larger area of religious activity in which we are but a fractional item. Whatever, and however wide, are the gulfs which separate us from other groups of churches, they are but crevasses on the side of the one mountain slope of the Ascent of man to God.

Liverpool has just lost one of its great preachers, and is losing another in a few weeks. This fact concerns us all, for great preachers are rare. Nobody denies the title to Dr. John Watson, the Presbyterian, although his fame as a novelist is even more widely spread. Ian Maclaren is a household word; Dr. Watson an ecclesiastical.

The time is not yet, nor am I the man, to fully weigh him up as preacher: At one time he was looked on as a progressive and liberal thinker. He preached sermons some Sundays which would have been acclaimed in our pulpits, and which made the "Auld lights" look askance. But, if I have been rightly informed, the following Sundays reconciled the elders and deacons by the smack of "sound doctrine," and a balance was preserved. As years advanced, however, the tendency they so often bring towards conservatism has become manifest, and only recently the Doctor exorcised all lingering doubts as to his perfect orthodoxy by a full-blooded confession of faith in the old positions. He leaves us in the full odour of sanctity, and with the respect and admiration of men of all denominations.

All the world knows, also, that the shining light of Pembroke Chapel is being transferred to a new lamp-stand in New York. Probably no man in Liverpool has been more talked of, abused, denounced, canonised, be-laurelled, depreciated, sneered at and run after, than Charles F. Aked. How he has retained any balance at all is a marvel. At first an iconoclast, attacking furiously all kinds of popular prejudices, given to extravagant utterances and whirling rhetoric, he nevertheless established himself as a real power in politics, sociology and religion. At one time hand and glove with the late R. A. Armstrong, co-editor with him of the Liverpool Pulpit, and even exchanging pulpits with him, until he was denounced as no better than a covert Unitarian, he has of late returned to his first love and announced that he is going to make the "evangelical" note the centre of his teaching. I well remember a saying of, I think, Mr. Armstrong's, concerning these "liberal" orthodox men, that they are like bathers who always keep hold a rope by which they can pull themselves back to the shore when they have swum out a little into the deep. I need not debate Mr. Aked's wisdom or motives in going to a church of millionaires when, not so long ago, he thanked God publicly that he had no millionaires in his congregation. Possibly he has realised that even they have souls to be saved, and that he may be the man to save them. We wish him God-speed in the attempt.

The Christian Conference in Liverpool, which I think I once before alluded to, retains its vitality. It admits any and all who "profess and call themselves Christians," and boldly faces just the questions that divide the churches. At the last meeting the question of the relationship between the State and religion was opened up by a Jesuit priest and a Non-conformist minister and frankly discussed. This is better than the old methods of controversy.

Turning at last to our own nearer interests, there is really nothing much to report. I wrote last just at the start of the busy winter season, and every congregation has been kept fully alive ever since, and, I believe, successfully interested in many objects—social, educational, philanthropic and religious.

The Social Problem Circle, at Hope-street Church, has done fine work, and its interest is growing. It has been the means, under the Rev. H. D. Roberts, of focussing public attention on the sweating of women's work.

At Bootle, a Sunday afternoon meeting for the study of social questions, with our friend the Rev. J. Morley Mills as president, has drawn in quite a number, still growing, of thoughtful men and women, over forty being frequently present. A cheering feature, also, is that many men who have joined the Circle have begun attending evening service. It is a good work begun, and I hope it will steadily grow in numbers and usefulness.

At Gateacre, where there is a large non-church-going population, the Rev. J. Crowther Hirst tried the experiment of a more popular type of evening services, with hymns from a book compiled by myself years ago for mission use. Several ladies also visited houses with invitations, and a good many responded. While no great work was achieved the attendance of villagers was larger than in any previous year.

I noted in my last the appointment of an assistant missionary, Mr. Douglas Hoole, to take charge of the mission at Garston. This step has been fully justified by a steady growth of life and enthusiasm, and also in numbers, so that the prospects of this small but faithful church were never so bright as now. Indeed, such confidence is felt in its stability that it is under consideration to buy a site on a large area now being sold for building lots, with a view to erecting some day a permanent structure. I understand that good hopes are entertained of this project being carried through.

As a sign of the recognition of the great value of our Domestic Missions it is worthy of note that, a week or two ago, the Lord Mayor, and many leading men of the city, attended a special service at the Domestic Mission, Mill-street, when the Rev. Charles Hargrove preached what one of the orthodox visitors called "a fine Gospel sermon," and a good collection was taken in aid of the funds of the Mission.

Our two other Domestic Missions thrive, and are doing fine work, each on its own lines. Mr. Haigh, of Hamilton-road, by-the-bye, who is already known by his poetry, is now about to appear as the writer of "Sir Galahad of the Slums," which will certainly prove interesting and inspiring.

What the head of King Charles was to Mr. Dick's Memorial, the New Theology is to the churches. It crops up or creeps in everywhere. We may all heartily rejoice in the fact that millions are being interested in the bases of religious thought who never before troubled themselves to think at all. Nothing but good can come out of this assertion of the necessity of a theology in harmony with modern knowledge.

Our preachers have, of course, taken the opportunity, and have dealt faithfully with the various points raised by Mr. Campbell.

What more remains to be said, but that, taken all in all, we in this province are alive and active, and full of hope and brotherly love.

H. W. HAWKES.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Atherton.—In view of the Longfellow Centenary, the Rev. J. J. Wright and his congregation devoted last Sunday's services, morning and evening, to the life, and more especially to the teachings of Longfellow as expressed in his poems. Music and hymns were appropriate to the occasion. Mr. Wright, also, in the afternoon, after questioning the whole school as to their knowledge of Longfellow's poems, and while giving the children and young people certain incidents in the poet's life, got them to repeat with him some of the poet's more memorable verses. It was an interesting and helpful "Longfellow Sunday" to old and young.

Bolton: Bank-street.—The annual meeting of the congregation was held on Tuesday, February 26, when the reports and accounts in connection with the chapel and its various institutions were presented. Mr. A. T. Crook presided in the absence of the chairman of the Committee (Mr. John Harwood). The report indicated steady progress in every direction, and membership is increasing. In 1904 it was 409, the following year 426, and in 1906 it was 450. In view of the general tendency of family removal to the out districts, the increase is an indication that even yet the town church may maintain its position as a congregational centre. The church is still continuing its support of, and interest in, the Halliwell-road Mission, which continues to do good work in both chapel and school in a populous district. Recognition is made in the report of the earnest and affectionate Christian spirit which has marked the ministrations of the Rev. J. H. Weatherall during the past year, and the result is apparent in the constantly improving attendance at service. In the evening especially, the numbers are increasing steadily, 300 or more often being present. At the meeting a resolution of thanks, moved by Mr. J. B. Gass and seconded by Mr. A. Pilling, was unanimously passed to the members of the family of the late Mrs. John Haslam for the generous offer to defray the cost of completely modernising the present organ. The organ was the gift, in 1877, of Mrs. Haslam and her family in memory of her husband and her daughter Ellen, and has always been a treasured possession. The cost of the alteration is expected to be about £600. The usual delegates to various associations were appointed. Membership of the congregation has hitherto implied an obligation to take at least one sitting, but it was unanimously resolved that the qualification be extended so as to include any who may not take a sitting, but who make a voluntary contribution of not less than 5s. per annum, this being the minimum seat rent. The meeting closed with the usual vote of thanks.

Bury: Chesham.—The four-days' bazaar held in the Bank-street School, Feb. 20-23, for the Chesham congregation, was a great success. The object was to raise £2,000 to wipe out a debt of £250, to capitalise the ground-rent, and to replace the income lost since the Education Act of 1902. The total receipts at the close of the bazaar, including donations, were £2,415 10s. 5½d., so that even if the expenses are something over £250, with the old debt also to be paid, the congregation is not far from attaining the £2,000 required for investment, to secure their position, and the maintenance of church and school. Lady Talbot, of Manchester, opened the bazaar on the first day, Colonel Pilcher presiding. On the second day the Rev. J. Collins Odgers was the opener, and Mr. Thomas Harwood chairman. On the third day Mr. Richard D. Holt, of Liverpool, was to have been the opener, but his selection as Liberal candidate for the Hexham division prevented him from being present, and his place was taken by Mr. W. T. Jones, of Prestwich, Mr. Thomas Rigby being in the chair. On the last day Mr. J. W. Barlow took the chair, and the Mayor of Heywood, Councillor D. Healey, opened the bazaar. Reference was frequently made to the loss sustained through the death of Mr. Thomas Holt, who took a deep interest in Chesham, as in the other congregations of the district. The Rev. J. M. Bass and his congregation are to be warmly congratulated on the result of their effort, and the generous help received from many friends.

Dean Row (Presentation).—An illuminated address, together with a purse containing twenty guineas, was recently presented to Mr. James O. Hammond, an old and staunch member and helper of the Dean Row Chapel and its institution during a term of over fifty years. The address, in the form of a letter, signed by the chairman, Mr. Thomas Worthington, and 156 other friends, runs as follows:—"Dear Mr. Hammond, on the occasion of our Christmas party, 1906, some of your old friends, whose signatures you will find inscribed on this address, have been reminded that for more than fifty years you have been connected in various capacities with the chapel and Sunday-school at Dean Row, to which we are all attached. Sunday after Sunday, for all these years, you have hardly ever failed to take your part in the choir; the Sunday-school has rarely been opened without finding you at your post, either as scholar, teacher, or superintendent; while as chapel warden, member of the Congregational Committee, member of the Entertainments Committee, and foremost helper at the Christmas parties, your time and services have been ungrudgingly given. We, your old friends, very few of whom can go back the whole of the fifty years, feel that while we hope you will continue for many years to take part in all that concerns the interest of the chapel and school, we should like to mark our respect for you and our appreciation of all you have done during this half century, by asking you to accept this address and a purse, with our best wishes, as a slight recognition of all the services you have rendered." The presentation was made on behalf of the congregation and friends who had contributed towards it by Mrs. Thomas Worthington, of Broomfield, Alderley Edge.

Dover.—Four new members were formally admitted at the Adrian-street Church on Sunday evening last. They were heartily welcomed by the Rev. C. A. Ginever on behalf of the congregation, and inscribed their names on the membership roll.

Glasgow: (M'Quaker Trust Lectures).—The Rev. E. T. Russell, of Ross-street Unitarian Church, has just completed the second series of Thursday evening lectures at Govan, the populous shipbuilding suburb of Glasgow. The M'Quaker Trust have held lectures at Govan for some years now, and it is gratifying to state that they are becoming increasingly successful. The attendance at the first four lectures delivered during November last reached an average of 170, and the series of six lectures just concluded on Thursday, February 28, averaged 100. Mr. Russell chose for his subjects, among others, such titles as "Commonsense and the Bible," "The Agnostic's Difficulties," "The Bible a Human Book, and what follows," "The Story of Jonah," and "The Unitarian Gospel." The response was most gratifying. Several members from Govan have joined Mr. Russell's congregation at Ross-street, although the distance is over four miles.

Halifax.—A three days' sale of work, &c., was held at Northgate-end, Feb. 20, 21, and 23, opened on the various days by Mrs. Ceredig Jones, of Bradford, Mr. Grosvenor Talbot, of Leeds, and Miss Dora Farrar respectively; entertainments, music, &c., were provided, and a very good business was done at the stalls, the takings for the three days being over £162. The available balance goes towards repairs to the organ, re-lighting and decorating the chapel, &c.

Liverpool: Ullet-road.—At the meeting of the Rathbone Literary Club on Thursday evening, Feb. 21, Professor McCunn, of the University of Liverpool, gave a lecture on "Stoicism," which was greatly appreciated. At the conclusion a vote of thanks was moved by the president, Mr. H. R. Rathbone, and supported by the Rev. J. C. Odgers, Mr. Miller, and the secretary, Mr. A. W. Blundell. There were thirty-six present. In the Sunday-school the prizes for the past year were distributed on Sunday afternoon, Feb. 24, by Mr. Philip H. Holt.

London: Hackney.—The course of sermons on "The Wealth and Well-being of Nations" delivered by Rev. H. Rawlings at the New Gravel Pit Church on the Sunday evenings of February have aroused considerable interest. Full summaries of the first three sermons have appeared in the Hackney and Kingsland Gazette, and the fourth is to follow. This kind of publicity seems to have more influence than any other. For, in spite of a good deal of advertising in the ordinary ways, the attendance on the first Sunday of the month was little more than usual, but since the first report appeared (i.e., from the second Sunday onwards) the numbers have been much higher. A noticeable feature was the large proportion of young men. On the third evening the answering of the written questions, which had been previously handed in, occupied twenty minutes. Last Sunday evening there was an open conference after the service, speakers being allowed five minutes each. The result was entirely good. Some speakers had special knowledge, as a Relieving Officer and a School Attendance Officer. Naturally there was difference of opinion on some points, but there was no embarrassing heat.

London Laymen's Club.—The meeting of the Club held on Monday last was a ladies' evening, and more than a hundred members and friends dined together at the Inns of Court Hotel. The President of the Club, Mr. Harold Wade, presided, and offered a very cordial welcome to the guests. The Revs. A. A. Charlesworth, A. Hurn, and Charles Roper were also welcomed as new clerical members, making the number of such members up to ten, which is the limit by rule. The President announced that the Challenge Shield offered by the club for an annual competition between the various lads' clubs connected with our churches and missions, had been furnished by the Birmingham Guild, and that the first competition would be held at Essex Church on Thursday evening, March 21, when Stamford-street, Mansford-street, Limehouse, and Essex Church would take part in the competition. The time was 8 o'clock, and visitors would be welcome. Mr. H. B. Lawford, reporting on the Boston Conference Fund, said that the Committee now had £900 available for grants to help ministers to attend the Conference next September, and some 35 had already accepted invitations to go. Replying to the toast of the guests, Mr. Blake Odgers, speaking on behalf of the ladies, said that the Women's Social Club had now 143 members. Mr. C. F. Pearson also responded. A very pleasant concert by members and friends concluded the entertainment of the evening.

London: Stratford.—The anniversary services at West Ham-lane were held on Sunday, February 17, conducted in the morning by the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, and in the evening by the Rev. F. Hankinson. The annual meeting of the congregation and friends was held on the following day. The chair was taken by Mr. E. F. Grundy, who was supported by the Revs. T. E. M. Edwards, F. H. Jones, H. W. Perris, W. H. Rose, H. Rawlings, and others. The Committee's report stated that good work was still being carried on by the church and the institutions in connection therewith. The services were fairly attended. The school has an afternoon attendance now averaging 64, with a good staff of teachers. Great regret was expressed at the retirement of Mr. A. Pharaoh from the post of superintendent, which he had held for five years. The Young People's Guild, which was under the able direction of the Rev. W. H. Rose, had a roll of 50 members, the average attendance each Wednesday being about 25. The Temperance Guild and Band of Hope each had about 40 members. Meetings were held every Monday evening. Appreciation was expressed of the valuable help given by the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards in providing supplies for the pulpit and in other ways helping the church. A fund was raised last year for repairing and decorating the inside of the church, and arrangements were now being made for thoroughly repairing the outside. During the evening the following resolution was proposed by Miss Emily Sharpe, seconded by Mr. G. B. Shute, and supported by the Rev. F. H. Jones, who stated that his first sermon was preached in the church at Bow:—"That the members and friends of the West Ham-lane Unitarian Church, at their annual meeting held this 18th February, 1907, desire to place on record their appreciation of the excellent work commenced fifty years ago by the late Rev. Thomas Rix at the meeting house in Bow, which resulted in the foundation of the present church. Mr. Rix acted gratuitously as minister to the congregation for 21 years. This meeting offers to Mrs. Thomas Rix most hearty congratulations on the congregation having reached its jubilee."

Manchester: Broughton.—On March 20 the annual meeting of the congregation was held in the church, Bury New-road, there being an excellent attendance. The report of the year's work was most encouraging. The chairman expressed his gratification at being able to announce that they had on the new membership roll thirty-five new members, and spoke with enthusiastic hope for the future. He complimented the new minister, the Rev. H. Dawtrey, on his arduous work and the excellent results shown in the few months he had been amongst them. The tone of the whole meeting was marked with hopeful anticipation.

Midland Ministers' Meeting.—The annual meeting of the Protestant Dissenting Ministers of Warwickshire and neighbouring Counties' Monthly Meeting was held at the Old Meeting Church, Birmingham, on Wednesday, Feb. 20, the Rev. Joseph Wood being in the chair. After the singing of a hymn and prayer the annual report and balance-sheet were read. The Rev. I. Wrigley was re-elected secretary and treasurer, and Rev. A. Thompson was reappointed auditor. The first part of the meeting having been brought to a close, the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, of Nottingham, read a paper on "A Free Catholic Church." The Revs. J. A. Shaw, W. C. Hall, J. W. Austin, W. Lloyd, T. Paxton, J. C. Street, and J. Wood took part in the discussion. At the tea, kindly provided by the wardens of the Old Meeting, Mr. Wood expressed the thanks of the meeting to Mr. Lloyd Thomas, and the Rev. E. A. Voysey offered the thanks of the members to the wardens and their wives.

Oxford.—The annual meeting of the Charles-street Institute took place on Feb. 22, Dr. Carpenter in the chair. The report which was presented shows that good work is being done, and states: "Although much opposition is met with from the Church party in the neighbourhood, those who actively take part in the work meet with sufficient response and sympathy to encourage the earnest hope that seeds sown by them will continue to bear good fruit that may yield an increase." During the week evening classes are conducted for instruction in various things and for recreation. On Sunday evening there is a religious service, and in the afternoon of each Sunday over 70 children assemble for class teaching. Recently a "Children's Morning Service" has been started. There are 30 names entered, and it is expected that this number will soon increase. All interested in the work of the Institute feel that for the doing of what is waiting to be done two things are necessary, viz., a missionary and suitable accommodation; but at present want of funds preclude these advantages, so the workers must continue, as Dr. Carpenter said at the meeting, to do their best under existing circumstances.

Styal.—Norscliffe Chapel was well filled on Sunday evening, when the Rev. E. L. H. Thomas gave the first of a series of special sermons on "The Religious Convictions held by Unitarians." Many strangers were present, and much interest was evinced.

Yorkshire Unitarian Club.—At the next meeting, to be held at Hunslet, Leeds, on Saturday, March 16th., the Rev. Chas. Hargrove is to lecture on "Unitarianism: Its failure and its Success." Intending members of the Club may obtain all particulars from the Hon. Secretary, Mr. A. Simpson, 17, Parkfield Mount, Beeston, Leeds.

LET every citizen be taught his responsibility for every talent, and become possessed with the spirit of faithful stewardship in the trust of life for the work, opportunity, and abilities which have come to him. If equal zeal were given for human advancement to what is now given for personal profit, what a glorious change would come over the world. The first thing to be learnt is to live, not basely to the earth, but amply to God.—R. Russell.

The Nation

THE NEW LIBERAL AND PROGRESSIVE WEEKLY REVIEW

(with which is incorporated "The Speaker").

Edited by Mr. H. W. MASSINGHAM.

"The Nation" will stand as the exponent of Liberal and Progressive thought, embodying many of the best features of "The Speaker," while transforming it into a thoroughly representative and powerful organ of Liberal opinion. Arrangements have been made for full and well-informed treatment of Continental and American politics and affairs, and home matters will be discussed from a broad standpoint. The first issue will contain articles by the Rt. Hon. Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman and Mr. Winston Churchill, and a poem by Mr. Thos. Hardy.

CHRISTIANITY.

(AND NO UNITARIANITY.)

JESUS SAID

(THE GREATEST WORDS EVER SPOKEN!):
Believe me, the hour cometh when neither in this mountain nor in Jerusalem shall ye worship the Father. . . .

Ye worship that which ye know not:
We worship that which we know: for Salvation is from the Jews.

But the hour cometh, and now is, when the true worshippers shall worship the Father in Spirit and Truth; for such doth the Father seek to be His worshippers.

God is a Spirit, and they that worship Him must worship in Spirit and truth.

The (Samaritan) woman saith unto him, I know that the Messiah cometh (which is called Christ): when He is come, He will declare unto us all things.

JESUS SAITH UNTO HER:

I that speak unto thee am He.

MEMORANDUM:

"Where either individuals or states are fettered together, their movement must be that of the slowest, and the slowest is apt to be the colleague that refuses to move at all, unless backward."
"The more free individuals, whether men or communities, the more chances for those variations from which higher forms are developed. The old shout of "Liberty and Union, one and inseparable," has a fine sound, but so has the prophecy of the lion and the lamb lying down together. The lamb will be inside the lion, and Liberty be devoured by over-centralization."

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

WE have delayed making the announcement that the Rev. R. J. Campbell has withdrawn from his undertaking to deliver this year's Essex Hall lecture, in the hope that better counsels might prevail. We have been glad to think of Mr. Campbell as a man of generous courage, and do not care now to ask what influences have been at work to persuade him to this withdrawal. The ostensible reason given, that the publication of his book on the "New Theology" rendered a lecture by him superfluous, is not sufficient. However, the matter is now settled, and we hope very soon to be able to make another announcement as to this year's lecture.

TUESDAY next, March 12, is the 300th anniversary of the birth of Paul Gerhardt, the greatest of Lutheran hymn-writers of the seventeenth century. We know him best in the free translation of his "Befiehl du deine Wege" by John Wesley:

"Commit thou all thy griefs

and from the second part, "Give to the winds thy fears." The original has twelve verses of eight lines each, being in fact an acrostic on the words of Psalm xxxvii. 5: "Befiehl dem Herrn deine Wege und hoffe auf ihn, er wird's wohl machen." The artificial construction does not, however, interfere with the sympathy and depth of feeling in this most beautiful hymn. There are altogether more than 120 of Gerhardt's hymns, 23 of which are translated in Miss Winkworth's "Lyra Germanica." A most admirable study of Paul Gerhardt and his hymns by Professor Wernle, of Basle, has just been published by Messrs. J. C. B. Mohr (Paul Siebeck) of Tübingen in Schiele's series of Religions-geschichtliche Volksbücher (50 Pf., or in a finely bound edition M. 1.50). We shall have more to say of this next week.

PROFESSOR WERNLE is already well known to English readers by the translation of his masterly work on "The Beginnings of Christianity," in Williams & Norgate's Theological Translation Library. He also contributed the first number of the New Testament division in the series of Religionsgeschichtliche Volksbücher on "The Sources of the Life of Jesus," of which 20,000 copies have been issued in Germany. We are very glad to announce that an English translation of this little book, by the Rev. Edward Lummis, is in the press, and will shortly be published by Mr. Philip Green, for the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. This will be followed by the late Professor Wrede's "Paul," in the same series, by the same translator, which is also in the press, the translation having been completed some time ago.

LONDON elected last Saturday, by an overwhelming majority, to have a Moderate County Council. Since the first election of the Council in 1889 the Progressives have had majorities ranging from 22 to 53, except in 1895, when the parties were equally divided. Now there is a clear Moderate majority of 40. What this may mean, in the administration of Education, and other matters, vital to the well-being of the people, we shall know better at the end of three years, when the time for the next election has arrived. In the interest of Education it is greatly to be regretted that Mr. A. J. Shephard, Chairman of the Education Committee, and Mr. Graham Wallas, are among the defeated, as are also Mr. W. Wallace Bruce, whose special service has been in the matter of Housing, and the Rev. L. Jenkins Jones, of Woolwich. Among the defeated we had also a special interest in the candidature of Mr. A. J. Mundella and Mr. H. G. Chancellor. Their constituents in Islington polled more Progressive votes than at the last election, when they carried the seats, but it was of no avail against the astonishing influx of voters on the other side.

THE new German Reichstag has not yet settled down to its routine work, and the leaders of its numerous groups have been defining their position: It is too soon to determine what support the Kaiser's Government will receive from the warring sections, although it is quite clear that, be its majority in the chamber larger or smaller, it is, and will, remain a minority Government so far as the electorate is concerned: That is a permanent state of things, and Prince von Bülow is, doubtless, more concerned to know how many votes he can count on in a division: Now this depends on the extent to which the Radicals are content to play the game of the Conservatives: In this connection it is interesting to note the declaration of Herr Schrader, the Radical spokesman, as reported in the Times of March 1. Herr Schrader holds out the prospect of his party's acting according to democratic (not, of course, social democratic) principles: If the whole group acts up to that the Prince may well find himself in difficulties before long.

GENERAL BOTHA, the first Prime Minister of the Transvaal, under the new constitution, with a strong ministry of Dutch and English combined at his back, stands before the world as a noble representative of the best hope for South Africa. In the old days he was a leader of reform, and if affairs had been allowed to take their course in peaceful development he would in all probability have succeeded President Kruger as head of the Republic. The thought brings back bitter memories of the war; and yet we must rejoice, with great thankfulness, that General Botha has accepted the trust of Government, and now stands where he does.

THE unostentatious quiet with which the second Duma began its sittings on Tuesday was in striking contrast with the splendid State ceremonial which signalled the opening of the first in the spring last year. Yet it may be doubted whether there is not a deeper significance in this second assembly than even in the previous one. That was the first and must for ever be memorable on that account. It was dissolved because the Tsar and his entourage could not tolerate its freedom of speech. The ruling class has no reason to love the name of the Duma; it could not have anticipated a more obsequious assembly this year than last; it does, in fact, stand face to face with one which is more preponderantly hostile. Nevertheless, the Tsar has felt himself under the necessity of calling it together, and it certainly looks as though even his most reactionary advisers are conscious of their inability to carry on the financial and other business of the country without its concurrence. Therein lies the Duma's strength, although rumour is already at work foretelling its early dissolution. Meanwhile the members seem bent on avoiding such a crisis so long as possible. The Constitutional Democrats again form the strongest group, but they are less numerous than before. Their strength has not, however, gone to the Right, for the Government groups are both smaller and less influential. It is the Socialists who have gained. So much stronger are the groups of Socialist Revolutionaries, Social Democrats, and Toil party that they might have bid for the Presidency.

THIS, however, they have not done, and the new President, Mr. Golovin, is a Constitutional Democrat. He also is a man practised in affairs, chairman of the Moscow Zemstvo, and holder of other posts of justice and administration. He is described further as having a much closer resemblance to an English politician than his fellow members possess. This election of a man who though bold and determined, is wary and alert, is an indication of the mood of the majority. The members are almost entirely new, less than thirty of them having sat in the Duma. They are also largely drawn from the educated classes, strikingly so in the case of the Left. The peasant deputies are less numerous. The assembly thus composed chooses a President reputed to be strong, but one who is bent on avoiding or at least on not forcing a quarrel. Even the Revolutionary Socialists have resolved to refrain from terrorism during the sitting of the Duma, unless the Government forces their hands by continued outrages. They resolve, moreover, to keep strictly within Parliamentary lines. Everything is to be done by the parties of freedom to give this second tentative effort after Constitutional Government a chance of success.

SURELY no stranger spectacle has ever been afforded to the capital city of a Christian and civilised community than the festal decorations by which the Royal opening of the Central Criminal Court was celebrated last week. The lines of bunting flaunted across the streets in the manner familiar when a foreign potentate is to be fêted at the Guildhall. There is something alarmingly incoherent in the thought or lack of thought which allows such an occasion to be signalled in such a manner. It is open to one who would look out upon the world and take heart again to contrast the new with the Old Bailey. We have outlived the callousness of the age in which gaol fever was endemic in the cells and not unknown in the court itself. By the self-sacrificing and persistent efforts of a Howard, a Fry, and others less famous, the humane spirit has gained its tardy triumphs. No one regards the present penal prison as perfect, or even as satisfactory, although the experiment at Borstal, to mention no other, reminds us that the present prison Commissioners are addressing themselves vigorously to some of the more obstinate problems.

THERE is room for thankfulness at the fact of progress in our treatment of criminals. We rightly congratulate ourselves on a diminution of serious crime. But, notwithstanding these opportunities for a somewhat chastened gratitude, the section of that vast edifice, the Central Criminal Court, is a fact to suggest the saddest reflections, full of humiliation if not of foreboding, and in no wise a fit occasion for a flutter of flags symbolic of a popular merry-making. Was drapery needed, should it not be sable; or if flags, were they not fitter flown half-mast high as on a day of national mourning? It is a bitter comment on our social ideals to have to build this costly and solid-seeming court, built as it appears for all time. Perhaps it was necessary, for although thinkers are not wanting, such as Edward Carpenter, to challenge the necessity, yet to unprophetic minds no prospect opens of any final cessation of crime in the near future. But it is a long stride from the fact to the comfortable acceptance of the fact as a thing of course; and, indeed, there is something in this popular faith which goes far to create or perpetuate the necessity. Society is too complacent on this subject, and the appropriate thought in connection with this newly erected Central Criminal Court should be a great searching of heart. The question the non-criminal section of the nation ought to be asking is this: Whether society is truly doing its best, by education, or by providing fair opportunities of livelihood and life, to develop its children into good citizens. Whether the early Christian Father spoke not truly when he said: "If the neighbour of the elect man sins the elect man has sinned."

THE National Evangelical Free Church Council has held its annual gathering in Leeds during the present week. The retiring President, the Rev. J. Scott Lidgett, the new editor of the Methodist Times, was not well enough to be present, and his sermon on "Catholicity the Mark of Spirituality," was read on Tuesday morning by a friend. (The sermon is in this week's Christian World Pulpit.) Dr. J. Rendell Harris delivered his address as President, on "Free Churchmen in the Life and Hope of To-day." Referring to the loss of the Education Bill, he spoke with warm admiration of Mr. Birrell's conduct of it, and then went on to say that he was satisfied that no solution was at the present moment practicable except that of secular education, supplemented, if possible, by the activities of the Churches, and without an offensively negative attitude towards the Bible or religion. It was sufficient for his purpose, however, to remark that if a secular solution be proposed elsewhere it would not be possible to carry a resolution in that Council against it, and he was content to leave the matter for the present in that state.

On Tuesday afternoon the Rev. Thomas Law presented the annual report, and its adoption was moved by the Rev. R. J. Campbell, whose reception by the great meeting is characterised by the Christian World as "chivalrous," for there was a great deal of cheering, and none of the hisses which some had feared. (It is noted, however, that Mr. Campbell's name is dropped from the Committee.) In moving the report Mr. Campbell said:—The great work of the Church of Christ in the immediate future should be to get rid of the sectarian spirit, and realise the unity of Christendom through the operation of the Christian law of love. And he went on to propose the holding of a larger Conference, in which all the Churches could meet together, which must clear away many misunderstandings, and bring them all nearer together.

WITH this week's issue the Methodist Times makes a fresh start with a new editor, and with an increased number of pages. For the good name of Methodism generally, and for the sake of those young souls whose piety has not yet known corruption, one little corner might well be cleared away. In the issue for February 28 this astonishing offer is made: "A five-pound prize is offered for the best contribution of 'Class Meeting Talk,' for which leaders and members are invited to compete. In all cases the experiences must be genuine and not imaginary." If any good old Methodist who has not seen the advertisement refuses to believe that it is there, it is a scepticism that well becomes him. Five pounds for the best panting of the hart after the water brooks, or the best confession of beast-like ignorance, or the clearest and purest note of thanksgiving! May, perhaps, a word of violent indignation count as an experience, and be eligible for the prize?

THE new Nation, edited by Mr. H. W. Massingham, last Saturday took the place of the Speaker, and appeared in admirable form. The first article, on "The Hague Conference and the Limitation of Armaments," is by the Prime Minister, and it is characteristic of Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman's fearless generosity. We quote the concluding passage: "Let me, in conclusion, say a word as to the part of Great Britain: We have already given earnest of our sincerity by the considerable reductions that have been effected in our naval and military expenditure, as well as by the undertaking that we are prepared to go further, if we find a similar disposition in other quarters. Our delegates, therefore, will not go into the Conference empty-handed. It has, however, been suggested that our example will count for nothing, because our preponderant naval position will still remain unimpaired. I do not believe it. The sea power of this country implies no challenge to any single State or group of States. I am persuaded that throughout the world that power is recognised as non-aggressive, and innocent of designs against the independence, the commercial freedom, and the legitimate development of other States, and that it is, therefore, a mistake to imagine that the naval Powers will be disposed to regard our position on the sea as a bar to any proposal for the arrest of armaments, or to the calling of a temporary truce. The truth appears to me to lie in the opposite direction. Our known adhesion to those two dominant principles—the independence of nationalities and the freedom of trade—entitles us of itself to claim that if our fleets be invulnerable, they carry with them no menace across the waters of the world, but a message of the most cordial goodwill, based on a belief in the community of interests between the nations."

MR. THOMAS HARDY wishes the Nation well, by allowing "A Latter-Day Chorus" from the third part of his Dynasts to appear in the first number. There are five stanzas, of which this is the last:

"But—a stirring thrills the air,
As 'twere sounds of joyance there
That the rages
Of the Ages

Time shall cancel, and deliverance offer from the darts that were,
Consciousness the Will expanding, till It fashion all things fair!"

Dr. Fairbairn contributes to this number a long notice of Dale's "History of English Congregationalism," and there is another striking review article on "Modern Tendencies of Religious Thought." Four selected books are noticed, and this is the writer's own conviction:—"The deepest and most penetrating note in the religious movement of to-day, not only in England but all over Europe and America, is a note proclaiming the autonomy of the religious consciousness. The religious idea, in its Christian form, is every day making more and emphatic demands to be liberated from the trammels of all forms of authority external and alien to itself." And he concludes: "Historical criticism has deprived us of some cherished traditional ideas; it has shown that these ideas are not essential elements of the Christian faith. But it has done much by way of compensation. It has made it plain that the mighty figure who stands in the centre of Christian history is not a myth, nor a metaphysical abstraction, but a living historic person, composed of flesh and blood. It has also shown that the life of the religious sentiment is not dependent on infallibilities of any kind, whether in the shape of books, institutions, or creeds. In these fundamental respects it is at one with the deepest presentiments of our age. In these presentiments we see religion walking in freedom, without the crutches of authority; we see it as an autonomous sentiment, like the love of beauty or the thirst for truth; as an indestructible belief, in spite of all appearances, in a Divine purpose at the heart of things."

THERE is to be a Scottish Education Bill, but as it is to deal with questions of food and hygiene we may hope to escape a fresh sectarian battle. There is room for difference of opinion on the points named, but somehow it seems always easier to decide what to do for the bodies of the bairns than for their souls. The proposals of Mr. McKenna's Bill for England and Wales, to which we referred last week, are evidently going to be debated keenly. The Evangelical Free Church Council at Leeds recited again the grievances inflicted by Mr. Balfour's Education Acts, and although many Nonconformists, we imagine, will be disposed to welcome the new measure as affording some little relief, and especially as establishing the principle that distinct denominationalism must not be taught at public expense, there will still be matter for reform when next the Government thinks well to attempt it.

THE PILGRIM FATHERS.

III.—PRAISE OR DISPRAISE?

THE most interesting thing in the State House at Boston is Bradford's "History of Plymouth Plantation." It lies open at the portion wherein is written in quaint character the famous compact signed on the Mayflower. When this manuscript was taken back across the Atlantic from its strange refuge in Fulham Palace, it was received with much ceremony as an act of international courtesy, and it was honoured very rightly as the first document of New England history. Senator Hoar, in his enthusiasm, declared on this occasion, "There is nothing like it in human annals since the story of Bethlehem. This is the original record by the hand of our beloved father and founder. Massachusetts will preserve it until the time shall come that her children are unworthy of it; and that time shall come never."

A photo fac-simile of this manuscript history keeps it within reach of English readers. It is a history in fact as in name, written with personal inside knowledge by the man who governed the colony for over thirty years, and who speaks of it as it actually was under his own eyes. He nothing extenuates, nor sets down aught in malice. And, hence, this chronicle of Bradford's reads not unlike the books of the Pentateuch; it is the Genesis, Exodus, and Judges of the Pilgrim Fathers. Good and evil, saints and sinners, jostle each other at close quarters as in the world at large. To therefore treat the Pilgrims as plaster figures, or to scatter rose-water eulogies over all their deeds, would be to condemn them with empty praise, and to do them careless injustice. On the other hand, to paint them all black because some were not white, would be to make an equal mistake, and to dispraise conspicuous merit. The historic student must discriminate.

To arrive on New England shores and find everyone taking sides as to the merits or demerits of the Pilgrim Fathers was a very unexpected experience. Mr. John D. Long had been delivering an oration on the Three Hundredth Anniversary of the Church at Scrooby in the Pilgrim First Church at Plymouth. In the course of his address, which was appreciative otherwise, he used these words: "Even in this Pilgrim colony the Saints, as I have said, can be counted on the fingers. We are apt to think of it as a little kingdom of heaven on earth. But Bradford's journal shows that its interests were more of this world than of the next, and that its main concern was in beaver skins and clapboards, and in counteracting the impositions in trade of the partners of his business ventures. It is amusing to read of the loving and scriptural phraseology under guise of which the knife of shrewd dicker was stuck into each other's ribs. Some of the very elect entrusted with its affairs were false to the trust, and used their positions to feather their own nests. The first minister sent to it in 1624 was a factious hypocrite, who stirred up strife and was shown to have been a libertine. The second was a cross between a crank and an idiot, and was shipped off in short order. One of the original number was hanged for wilful murder."

If this was spoken seriously and not in "jaunty irony," it is surely an overstatement, and in some particulars quite incorrect. If the Saints could be counted on the fingers, they could never have kept the rest in obedience, or so consistently carried out their ideals; the leaders must have had loyal followers, and their united faith did make a little kingdom of heaven on earth. Moreover, is it not quite unfair, seeing there were material needs to consider, to allege that their interests were more of this world than the next, and that their main concern was money getting? Is it, again, matter for blame, or for credit, that they summarily shipped off back first the hypocrite, and then the crank, who had been sent to stir up strife? As for the wilful murderer, he does not appear to have been one of the original number.

The Pilgrim Fathers will survive triumphantly the revelations of Bradford's History. These neither harm nor wrong their memory, but only bring out more boldly into the light of day their indomitable heroism, undeviating conviction, and practical wisdom in face of the greatest difficulty. "It was no mad crusade," as the speaker admitted, "no pilgrimage made on bare feet, or in shoes sprinkled with pebbles." And chiefly because of later comers, uninspired by the same pure ideals, the new colony became no easy Eden, or dreamy Elysium, or mystic New Jerusalem. No pretty sentimentalism, no paper constitution, could charm into subjection the alien elements of opposition; nothing less than the unswerving righteous discipline of the Puritan who feared God and hated sin. Throughout this heroic undertaking good government prevailed and conquered, so prevailed that Religious Liberty maintained its high faith, so conquered that the Free Church created a Free Commonwealth. The Pilgrim Fathers crossed the sea to seek Civil and Religious Liberty. They sought both; they gained both: That is praise enough.

F. K. F.

WHEREVER a people long persists in living a pure life, with heartfelt worship and reverence for all good, there begin to show themselves great qualities and great loveliness, and through lives well attuned with righteousness both of heart and mind a glorious music as of some heavenly Avilion descends upon quiet mountain valleys and fruitful plains; and prophets and poets arise and shine, and noble womanhood raises heroes both for war and tranquillity, bestowing grace upon every good work. Without religion man cannot raise his head; with religion he begins to live indeed; he enters the element of vitality, the environment of health. And a nation becomes greater and sounder according to the intrinsic truthfulness of the religion which animates it. The spring of religion, like genius, comes forth from the mountains of rectitude. The "ought" of each responds to eternal verity, and leads to the highest good of the whole race.

R. Russell.

SUNDAY SCHOOL REFORM.*—II.

THE last three chapters of Professor Peake's book deal with constructive suggestions for junior and senior classes, and the teacher and the curriculum. With regard to the "less abstract" teaching, which should be given to the younger children, it is remarked that "if we are to have a connected system we ought to select the facts taught in the earlier stages with a view to the ideas that we hope to teach in the later." The "large historical element . . . makes certain parts of the Old Testament peculiarly suited to the capacities of children. And instruction here supplies an excellent basis for what definitely theological teaching is to be given at a later stage. And what is true of the Old Testament is true also of the New. Here, too, religion is inseparably associated with history." When we follow our author into his discussions of the best way of teaching the New Testament, we find differences of theological outlook; but we are certainly with him when he says, e.g., that "Propositions about God and Christ may be unintelligible or misleading to children who have not learnt what definite ideas should be attached to the names"; that, "it is quite possible to have a theological Jesus, who has little in common with the historical Jesus but the name"; that "the vital matter in the construction of a theology is to gain a true conception of God"; and that "it is very necessary for the practice of the Christian life that the standard of Christian character should be studied in its classical expression in the life of Christ." Very wisely, too, is it remarked that, "It is more important that familiarity with the story should be attained than that much time should be spent in expounding it. With many teachers, exposition is likely to mean simply an extravagant dilution of the milk of the Word. Effort should not be expended in saying over again in ten weak sentences what the evangelist contrives to pack into one terse and forcible sentence." The writer suggests ways in which the teacher can make the Gospels, the Acts, and St. Paul's Epistles interesting to his scholars by giving them work to do in searching out, e.g., all that is said about the Apostle Peter in Matthew's Gospel, or Christ's utterances on prayer in Luke, or Paul's account of the dangers and persecutions he had encountered in his ministry, and how many of these are recorded in the Acts. "The teacher," says Mr. Peake, "should continually be practising ingenious devices of this kind." He also urges for young children "the committing to memory of verses or short passages of Scripture selected with extreme care. To store the memory with the choicest and best passages of Scripture, with those that will mean most to the child later, and be most useful to him in times of stress, this is an acquisition of the most valuable kind." Further, Mr. Peake thinks is desirable "to drill the children in the order of books of the Bible." (The word "drill," applied to Sunday-school teaching, turns up more than once in the book, and suggests a rather too military method of instruction.) This order of the books "is a little matter, but it is ridiculous for any one who has passed through the Sunday-school not to be able to find his way about the Bible." Mr. Peake is emphatic in condemnation of a certain type of children's hymns, to be found, no doubt, more in orthodox schools than in our own, though even we know something of the type. "I look back," he says, "with resentment at the Sunday afternoons that used to be spent in learning and practising jingling trash for anniversaries and other functions, the sheer incapacity the hymns betrayed in their authors being matched by the lack of judgment in those who selected them for us to learn." He questions whether the constant reference to heaven in children's hymns "is quite natural, and whether it is not likely to introduce a morbid hot-house quality into religion." In all the teaching of young children, "great care should be taken that the child-like type of piety is preserved. It should be natural and spontaneous, not forced and artificial. There is nothing so beautiful as the piety of a little child, and Jesus never said that little children were to become like us, but that we were to become like little children."

The chapter dealing with senior classes is chiefly remarkable for a rapid but brilliant sketch of the prophetic literature of the Old Testament; "to leave out the prophets," says Professor Peake, "is to miss the heart of the religion of Israel"; and for a further vivid sketch of the spiritual experience of St. Paul. Any attempt at further condensation here would be impracticable; Sunday-school teachers must be referred to the book itself for suggestions as to the way in which difficult parts of the Bible may be dealt with, and their abiding lessons deduced. In this chapter, as elsewhere, one comes across sentences which abide in the memory. Thus, "the chaos of impressions that Bible reading too often produces, would be largely reduced to cosmos by a little attention to chronology." Again, "Paul was a suspected person in the Christian Church, and much of his teaching was cordially disliked by many of his fellow-Christians. He cannot therefore have left himself open to the serious charge that his teaching fundamentally diverged from the teaching of Jesus." And Professor Peake pleads once more very earnestly that a boy "should not be turned defenceless on the world, and unable to give a reason for the faith that is in him."

In his last chapter, our author argues that the Sunday-schools in which he is interested ought not to wait until they have trained teachers before revising their course of instruction. "A bad curriculum remains bad, even when the teacher's efficiency is at its highest point, and when he exerts the healthiest moral and religious influence." On the "very difficult" question whether those who are at present Sunday-school teachers are "incompetent," Professor Peake remarks, "Probably the number of professionally trained teachers constitutes a rather small proportion of the total number of those that remain; there are many who give themselves zealously to the task of self-equipment, and take, with due seriousness, the responsible position in which they are placed. But I fear it is true that it is those who most need training who are least willing to accept it, or are ready to give themselves the labour needed to attain it. It is not to be wondered at if parents often shrink from entrusting the souls of their children to the tender mercies of theological amateurs. Moreover, children who are accustomed to be taught in the day-school by trained teachers are very sensible of the difference when they come into the hands of those whose well-meaning devotion is their only qualification for the work."

The author urges as "another point of importance, the training of theological students, so that when they become ministers they may be prepared to guide the schools that come under their care along right lines. It is important to draw closer the relations between the theological colleges and the Sunday-schools. When the fact has been grasped by the church that the Sunday-school demands from the minister his most assiduous attention and his most watchful care, it will be seen that training in the principles of teaching should constitute an important part of the college curriculum." Teachers' preparation classes, Professor Peake thinks, "are generally conducted on wrong principles." The teacher should not "be crammed for the next Sunday's lesson; what he needs is a basis of general Biblical and theological knowledge." On the questions of children's libraries, it is remarked that everything of the goody-goody type "should be sternly excluded, and all books" (not found, I think in many of our school libraries) "constructed on the principle that good little boys go to heaven at the age of twelve, and that a bad boy's career begins with breaking the Sabbath, and ends with breaking his neck. It is an insult to any intelligent child to offer him such trashy unreality as this." "On the teachers' library," it is urged that "it is worth while to spend generously, always provided that the teachers are willing to use the books." And in a vigorous final paragraph, Mr. Peake points out that "we have in our own hands in a plastic form the material of the church that is to be, easily moulded and quick to take indelible impressions"; and he asks, "Are we content that the training should be perfunctory, inefficient, and altogether inadequate, or is the church prepared to realise what is indeed a fact, that the Sunday-school is its most important institution, calling for enthusiastic service from the best equipped of its members, and for a training planned on the broadest lines and carefully thought out in all its parts?"

Now it may certainly be said that in many, if not most, of our Sunday-schools, we need more systematic teaching, either on such lines as those which commend themselves to Professor Peake, or on other lines, more in accordance with our different theological position. A glance at old volumes of "Teachers' Notes," "The Sunday School Helper" and "The Helper," to say nothing of "Monthly Notes," makes it clear that there is abundant material available for the teacher who desires more consecution in his lessons. From various quarters, indeed, a scheme could probably be made out, carrying an intelligent and responsive class of big boys or girls over a period of three or four years with advantage both to themselves and the teacher; and such a scheme might lead on to a systematic use of some of those manuals published by the Sunday School Association, which are at present too little known and used. Do we need more and newer manuals and helps than those which we already possess but do not always use? Perhaps there are experts who could give hints on this and kindred themes to some of us who feel that even now we are not too old to learn.

* "Reform in Sunday School Teaching." By A. S. Peake, M.A., B.D., Dean of the Faculty of Theology in the University of Manchester. James Clarke & Co. 1s. 6d.)

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

THE Independent Review announces a change of name next month to the Albany Review, with no reason given for the change, but a note that the proprietors and editor will be as heretofore. We have turned with special interest to the article by the Rev. Arthur Galton on "The New Theology of the City Temple," which is, however, more concerned with the larger question of the reasons for theological change than with Mr. Campbell's particular views. Changing views of the universe necessitate changes in theology, and we want to get behind all traditional forms of thought to the realities of life. Thus, with regard to Christ, Mr. Galton says:—"We desire to know above all things what he said and what he thought. We ponder the recorded words, and try to reconstruct the original, the personal, message. We examine the age in which he lived, and try to reconstruct his mind. All this seems to us far more important than the canons of Nicea and the clauses of the Athanasian Creed. By following these clues, we have found a Christ who is very real and living; a Christ who, in Renan's phrase, has the divine ironie, whose piercing and flaming word illuminates everything it touches. If we go straight back to his recorded history, we find the opponent of sacerdotalism, of formalism, of ceremonial and organised religion, of social conventions. We find the Master who spoke always to the individual, and who accomplished his work by teaching and perfecting the individual. For witnessing to these truths, in this manner, he was martyred; but, if we keep to the synoptic Gospels, we do not find in that martyr the conventional Saviour of Augustine, of Calvin, of later Protestant theology. Neither do we find the metaphysical Christ of the early councils, nor the hierarchical Christ of the mediæval church. These notions are not only absent from the primary documents, but cannot easily be reconciled with them. The Christ of the Gospels is the freshest and most original of teachers. He is wholly unlike the metaphysical abstraction of the councils and the theological convention of many treatises of grace. As we read the Gospels we can understand how Christ is the redeemer of human nature, and the revealer of the Father; but we do not find in the synoptic Gospels the conventional soteriology of later theologians. That soteriology, we must confess, does not seem to us either original or exclusively Christian; in some of its aspects, and in many of its traditional expressions, it is connected with the worship of Osiris, of Adonis, of Mithra. These worshipers may bear witness to the desires and needs of human nature, but they do not of themselves guarantee the historical truth of the personages worshipped." Note also in this number Mr. G. M. Trevelyan's article on "A Puritan Henry George," referring to the Digger Movement, and that remarkable mystic and rationalist, Gerrard Winstanley.

In the Contemporary there is a curious article by Mr. T. H. Weir, on "Higher Criticism and the Koran," and what appears to us a more valuable contribution to knowledge, an article by the Rev. C. Delisle Burns on "The Use of Names in the Gospel of St. Mark." Miss Edith Sellers contributes one of her most interesting social study articles, on "The State Children of Hungary." Whatever one may think of the system as a whole, by which the State undertakes the charge of all children not adequately provided for and protected at home, and enforces payment from parents when they have anything to pay, the description of the method of collection, and the boarding out of the children in village communities appears certainly in favourable contrast, not in the matter of economy alone, to our own method.

In the Nineteenth Century and After the Earl of Cardigan makes a strong plea for Reform of the Church of England, Miss Eva Gore-Booth replies to Miss Stephen on the subject of "Women and Politics," and there is a very curious and suggestive article on "English Oral Tradition," by the Rev. G. Monroe Royce, who shows, among other things, how literally true it is that Tenterden steeple was the cause of the Goodwin Sands!

The World's Work has for frontispiece this month a striking portrait of President Roosevelt. An article on "Roosevelt: A Force for Righteousness," is followed by another, fully illustrated, with some fascinating pictures, on "The Twentieth Century for Canada." Note also the article on "The Triumphs of the Tunnel Builders," and that on "The Manchester Charlottenburg."

In the March Connoisseur will be found some interesting pictures of Norwich Corporation plate and other treasures of that ancient city.

WOMEN'S SUFFRAGE.

SIR,—I have waited for some time hoping that other and abler pens than mine might take some notice of the late unconstitutional conduct of the ladies who now, I understand, call themselves the pioneers of the Women's Suffrage movement.

I have, from the beginning of that movement, felt in strong sympathy with it, but I am constrained to say that recent events have shaken my mind not a little as to the fitness of a good many women to be trusted with responsibilities which, at the very outset, rest on respect for the laws of the country. I have yet to learn that law-breaking is a qualification for claiming a share in law-making, and I am amazed and greatly disappointed at the marked absence of that general, whole-hearted, vigorous protest which I confidently expected the original and real pioneers of the cause to make, and which I think ought to have been made.

The defiant attitude of the so-called "Suffragettes" has certainly given a good handle to those who hold that the suffrage movement is sure to unsex women.

I am surprised that, in the eagerness to obtain the franchise, the privileges and duties of educational government, and the fact that these have been withdrawn from women, in spite of their having fulfilled them with admittedly exceptional ability, seem to have been quite lost sight of. Surely the municipal and educational area supplies the preparation for and the key to the larger responsibility; and it seems to me that much more good would be done by making an earnest effort to regain the position lost there, than by demanding in this defiant and lawless spirit the immediate grant of the suffrage to women, in spite of the evident fact that Society in general, and women in particular, are not ripe for the event.

THE BOSTON CONFERENCE FUND.

SIR,—The fund for rendering assistance to ministers towards the travelling expenses in attending the meeting of the International Council at Boston, U.S.A., now amounts to about £900. Grants of £20 have already been allocated to forty ministers, and there are several names awaiting decision.

The Committee of Selection have endeavoured to give the first chance to ministers who have been at work a certain number of years, especially those who have rendered service to the denomination in their respective districts. Some well-to-do congregations will probably wish to contribute to the expenses of sending their own ministers, apart from the fund.

There are a few more ministers who have expressed a desire to attend the meetings at Boston, to whom the Committee would be pleased to make a grant if additional resources were placed at their disposal. Owing to the regretted illness of Dr. C. Herbert Smith, donations to the fund should be forwarded to me as Hon. Secretary.

H. B. LAWFORD.

12, New Court, Carey Street, W.C.

March 5, 1907.

We are asked to state that there has been unexpected delay in issuing the booklet giving particulars of sailings, but Messrs. Thomas Cook & Son will supply copies this week. All who have already sent their names and addresses to the Secretary at Essex Hall will receive a copy by post. The booklet will be forwarded on application to anyone who thinks of making the journey across the Atlantic with the object of attending the meetings of the International Council at Boston in September.

OBITUARY.

MR. HODGSON PRATT.

THERE was a large gathering at Highgate Cemetery on Monday afternoon for the funeral of Mr. Hodgson Pratt, including representatives of the International Peace and Arbitration Society and the Workmen's Club and Institute Union, with which Mr. Hodgson Pratt was very closely associated. At the conclusion of the service, Mr. Green, secretary of the former Association, at the request of Mrs. Hodgson Pratt, added a few words of tribute, and said that the dominant characteristic of Mr. Hodgson Pratt's nature had been that of repression of self. Never had there been a man who had thrown himself into the cause of humanity and progress with more unselfishness and greater purity of purpose.

The service was conducted by the Rev. J. Page Hopps, who gave the following address:—"Once more we stand before the hiding veil, and think of one who has just passed beyond it. To him, at the moment of his passing, it might truly have been said:—

'Spirit nearing yon dark portal at the limit of thy human state, Fear not thou the hidden purpose of that Power which alone is great;
Nor the myriad world, His shadow; nor
The silent Opener of the Gate.'

"He, of all men, had no need to fear 'the silent Opener of the Gate'—silent, perhaps, but pleasant for him: and surely his welcome was the great beatitude, 'Blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called the children of God,' and 'Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God.' Our friend was one of those who carried forward into our day the beautiful simple religiousness of a past generation; and there was something both winsome and touching in his childlike faith; something winsome and touching also in his wonder that all men did not see the light as he did. That sometimes made him a little unhappy, and there were times when his wonder deepened into pain, but he never lost the exquisite gentleness of his own beautiful and radiant trust. During his last illness he said: 'The whole cause of my work, its mainspring and source, has been that I always loved God. I cannot understand how people can live without Him.' When he knew that he should not recover, and after completing a little business, he said, 'And now we need think of nothing but the goodness, the great goodness, of God.' There was something very tender and gentle in all this, but his courage was as remarkable as his gentleness: Whoever flinched he stood firm; whoever doubted he hoped; whoever went back he 'still bore up and steered right onward.' A good soldier he! Indeed there are some features of Wordsworth's 'Happy Warrior' which are quite as true of this splendid fighter for peace:—
'Who, with a natural instinct to discern
What knowledge can perform is diligent to learn;
Abides by this resolve and stops not there,
But makes his moral being his chief care.
Who comprehends his trust, and, to the same,
Keeps faithful with a singleness of aim;
And therefore does not stoop, nor lie in wait

For wealth or honours or for wordly state.
Whose powers shed round him in the common strife,

Or mild concerns of ordinary life,
A constant influence, a peculiar grace;
But who, if he be called upon to face
Some awful moment to which Heaven has joined

Great issues, good or bad for human kind,
Is happy as a lover; and attired
With sudden brightness, like a man inspired,
And, through the heat of conflict, keeps the law

In calmness made, and sees what he foresaw;

Or, if an unexpected call succeed,
Come when it will is equal to the need:
Who, not content that former worth stand fast,

Looks forward, persevering to the last,
From well to better, daily self-surpass.'

"So we may say, with another 'Happy Warrior'; 'We do not commiserate, we congratulate him.' Happy indeed is he who is associated in men's minds with the Prince of Peace and the Sermon on the Mount!—a true Christ-man. He also sympathised with the poor in spirit, the unaggressive souls. He was sorry for the mourners. He saw the future triumph of the gentle spirits. He consorted with those who hungered and thirsted after righteousness. He loved and blessed the merciful. He saw God, with all the pure in heart. His gracious soul was always happy with the peacemakers. He sorrowed and suffered with the persecuted for righteousness' sake. In all this he was Christ's man to the full; and the advance-guard seems to be so much the poorer to-day for the loss of him. I say 'seems,' because we really have not lost him. It would be almost unbearable to think that this is the end of such a spirit and the finish of such a life; almost unbearable if we were only mourners to-day; but that is not so. Ours is not a heartless Mother Nature, or a wasteful God. This good man lives, and he will get what Tennyson called his 'Wages,' not the selfish bliss of an isolated Heaven, but 'The glory of going on and still to be.' So, from that inner world, of finer forces, and brighter light, and deeper knowledge, and fuller power, he will work still and will help us. May we follow in his footsteps, carry on the work he loved, and be mindful of his presence; and press on, as he did, through good or evil report, faithful to the end!"

MR. HENRY BLESSLEY.

ON Friday, March 1, in his seventy-sixth year, there passed away one of the active, earnest Unitarian workers in the south of England. Mr. Henry Blessley held an appointment in the dockyards at Portsmouth, and on his retirement, now many years ago, he started business as a pianoforte and music seller at Landport. He took a keen interest in public affairs, and served on the School Board and the Town Council of Portsmouth. In connection with the Unitarian Chapel in High-street, he rendered devoted service as secretary of the congregation, and his interest in Sunday-school work was deep and keen. He taught a group of boys in John Pounds' old boot shop on Sunday afternoons for a number of years.

The Southern Unitarian Association received from Mr. Blessley long and able service. He was the hon. secretary for many years, and was always ready to go anywhere or do anything for the promotion of the faith he held so dear. In recent years his health had failed him, but those who remember him at his best know how diligently he laboured, and with what whole-hearted eagerness he gave himself to missionary work in the south of England. He was a member of the council of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and regularly attended its meetings. Henry Blessley was one of those earnest, eager, practical workers, whose devotion and unselfishness make for progress in religion, strengthening the good, and overcoming the evil of the world:

ALDERMAN JAMES BIBBY.

WE greatly regret to record the death of Alderman James Bibby, of Burnley, which occurred suddenly, from heart failure, at the Barracks Station, on Wednesday morning, Feb. 27. There had been some warnings of failing health, but Mr. Bibby was about his business as usual that morning, and the call came to him swiftly, as he had hoped. He was in his sixty-eighth year. A native of Padiham, he began life as a weaver boy, and early became a loom overlooker, and in that capacity went out, as a young man, to Bombay. On his return, for reasons of health, he and his father began business at Burnley, and in time built up an extensive business as paper bag manufacturers. He was also engaged in the cotton trade. He leaves a fine record of public work in the town, having served for fifteen years with great ability and devotion as a guardian, and since 1888 in the Town Council. James Bibby was one of the first boys in the Unitarian Sunday-school at Burnley, his father and uncle having been chief among those who helped to establish the congregation, and throughout life he was devoted to its interests. At the time of his death he was chairman of the congregation, and its representative on the committee of the North and East Lancashire Unitarian Mission.

At the funeral, on Saturday, there was a large and representative gathering. The service was conducted in the Trafalgar-street chapel by the Rev. J. M. Whiteman, who paid a warm tribute to the memory of their friend, and spoke of the high position he held in the town. The loss of such a man both to the public life of Burnley and to his church is very great.

THE LATE MISS LEWIN:

THE March Calendar of the Hope-street Church, Liverpool, contains the following note. A memorial notice of Miss Lewin appeared in the INQUIRER of February 2. The note is headed: "The Death of the oldest Member of Hope-street Church.—Mr. Roberts, taking as his subject, 'Ninety Years of Life,' on Sunday morning, February 3, spoke of the long life of usefulness of Mary Ann Lewin, who died on January 27; and of the changes in the national life, and in the congregational life, which she had seen, since her birth the year after the Battle of Waterloo;

The great inspiration of her life was James Martineau, the evolution of whose religious thinking she witnessed, and heard proclaimed from the pulpit of Hope-street Church. Equipped by his breadth of outlook and the example of his beautiful spirituality, she in her turn became a teacher. She appears in the Sunday school annals as a teacher for the first time in 1852, while Martineau's inspiring influence was still around her; and in 1858 she became superintendent at both morning and afternoon school. "Those who knew her can picture her, devoted in her self-imposed duty; walking down on Sunday morning from Oxton to Woodside Ferry; crossing the river; ascending the hill to this building; arriving for school at a quarter-past nine; never missing; and never late. Service in church followed. Then a meal, in company with one or two other faithful adherents, was partaken of in the lecture-room. Then came afternoon school. Thus, for a period measured in decades, this devoted servant of this Church went in and out, week by week, year by year, without a thought of praise, or acknowledgment, or self, or fatigue, or of aught but the sacred duty she had taken it in her hand to do. And it is good to think that it is not only we who come after her, who recall her vaguely to-day. Her example of steadfast loyalty and earnestness has inspired several men and women with the like; who are proud to call themselves her pupils; and who to this day are staunch lovers of this Church and of its cause. We give God thanks for her and for them. So shines a devoted life in men's hearts and in the world."

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co. announce a new novel by Mr. Arthur Paterson, "John Glynn: a Story of Social Work," to be ready in the course of a few weeks. It is concerned with life in the East-End of London, and is dedicated by permission to the Princess of Wales, whose interest in social problems is well known. Mr. Paterson has had twenty years' experience as an official of the Charity Organisation Society, and has therefore a first-hand knowledge of the conditions of life in which the characters of his new story are cast.

THE recent meeting of the Provincial Assembly of London and the South-Eastern Counties at Mansford-street was thoroughly successful, and we trust that the same may be said of the meeting to be held at Effra-road, Brixton, next Thursday evening. The President, the Rev. F. H. Jones, and the Revs. F. K. Freeston, W. C. Pope, and W. J. Jupp are the announced speakers.

THE gymnastic competition, to which we referred last week in the report of the Laymen's Club dinner, is to be held, we understand, at Essex Hall, not at Essex Church, on Thursday evening, March 21. On the previous evening, Wednesday, March 20, is the annual meeting of the Mansford-street Church and Mission, and on Tuesday evening, March 19, the annual meeting of the Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

How difficult we find it to sit still, and how we all enjoy movement! The sitting still is often the hardest part of school, and we welcome any change of lessons that gives us a chance of moving about, or any game that gives us exercise all together. Besides moving about, we enjoy moving forward, going on and on without having to turn back. How delightful were our early rides of any sort, in a cart, or a trap, an omnibus, tram or train. And what an event our first real journey to a new place!

Our delight in movement, in going on, makes part of our delight in music. You will understand what I mean by a good going-on tune. In hymn-singing there is the movement in the music itself, and the delight also in going on to better things beyond—on towards the ideal. The going-on in the music helps the wish to go on in our lives too. We begin so early our games of riding, and driving, and travelling, that it seems quite natural in hymns to think of ourselves as travellers, and to use the picture language of a journey.

In the days when our chairs were turned into an omnibus or train on week-days and into pulpit and pews on Sundays, our favourite hymn pictured life as a journey.

"Children of the heavenly king,
As ye journey, sweetly sing."

There were no hymns specially for children in our old hymn-book, and I remember singing only one other.

"God is love, his mercy brightens
All the path in which we rove."

We knew those two hymns by heart and never tired of them. The words were so familiar, and we were so at home in the picture of life as a journey, that I fancy we scarcely noticed at all that there was any picture language. Indeed, in the second hymn, I don't remember noticing until now the picture of our wandering along the path of life. The first words of the hymn mean so much that they spread away beyond any picture in our minds, and before the end of the verse any faint picture we imagined, is forgotten—wiped out in the brightness of the last line.

Now, that is just what should happen with all the picture language in our hymns. We make the pictures with our imaginations to suggest something beyond the picture. In some ways life is like a journey, but it is more than a journey, and we cannot fill in many details, particulars in our picture, without finding that the picture is too small. "God is love" is the beginning and the end of this hymn, just as it is the beginning and the end of the first verse, and we may say, too, that it is the beginning and the end of all our hymn singing.

These words God is love hold more of the beyond than can any of our picture language. It is so with our picture of the good shepherd, and we shall find it so again, with our picture of travellers on life's journey.

Picture language in hymns is like a picture on a stained glass window—it is bright and beautiful because we look through the picture towards the light beyond. Unless the light is beyond the picture, we can see nothing of its meaning.

Some of you may know the old story of the "Pilgrim's Progress," which used to be such a favourite with all children. I fancy it does not mean so much to us now as it did to our grandparents long ago. For us the picture of the pilgrims is too dark. It does not let through enough of the light beyond—the light of God's love. We find other pictures help us more.

Now in what ways is life like a journey? Are we all really travellers? Some folk travel much and others very little or not at all. Can a bed-ridden person be a traveller? We saw how imagination can take us to other places and also to other times. We can use our picture language of "travelling" for the way we move in our lives from one time to another, from yesterday to to-day, from to-day to to-morrow. We all travel forward through our to-days into our to-morrows, and we cannot turn back, except in memory. And at last we each come to the end of our days—to the end of our life journey here. And what is beyond we call eternity.

Do you know the poem beginning
"Where do you come from, baby dear?"

Out of the everywhere into here."
It would also be true, though it does not make a good rhyme, if we said,

"Where do you come from, baby mine?"

Out of eternity into time!"

We all travel out of the everywhere into here, out of eternity into time.

We are all fellow-travellers on that journey back into eternity. As you sing in the hymn,

"Ye are travelling home to God,
In the way the fathers trod."

Some folk who travel on foot grow footsore with much walking, whilst even those who ride sometimes find long journeys tiring. Some—though not young folk—get very tired of life, and look forward to the end of the long journey when they may find rest, and more than rest, as our hymn says:

"All journeys end in welcomes to the weary,

And heaven, the heart's true home,
Will come at last."

Young people mostly enjoy life as they enjoy travelling. For them, and for us all, heaven is not only a long way off at the end of the journey, but is also here, and now—Jesus taught us that the Kingdom of Heaven is within. If we are faithful and follow our inward guide, and choose the right path in life, we may feel at home with God during our life's journey, even whilst, we look forward to a better life in the beyond.

Amongst the hymns containing pictures of life as a journey with God as our guide are:

"Courage, brother, do not stumble, Though thy path be dark as night."

and

"He leads us on by paths we did not know."

Last of all, will you try to remember always that we are all fellow-travellers on the same journey. It is not only the owners of carts and traps, of horses and carriages, that can give "a lift on the way" to their fellow-travellers. The picture of a "lift on the way" may mean much, like "a cup of cold water." As the song says, we may "lay the dust with kindness." "And a friendly word can sometimes give a lift on the way."

COLLECTIVE OWNERSHIP.

MANY of our readers, we trust, have been interested, as we have been, in the discussion on the ethical significance of collective ownership, which has been going on for some weeks in these columns. It began with Mr. RICHARD ROBINSON'S article on Jan. 12, and he and two other friends add some final words this week. For the discussion, we think, has now been going on long enough. Not that it is concluded, or that either side has convinced the other. We do not for a moment suppose that to be the case. A discussion of this kind never is really concluded, for it is concerned with life, which is in the process of growth, and the conclusion can only be arrived at when, after the testing of conflicting theories through the experience of many generations it is seen what has actually taken place. But this discussion has served its purpose if it has quickened interest in the vital questions touched upon, and led earnest minds to further investigation and study. It has set before us the ideal aspirations of convinced Socialists after juster and happier conditions for our common life, in which the nobler qualities of human nature may have fuller play than is possible under present conditions except to the favoured few, and it has set us thinking, amid the large promise of that happier state, how things would really work out in the great movements of production and commerce, by what steps in the community of nations approaches might be made to such a state, or whether, perhaps, the fears expressed on the other side may not have some ground in them, that the attempt might lead to national disaster. But with great skill we have been reminded of steps already taken towards collective ownership and management, and the significance of the contrast between a huge trust held and manipulated in the interest of a number of wealthy owners and another in the interest of a whole community has been pressed on our attention. The question of the supply of electricity to London may well serve as a case in point.

TOWARDS SOCIAL REFORM.

COLLECTIVE OWNERSHIP: ITS ETHICAL SIGNIFICANCE.

I do not think that Mr. Simon's position is a sound one. We have but emphatically to deny that "municipal management inevitably drifts into the hands of autocratic officials imperfectly supervised by elected representatives of increasingly limited capacity," and the whole of his argument that follows falls to the ground, until he proves that such results "inevitably" or even usually follow.

If his economical premises are wrong, what about his historical illustrations? Ancient Peru was not a Socialist State. "The Government of Peru," says Prescott, "was a despotism, mild in its character, but in its form a pure and unmitigated despotism." "The sovereign was placed at an immeasurable distance above his subjects; he was, in short, in the well-known phrase of the European despot, himself the State." (Mr. Simon mentions Cortes, the Mexican conqueror, but he, no doubt, means Pizarro.)

It seems to me that Mr. Simon, and Mr. Rawlins too, conjure up before their minds a figure of the State as a Government Office given up to officialism and red tape—"a director," says Mr. Rawlins, "to whom we must yield implicit, absolute obedience"; in which "a man," says Mr. Simon, "is obliged to please those set over him, and equally obliged to keep those below him to their appointed tasks."

It must be said at once that Socialists consider this sort of thing to be the product of modern party Government, but repudiate it as impossible under a regime of their own. For what is the State? It is the entire community, ourselves and fellow men and women, and when we become sufficiently enlightened to choose by a majority entire and absolute self-government, we shall surely also be in a position and in the mind to see to it that such a government and such an industrial organisation shall be carried on for the public benefit, and subject to the influence of a healthy public opinion. I quote Professor Henry Jones, who has been appealed to already in this correspondence—"I do not doubt for a moment who our ruler is about to be in State and City. It is public opinion."

"A really Socialistic State," Mr. Simon goes on to say, "would be an organisation covering, directing, and limiting all the most trivial as well as the most important details and events in the daily life of all men and women, and inevitably reducing all things to a dead level of drab monotony." Mr. Simon may be surprised to hear that this dire conclusion is the very thing that Socialism would save us from. It is the effect which the present organisation of industry is producing for a very large number of our fellow men and fellow women. Ceaseless, monotonous toil through day, and restless sleep in bad air at night, "a dead level of drab monotony" indeed.

What, as briefly as possible, is the ideal towards which we strive, which we believe is eminently practical and feasible? It is, in the words describing the objects of the three Socialist organisations of this country (with very slight alteration or additions),

"an industrial Commonwealth founded upon the socialisation of Land and Capital." By this means we believe it to be possible, by a moderate exercise of power and faculty in the common service, to be earning our own livelihood, and at the same time assisting the community to provide a sufficiency for all; while the individual would be set free to develop his own gifts and faculties in the best possible way—not, indeed, that he may gain material advantage over another, not so as to enable him to obtain any power over that other's livelihood or equal liberty, but that he may more efficiently devote himself to the welfare and the enjoyment of his fellows.

One thing is certain to my mind, and I do not believe that in stating it I am "girding against trade." The individual competition of man against man as producer, transporter, distributor, is rapidly disappearing, the competition is fast becoming one between different masses of capital, driven together for mutual protection and aggression; we are in the hands of the "trusts" and the limited companies, whether we like it or not, much more than the majority of people know, and are destined to be so still more as time goes on. And why? Because the Combination is a more effective, efficient industrial organisation. The guess-work production and haphazard distribution of individual competition does become by the combination a little more intelligently directed and carefully organised. Against these combinations the individual trader cannot live; he has to seek a company of his own, and preserve his position in that way.

The question is, Has this movement any ethical significance for us? and which of the forms of industrial organisation are we to favour? I ventured to express the opinion that, while I saw reason for hope, from an ethical point of view, in the transition of trade from individual competition to combinations of capital, I saw still more promise of better things in the public ownership of industry, tried, tested, and approved already, and advancing, I believe, despite temporary ebbs and flows of public opinion, to triumph in the future.

I reserve my final word for a phrase which is frequently used in this connection, and more than once in this correspondence, the "survival of the fittest," "the law which runs through the world," Mr. Simon says. What Mr. Simon and most of those who use it in common argument apparently mean is the survival of those who are best and strongest, morally and spiritually, the most complete specimens of humanity. But the phrase first found its meaning in a different way, did it not? It was applied, I think, to those creatures who most readily adapted themselves to their environment, who "fitted" into the particular niche in which they found themselves—chose, in fact, the line of least resistance. But this is surely a very different thing. As a matter of history the "fittest" do not, as a rule, survive; they fling their lives away against some gigantic wrong or abuse in the world, and wear themselves out before their time. Do we admire those who wish to survive at the cost of the lives of other men and women? Who would not rather be strong enough to perish that others may live? To such an appeal the common heart of humanity seldom fails to respond in admiration it not in action.

The great ethical significance of the movement towards public ownership lies in the recognition of the scientific fact of the superiority of mutual aid over destructive competition for the preservation of the finer types of humanity, and the adoption of the Christian ideal of the perfect joy and happiness to be found in the self-forgetting, self-denying service of all for the common good.

RICHARD ROBINSON.

SIR,—Like all strong individualists, Mr. Simon is great on the subject of our social improvements, and, like most of them too, he seems quite unconscious of any cause for the improvement but the operation of "Nature's law"—competitive antagonism, and the survival of the fittest. He says that if we look round we find far more generally diffused wealth, comfort, health, ease, morality, and all else that is good everywhere.

Now, take any one of these improvements and just look at the facts. Take the first on the list—the better diffusion of wealth. Nobody questions that the average wages for all workers has very materially advanced of late years. But what is the cause of that? Why, simply that all the élite of British workmen have had the sense to perceive that by grappling with each other in competitive strife they were continually keeping down their wages and tending to lower them. They therefore dropped their competition among themselves and bonded themselves together in unions. They abandoned the very principle to which Mr. Simon attributes all the improvement, and, while practically all disunited workers have found competition keener and wages always tending downwards, the trade-unionists alone have made such advance as very materially to raise the average earning power of the whole mass, united and disunited. All the skilled workmen in England give up their individualism and consolidate themselves in great organised bodies, and it enables them so to increase their wealth that Mr. Simon is able to trot them out in evidence that "individualism is not a ghastly failure, but a well-trying friend worth keeping"! I would undertake to go through Mr. Simon's list of improvements—health, comfort, ease, morality, and so on—and show in the same way that every step of advance has been taken by some similar abandonment or curtailment of individualism and by some extension of that social solidity which is the essence of Socialism.

In referring to what I said in my last article about inventors and their rewards, Mr. Simon says that I forget that under Socialism "all wealth would belong to the State, and that no man could have material advantages over another." We have here just what I complained of in Mr. Rawlins's article. He assumes that we are all "under Socialism" to the very uttermost extent. All wealth is in the hands of "the State," and everybody is on a dead level with everybody else. And when in this Ultima Thule of social development some brilliant inventor appears and doubles the productive power of some important industry, all the resources of "the State" cannot provide a suitable reward for him! "And this," says Mr. Simon, "is another instance of how little Socialists know about Socialism." The fact is, Sir, I am a modest man, and do not pretend to be able to see more than about five hundred years or so ahead. All the bogies conjured up by our Individualist friends are just of this same kind. They imagine a completely realised Socialism, and then confuse themselves and their readers by introducing the problems and difficulties of the old selfish scramble.

GEORGE F. MILLIN.

Brixton, March 3.

We have also received another long communication on this subject from Mr. John Edwards (President of the Liverpool Fabian Society), but from this we can only afford space for a few passages: Mr. Edwards, referring, as Mr. Robinson does, to Mr. Simon's apparent confusion of Cortes with Pizarro, quotes Prescott as to the actual condition of Peru:—

"The Spaniards who first visited the country are emphatic in their testimony that no government could have been better suited to the genius of the people, and no people could have appeared more contented with their lot or more devoted to their Government." And, again: "When Pizarro obtained possession of Cuzco, he found a country well advanced in the arts of civilisation, institutions under which the people lived in tranquility and personal safety; the mountains and the uplands whitened with flocks; the valleys teeming with the fruits of a scientific husbandry; the granaries and warehouses filled to overflowing; the whole land rejoicing in its abundance; and the character of the nation, softened under the influence of the mildest and most innocent form of superstition, well prepared for the reception of a higher and a Christian civilisation." "No man could be rich, no man could be poor, in Peru; but all might enjoy, and did enjoy, a competence."

And Mr. Edwards continues: Mr. Simon proclaims Peru the most perfect example of State Socialism. If it was so, it refutes all that he has argued respecting the "sterility" of the public service. Here in Peru, cut off from European civilisation, the Incas devised the most wonderful inventions. They had magnificent roads, while those of Europe were quagmires. Their post was in operation centuries before 1606, when "Lord Stanhope obtained a patent" for a monopolistic postal service.

Mr. Simon complains that my simple instances quoted in refutation of his ill-considered generalisation, "all bureaucrats are necessarily sterile," are not of sufficient importance: The smallest offspring, however, is sufficient to disprove the charge of barrenness. But there are larger matters which have originated in the enterprise of public service: The docks of Liverpool, already mentioned in this controversy, were conceived by the municipality. When the first dock in the world was opened at Liverpool, in 1715, it was a bold and original scheme, but its projectors could hardly have then foreseen the enormous stimulus which their conception was to give to the world's commerce.

In this connection, and in view of what has been said upon the necessity of stimulating invention by special monetary reward, it is well to remember that the evidence we have does not show that love of gain is the motive in the great steps in industrial progress. "The love of science, the pure delight of mechanical invention, the attainment of some slight personal convenience in labour, and mere chance, play the largest part in the history of industrial improvements. These motives would be as equally operative under State-control as under private enterprise" (Hobson's "Evolution of Modern Capital," page 363).

Our discussion has wandered far from its original purpose, which was to ascertain the ethical significance of collective ownership. Mr. Rawlins and Mr. Simon have given free play to imagination in depicting consequences which do not necessarily follow from public ownership of the great means of industry. It may, therefore, be permitted to one who is not afraid of change to offer another view. This may be as far from realisation as theirs, but it is at least as possible.

The zest for individual gain, which is said to animate human beings to-day, being eliminated under Socialism, a man may be expected to look upon his neighbour in a new light. At present every man is a "competitor," an "employer," or a "customer." The human characteristics are hidden under these economic disguises. In the future he will see only brethren. If there is work to be done, all hands will be ready to help: They will not stop to ask how much money someone will give them for it; they will rejoice in the work and its accomplishment. Sweating, the degradation of women, the premature toil of little children, the cheating of the Exchange, the adulteration of food, will be unknown under Socialism, because they would bring damage and loss to the community and gain to no one. Human life will rise in the scale of values, and property fall to its appropriate subordinate position. When men die, their worth will be estimated, not in figures under the heading of "recent wills," but in the good deeds they have wrought for their fellows. Men will smile at the quaint conceit of a former time which supposed people to be animated in industrial production, not by the joy of creation and the enjoyment of the produce, but by the struggle for private possession—the desire to hold something for self as against the world. What monstrous egoists this old system makes of us! The foolishness and extravagance of it all are only to be paralleled by the international wars and fears of attack which cause nations to waste lives and treasure in battle and preparations for battle.

It is said that life would be monotonous, that progress would cease, that humanity would degenerate! It is an axiom that the satisfaction of one want breeds another. So long as the struggle for existence is intense it occupies the whole of life. Literature, science, art, and religion are avenues trodden by a select few:

To the bulk of the population they are an unexplored territory. In the Socialist state the necessary duties of material production would take a secondary place in our daily life. These things would appear not as the chief business of life, but as a preliminary to the enjoyment of life. We should not live to labour, but labour to live. So the old antagonisms would slip out of view; profit-making and selling would become as dishonourable as pocket-picking; our customers whom we now cheat, our employers whom we now hate, and our neighbours whom we now fight with savagely in the economic prize-ring, would become our friends and companions. Competition of a sort we should still have, but it would have none of the bite and sting of the older kind. When there was a bit of work to be done, there would be a good deal of emulation amongst the craftsmen in the fashion and quality of the thing. There would be pride of skill and joy in distinction. Almost for the first time since the Middle Ages a man would be able to express his own individuality in his work. Those who oppose the new scheme of things call themselves individualists; but if they could rid themselves of economic prejudice they would see that Socialism offers them all they really long for: freedom, individuality, variety, the guarantee of continued progress. No words could more fitly describe the hope that wells up in the heart of the Socialist than those of John Milton, typical individualist and strenuous lover of freedom:

Truth from the earth, like to a flower,
Shall bud and blossom then;
And Justice from her heavenly bower
Look down on mortal men.

JOHN EDWARDS.

SOME LONGFELLOW NOTES.

THE Longfellow Centenary celebration last week called forth some very genuine tributes of gratitude and admiration.

One of the pleasantest of these was from the Bishop of Durham, in a letter to the Spectator. Having referred to the criticism and somewhat patronising appreciation of Longfellow in one of the February reviews, Dr. Moule wrote:—

"I must confess, for my part, to a recent access of delight in his thought and diction, during a short time of enforced leisure, and of that sort of fatigue which asks for literature at once charming in form and gentle with the gentleness which comes not of the weakness, but the sweetness, of the mind. I went over much of his verse long familiar, some of it familiar through my whole life, and also over certain poems, 'The Hanging of the Crane' among them, which I had not happened to know before. The tranquil but penetrating charm, quite of its own kind, laid a new hold on me. He 'found me,' in the very spirit of his own beautiful poem of long ago, 'The Day is Done.' And continually I was struck, not only with the sweet fulness of the poetry, but with its frequent brilliancy and perfection of diction. The reviewer referred to above is pitiless on the hexameters of 'Evangeline,' which 'can hardly be read by anyone with an ear.' I ought to be humiliated in finding that to me the metre seems to be handled by Longfellow quite as well as by Goethe; both write it in a style no doubt totally different from the magic of Latin and of Virgil; but with both it is the living vehicle of perfect narrative and reflection. Only a true master of verse could have written the 'Atchafalaya' scene and the last few pages. And then, what a man he must have been—son, husband, father, friend, and helper of the helpless! Take the poet and the poems together, and I do not know where to look in the English literature of the whole nineteenth century for quite so beautiful an ensemble."

To this appreciation the Editor of the Spectator added the following note:—

"It is a great pleasure to publish the Bishop of Durham's appreciation of Longfellow. Though there is a monotony of cadence in the 'Evangeline' hexameters, which, in our opinion, places them metrically below those of Clough and of Kingsley, they have many beauties; and if we consider them in connection with the trochaics of 'Hiawatha,' it must be admitted that Longfellow was a master of unrhymed verse. We are confident that the Bishop's letter will give keen satisfaction to thousands of readers, not only here, but in America."

The first article in the Literary Supplement to the first number of the Nation last Saturday is devoted to Longfellow, and we will quote here the opening of this article and its concluding passages:—

"The centenary of Longfellow's birth draws our attention to a poet whose success has told most against his true reputation. That success, indeed, has been great; to this day he sells more freely than any poet but Tennyson. The question which most people who care for poetry will ask is, how did he come by this enormous popularity? But there is another question, much more difficult to answer, the question how the author of 'Excelsior,' and 'The Psalm of Life,' and 'The Wreck of the Hesperus' also wrote poetry like this:—

'And silver white the river gleams,
As if Diana, in her dreams,
Had dropt her silver bow
Upon the meadows low.'

"He could tell a tale in verse, when it was a good tale, as well as any modern poet except William Morris. 'King Robert of Sicily,' for instance, is a fine piece of straightforward narrative. Then as he grew old the thought of death became real to him, and all the disabilities of old age; and he wrote about them with a quiet courage and simplicity that are very moving. That he was a true poet is proved by the fact that life did not lose its romance for him with years. Indeed, he saw the true romance of life more clearly than in his youth. The poem on 'The Village Blacksmith' is a pretty thing, but not so good as the poem which he wrote long afterwards on an armchair made out of the blacksmith's chestnut tree.

'There by the blacksmith's forge, beside the street,
Its blossoms white and sweet
Enticed the bees, until it seemed alive,
And murmured like a hive.'

This is like Cowper, but free from his sickness of mind. Then there is the poem on Burns, with its expression of the tender gratitude of an old man to one whose music had enchanted his youth:—

'His presence haunts this room to-night,
A form of mingled mist and light,
From that far coast.
Welcome beneath this roof of mine;
Welcome, this vacant chair is thine,
Dear guest and ghost.'

But of all the poems of his last years the most moving is 'Autumn Within,' with its quiet submission to the ebb of life:—

'There is silence: the dead leaves
Fall and rustle, and are still;
Beats no flail upon the sheaves,
Comes no murmur from the mill.'

This kind of experience comes to most poets, if not all, when they have lost the power of expressing it. We have but little poetry of old age written by the aged. Few have kept the heart of youth long enough to be lyrical about their own grey hairs. Landor was one of them and Longfellow another, and for this reason alone both should keep a sure place among our poets."

The Christian Register of February 21 is largely a Longfellow number. One editorial concludes as follows:—

"To the students in Harvard College forty years ago the mere presence of Lowell and Longfellow in the streets of the town, in the recitation rooms of the college, and in the thoughts of men were of themselves a liberal education. They suggested possibilities never to be forgotten. Their calmness and serenity, their enjoyment of all that in human life and thought was clean, pure, strong, and exhilarating, made many ordinary pursuits seem tame and many of the prizes of what is called success contemptible. When Longfellow was translating the Divina Commedia, and Lowell on Thursday morning told his class what he and Parsons and Longfellow thought and said the night before concerning the canto in Dante which was the lesson for the day, the thoughtless boys, and the thoughtful ones, assembled there learned something of the meaning of the higher life never to be forgotten. Through them as well as through the readers of their works a world-wide influence has been exerted, and one that will not cease so long as on its circuit round the sun the earth bears its burden of human hopes and fears, of love and longing, with aspirations towards a realm of life in which the dreams of earth have their fruition."

Another article on "Longfellow, the Poet of the Young" opens with a description of a young girl sitting at work with a volume of the poet on her knee, learning passages from "Evangeline" by heart. The greater poets do not appeal to her, she says: "But my dear Longfellow just suits my little, commonplace soul. Not that he is commonplace any more than the blue sky, the daisy meadow, sweet-smelling grass, white sailing clouds, or chirping young birds. He is like these to me: he rests and refreshes me. He has no awful problems for me to solve, no knotty philosophy, no pessimistic wails, but is just like out-of-doors with its brooks and waving trees and fresh breezes."

And the article goes on.

"Here is a youthful estimate of Longfellow that pretends to no wisdom, no deep critical acumen, no profound insight: It comes from a young heart that breathes a modest appreciation, that gives a simple, honest point of view. It seems to indicate, in spite of its marked limitation, or perhaps by reason of them, the position in this world of letters, among the great choir of singers, that Longfellow himself would have preferred to fill, as the beloved poet of the young, as the happy inspirer of the early formative hours of life, when admiration is fresh and spontaneous, and it is good and glorious to have an idol to worship, a hero to dream of, an ideal that is well within the horizon of the expanding mind so flooded with generous sentiments, so positive and well judging as to the things that are worth while."

The conclusion of this article is:—"If Longfellow is not tremendously great, he has a little temple of his own built by those who love harmonious utterance, pure aspiration, faith in man and God, tender words for the afflicted and stricken, gentle lessons of love, hope, and courage, uttered in melodious breath that clings to the memory, and becomes part of the common life."

An article by the Rev. George F. Piper, of Bedford, Mass., concludes as follows:—

"That the belief Longfellow expresses in his poems was exemplified in his life is the testimony of all in any degree qualified to speak, and never stronger than when given by those who knew him best. Let four of them testify briefly. Dean Everett says: 'That little volume, the Voices of the Night, : : : breathed his whole spirit, his energy, his courage, his tenderness, his trust.' Norton says: 'The accord between the character and life of Mr. Longfellow and his poems was complete: His poetry touched the heart of his readers because the sincere expression of his own.' Lowell, his almost lifelong neighbour and friend, says: 'Never have I known a more beautiful character. I was familiar with it daily, with the constant charity of his hand and of his mind. His nature was consecrated ground, into which no unclean spirit could ever enter.' Howells, who for some years lived near him and saw much of him, says: 'All men that I have known besides have had some foible (it often endeared them the more), or some mannerisms, or pettiness, or bitterness; but Longfellow had none, nor the suggestion of any. No breath of evil ever touched his name. He went in and out among his fellow-men without the reproach that follows wrong.'"

And finally, here is a passage from an article on "Longfellow's Religion," by Mr. George Willis Cooke:—

"His view of life was sound, wholesome, inspiring. It quickened the mind, it invigorated the conscience, it satisfied the emotional demands of the simplest and the wisest. He was not a didactic poet, however,—no advocate of merely ethical requirements, no teacher of morals in precept and admonition. He had a large imagination, his æsthetic appreciations were generous and truly artistic, and he had the gift divine which only makes the true poet. He was not a great poet, was not of the first rank, perhaps not of the second; but the poetical temperament was really his, and sometimes genuine creative power. His limitations as well as his gifts made him a true inspirer of men and women and children. He broadened their vision of life, he enlarged their ideals, he aroused in them whatever poetic qualities they possessed toward making life truly beautiful. In this sense he was an ethical teacher, and his influence has been widespread and most helpful. His greatest poems, therefore, have been written in the lives he has touched and inspired."

NEEDS OF OUR ELDER SCHOLARS.

A PAPER BY MISS ELLA SHARPE, OF NOTTINGHAM.

In speaking of "elder scholars" I have in mind those between the ages of seventeen and twenty-one; and since my experience has been gained almost entirely among girls for many years past, I shall speak with special reference to them and their needs.

As far as my own Sunday-school experience is concerned, I have found that the majority of the girls have attended the ordinary council schools. Only one now and then has attended even a higher grade school. Occasionally—but very occasionally—I have had a girl better circumstanced than the rest, who has continued her studies as a pupil teacher, preparatory to a college training. In such cases the girl has, all too soon, left me, to teach a Sunday-school class herself. By far the greater number of our Sunday-school girls have finished their schooling at the age of thirteen. Employment in shop, factory, or warehouse, as a rule, has followed immediately upon the close of school life. What amount of education do these children possess when they pass from the schoolroom to their factories and warehouses? In all probability they have been taught conscientiously the three R's, some history, some geography, drawing, a smattering of science, a little household management. Only those who have laboured at this work—observed time-tables, been required to satisfy various authorities, striven to reach an average standard of work with a class of fifty—can ever realise how difficult it is to reach the individual soul, to awaken any real love of knowledge or of the beautiful, to help even one child to develop along its own most obvious lines. Yet for the girls of whom I am speaking, the day-school teacher is often the only source of light. From her has come all they know—all some of them will ever know; for these girls are generally from the "mean streets," and their parents are more ignorant than they themselves.

At thirteen begins the eight or ten hours' uninspiring toil. The school songs comprise their world of music, the school pictures their world of art, the school readers their world of literature; and, however one may advocate a secular system, all of religion that some of these girls really know has been learnt from the day-school teacher. At thirteen, they are cut off from even these sources of light. At first they rejoice in their freedom; but long hours of toil, scant leisure, added years, teach their own lessons. Who shall blame them if by many that scant leisure is spent in silly and frivolous pursuits? Who but the thoughtless will condemn them for want of thought? How should they be lovers of books and simple pleasures when they have no inward life at all, and none have shown them how to attain it? How should they dress with taste and refinement? It would seem as though extravagance and crude colour were a kind of revolt against the general poverty and greyness of existence.

But they learn much in a few years. Those who have knowledge of this class of girl will bear me out when I say that by the age of seventeen many of them wish they were back at school. They have become conscious of ignorance. They have become aware of the great gulf fixed, not only between rich and poor, but between learned and unlearned. I do not say it affects all, but it affects many. To some, the knowledge brings a dull resentment; some bridge the gulf; but I believe to the hearts of quiet girls of this class this awakening to knowledge brings pain. It is an awakening to the fact that there is a world of fair and beautiful things from which they are cut off. Their ignorance, too, is the very reason why they are cut off from those who are not. I have often of late, because of my more certain knowledge of these things, tried in imagination to close up one by one those avenues through which knowledge, and hope, and help come, yet to leave behind a longing for a fuller life so impossible and so far removed, that I might realise how it is with these girls. Oh, we are wrong, pitifully wrong, and miserably shortsighted, when we soothe ourselves by thinking that they are necessarily less sensitive and less susceptible than we are.

We all know so well the crudenesses and insolence of some of the youths, the shallow artificiality of some of the girls, but these are the aggressive types we cannot fail to see. It is so easy to generalise. How many of the silent and sensitive ones do we also see? One learns in time to look for evidences of capacity for real thought and deep appreciation from the least expected quarters. "No," wrote one girl to me not long ago, "no, I shall never have a garden of my own, I know; but no one can prevent my looking at the green fields; and then there is the sky, no one can fence that in." Another day there came a surprise in the shape of a thick exercise book thrust into my hands. It was filled with snatches of really beautiful verse, gathered from books and papers the girl had read. The selections revealed her, and she has been understood since. A letter received on a summer holiday begs for "a word of comfort," as it was expressed, to be sent to a friend in bereavement. It revealed a young soul trying desperately to meet bravely the mystery of pain. It was a quiet, good little servant girl who lately asked me for another book like Robert Elsmere, since she had thought that so beautiful. These are incidents that occurred within a few weeks, in connection with a most ordinary Sunday-school class.

To me it is one of the most melancholy and pathetic things in life that so many of these girls in a few years are lost to us, the finer susceptibilities blunted, the hidden coarsenesses developed, their lives no sweeter than those around them, and simply because those who have the knowledge and the power have not loved them into better ways. Whatever duty of giving definite religious instruction may devolve upon the Sunday-school in the future, this work of saving souls from mental and spiritual blindness is theirs now. It seems to me a work that the Sunday-school alone can carry out. These girls are difficult to reach. Sunday services in our Unitarian chapels, where the sense of fellowship is rarely a thing to be felt and warmed by, are not an attraction. They cannot possibly be so until the girls have cultivated some kind of inward life, or have learnt to love their surroundings. If they do the latter then they may hold on until their minds can follow the minister's thought, and their souls love the sacredness of worship; but they must begin somewhere, and it is in the Sunday-school, and through the Sunday-school teacher, that this beginning is most fittingly made.

Where shall we begin? What is the most crying need of these girls? I do not think it to be, in the first place, any course of rigid and definite instruction, necessary and useful as that may be. They need to have their belief in God's existence warmed into life. That is the greatest need. By every way possible the reality of God's existence must be brought home to their minds and consciences. They must be convinced that they have immortal souls; that the soul grows upon holy and beautiful things; that happiness here and hereafter depends upon loyalty to what is known to be right and true. Any possible progress in the future for these girls depends upon the cultivation of the inward life of religion. Many of the means of culture we could not give them if we would; but the effects of spiritual culture may be theirs, without which all other is but vanity. There is no better way of fostering this inward life than by reading and talking about the words of Christ. The Bible is the best text-book, and the girls grow to love it more and more, as they use it and realise how it may help them.

The necessities of daily life must be kept always in mind. A belief in God's fatherhood is a belief in one's self as His child. It means that "I" matter. It means that my work, be it scrubbing of floors or washing of dishes, gains a new dignity. It matters now how it is done. I must not be ashamed of it in my Father's sight. By such means it is possible for all life to be uplifted for them on to a higher plane, for them to feel that "the way their feet must go" has been consecrated by God's presence. So shall there come to them a new and sweet seriousness that no other culture could impart in so short a time. Not only can we do this by direct teaching, but we must let them see that we ourselves honour all toil—that we consider nothing common or unclean. Then little by little we must make them understand that no part of life must be lived apart from God if we wish our lives to be beautiful unities. Work, pleasure, home-life, all must be lived through in a spirit that God will approve. And here I would mention one other point in connection with girls especially. Sooner or later, a teacher of elder girls is bound to lose them as regular scholars, because the demands of their "young men" become urgent. It is so easy to receive their little confidences, or if not actual confidences, yet shy looks of gratitude if they feel they are understood. And it is so easy, too, to lift it all for them out of the realm of the commonplace and the vulgar. They will be grateful and happy for the suggestion that love is a sacred thing, and that happiness depends upon those who love being true to the right.

This, then is their great need—the realisation that religion is a real thing, and then the careful fostering of the inward life of religion. Much of the crudeness, the roughness, must give way when it is believed that the meek inherit the earth, that Christ commended the poor in spirit, and that it is more blessed to give than to receive. And so, of course, their first great need is ours; for problems of many kinds rise and pass away, but the problem of living remains. The inward struggles still wage—the evil against the good, and we grow old ere we believe fully enough to practise the will of God as revealed by Christ. Perchance in helping our weaker and younger brethren we may be helped to the solution of our own difficulties, and our lives may become sweeter and nobler since there are others looking to us for guidance.

The second great need of these elder scholars is such help as will lead them to find new permanent interests and simple joys. We should indeed be of use if only one now and then could say of us:—

"She gave me eyes, she gave me ears,
And humble cares, and delicate fears;
A heart, the fountain of sweet tears;
And love, and thought, and joy."

The great world of Nature to some extent may be theirs. They are learning quickly when they can say with exultation, "No one can fence in the sky." They must be encouraged to catch the beauty of the passing days, even though the only opportunity be the walk to and from the place of work. It is wonderful how quick they are to do this, and how soon, to put it as I heard a girl say, "flowers, and sunsets, and things" become really a part of life. Many of these girls delight in country walks, and they will be encouraged in a healthful habit if the teacher be even moderately interested in their Saturday rambles. They will soon talk of what they have seen, and how it has affected them, if there is a sympathetic listener.

Good literature is almost unknown to them, at least first hand; yet it is so cheap, and might be so great a source of interest and joy. A Sunday-school teacher can at least try to awaken a curiosity. She can read the right poems and tell the fitting story. She can direct to the right books those who are anxious for them. The attitude of the teacher could be such that those who have any taste for reading would make their desires known. Great incidents in history, beautiful legends, stories that appeal to noble instincts, all these are sources upon which the teacher can draw. If they do not awaken a thirst for actual knowledge, they are in themselves of that stuff whereby "the mind" becomes "... a mansion for all lovely forms,

The memory . . . a dwelling-place
For all sweet sounds and harmonies."

Then there are pictures. It is impossible to please elder girls more than by showing good pictures to them. Add to this showing a simple interpretation, and any teacher will be amply rewarded. The matter will not end there: it means for many a new and purer pleasure, for some a desire to possess, and when the time arrives, more beautiful homes. So will life become fuller and completer, without generating a harmful discontent, or making them "desire too earnestly that the path shall be more smooth or more wide." They will learn that the best and most beautiful things may be theirs, that they are, indeed, "close about their feet."

What kind of teachers do these girls need? The work calls for women of leisure, women of talent, women of wide sympathies and great hearts. One half-hour lesson a week is not sufficient to accomplish much real and definite good. I believe such a woman, without any great self-sacrifice, without any undue intrusion into these girls' homes, could brighten their lives, uplift their ideals, and encourage them to all good ends; and her reward would be reverence, and gratitude, and abundant affection. Is this work too prosaic, too humble? It seems so strange that men and women who desire work should go abroad to find it, when in our midst it cries aloud to be done. Work in the slums of our cities is imperative; but, oh! why not win and keep these souls that are here under our very influence? Why not strain every nerve not to let these drift away? If we will, we can behold with our very eyes the rise of the "loftier race." The redeeming of humanity is a great ideal; but no eloquence and no statecraft will ever bring the kingdom of heaven upon earth. The only way the miracle can be wrought is by the slow winning of souls to beauty of life and sincerity of belief.

So this work is fittest in the hands of the gifted and the good-hearted. But were the work left to such alone, there would be less accomplished than there is even at present. How can we, with the few talents, few means, and little leisure achieve? Much can be done even so, under certain conditions. There must be sincerity. There must be sincerity, even of motive. If Sunday-school work be undertaken through a real desire to be helpful, some success must result; but any teacher is doomed to failure who looks upon the work as a disagreeable duty, or as a means of passing the time. When it becomes a boring thing it should be left alone. There must be sincerity in teaching. Only a live personal belief in God will ever quicken the faith of another. If we are feeble, slack, and unconvinced, we cannot hope to help others to be purposeful. Let us not attempt to teach Christ's parables and remain ourselves aloof, unsympathetic, and chilling. If we do the teaching will be vain. However dull we may deem our scholars, they will be quick enough to detect our inconsistencies. If we teach the gospel of Christ's brotherhood, and yet week after week no word of the joy and sorrows of this little band reach us, we are failing. If, when such word does reach us, it leave us unmoved and we have nothing to say—no solace, no warning word, it is we who are failing, we who have not yet learned to love the common heart of humanity that Christ so loved, and for which he lived and died.

Humility must accompany this sincerity. The consciously "superior" person fails in this work. Some seem to approach these boys and girls as though they were curiosities, strange creatures from another sphere, possessing possibly some points of resemblance to themselves, but very few. They adopt the attitude of conferring a favour in coming to read to them. I am afraid such teachers sadly waste their time. I am quite sure that even the girls we are speaking about will fail to recognise the superiority. No, we must go to them with just one longing to be helpful, conscious always of our own great need of help, knowing how little, in His clear sight, we are in advance of them. These boys and girls will be quick enough to benefit by the superior wisdom there is in us; and if we are sincere, and humble, and straightforward, they will be taught by us, and indeed ere long credit us with a knowledge that will embarrass us, and which we would fain disclaim.

With sincerity and humility must go imagination. Imagination is the teacher's best friend. It saves her from many wrong conclusions and from many despairs. It saves her from the idea that what she sees is the all of a person. Judgment is not passed because the aggressive faults are so intensely disagreeable, uncouth manners, discordant voice, inertia. It shows as dull and unimaginative a mind to be misled by these, as to be misled by a melodious voice, charming manners, and "good style." There are virtues—and in this particular class of girl the splendid virtues—of unswerving truthfulness, and generosity that demands self-sacrifice, even if we are too dull to find them out. Imagination may help us. Imagination will help us to realise their lives. We shall generalise less and individualise more. Occasionally, in imagination, we shall work a day of eight hours in a laundry or pattern room, and return home to help in domestic duties; and if in mind we imagine six days of this congenial toil, we shall be more fitted for our task, and have more understanding of the material with which we have to work. Imagination will keep us from despairs.

The response to our appeals will not come at once, or even soon; but despair is the last thing a sincere teacher will give way to. From elder scholars, at least, there will come in time evidences of the conquest; little appeals for help, confidences, sudden and unlooked for appreciations of lessons—these are ample encouragements. We shall indeed, if we faint not, find "all, from beginning to end," in the hearts of some of these girls. Nor shall we expect all to respond. Some must always remain unresponsive to our touch. Others may have the power, but not we. That will not discourage us, nor will it prevent our giving of the best that we know; even of the seed which the sower went forth to sow, some fell by the wayside and some among thorns.

"Will you not go down among them? among those sweet living things, whose new courage, sprung from the earth with the deep colour of heaven upon it, is starting up in strength of goodly spire; and whose purity, washed from the dust, is opening, bud by bud, into the flower of promise; and still they turn to you, and for you. 'The Larkspur listens—I hear, I hear! And the Lily whispers—I wait.'"

ASSISTED CHURCHES AND MISSION CHURCHES.

CAREFUL readers of the INQUIRER must have frequently noticed how "assisted churches" and "mission churches" are referred to, alternatively, as one and the same thing; how narrow, moreover, the use of the term "assisted" has become, to the utter exclusion of broad and palpable facts, on the one hand, in regard to other churches, and to the great injustice, on the other hand, done to the so-called assisted churches themselves; how, correspondingly, the word mission has been belittled, dishonoured, perverted in all ways; and how, therefore, it behoves us, as a body of churches, to revise our terms, so as to thereby get a little nearer to the facts, to alter our methods of procedure to such an extent as to save us from glaring injustice in our mutual dealings, and to enable us to much more fully co-operate in the great work that concerns all of us equally whether as ministers or as churches.

I. Looking at the case of our "assisted churches," as such, the technical meaning of the word has long since come to signify churches that receive grants either from their local unions or from the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, or from both. The antithesis to "assisted," in this technical sense, is "independent," so that, just as the word "assisted" has come to mean grant-receiving from some union or other, so the word "independent" has come to mean, with equal narrowness, not grant-receiving from any such union. Meanwhile it is almost entirely forgotten that there are at least two other senses in which our churches are "assisted" often to a far greater extent than the technically assisted churches dare even to imagine for themselves. I am myself acquainted more or less, for instance, with two Yorkshire churches, each of which has received help from a neighbouring wealthy church to the extent of £100 a year for many years now past, and yet neither of which is ever classed as an "assisted" church. No doubt the readers of the INQUIRER can recall to mind many other cases of the same kind. But, besides the churches thus helped financially by some neighbour church far better off than themselves, without the official brand of "assisted," there are our endowed churches to be considered in this connection. It is curious what pitiable delusions some otherwise intelligent men and women can fall into, more especially where and when their own interests are concerned. Here, for example, is a church endowed by more or less pious or politic ancestors, to the extent of three or four, or even five hundred a year, while here, on the other hand, is a church that receives sixty or a hundred pounds only from some contemporaneous association, and yet we go on, year after year, calling the one church an "independent church" and the other an "assisted church!" If, indeed, it were a question of the mere confusion or abuse of terms it would be bad enough; but it is a far graver question than that. For one thing, the mere technicalities and consequent abuses now indicated have long been made the basis of an interference with the government of the technically assisted churches, which is never dreamed of either in the case of the less formally assisted churches, or in the case of the endowed churches. On the mere plea of "the grants" made to them, the assisted churches are subjected to all sorts of limitations in regard to the appointment of their ministers, for instance, so much so that the very smallest part of such appointments has fallen to the congregations themselves. For another and even worse thing, these assisted congregations are reported, or are expected to report themselves, almost unto death: Quarterly reports, yearly reports, special reports, have gone on to such an extent and have been dealt with in such ways as have reduced our assisted churches in relation to their local unions and the central association for grants to a position I hardly care to describe. Meanwhile, these same assisted churches are a sad disappointment to those who have assisted them. The disappointment, however, is gratuitous. On what ground is it, or has it ever been, that these technically assisted churches alone should have been expected to become independent in a given time, or in what is rather vaguely called "a reasonable time?" "In fifty years," says one in reference to these assisted churches, within the area of a certain union, "we have not raised a single independent church." Other complaints of the same sort abound on all hands. But why? It is a curious illustration of how entirely one-sided we have become in such vain expectations that the very brother who complains that from among the technically assisted churches in his union we have not raised "a single independent church in fifty years," should himself have been for twenty years the minister of a church that has received from a neighbouring church far more financial help and for a longer time than some of the assisted churches he complains of, have received from the local union, and that, too, without becoming a bit more independent than they are. Who, again, expects our endowed churches to become "independent" of their endowments? No one. Nevertheless it would not be a bit more unreasonable to expect them to become independent of their endowments or to expect the informally assisted churches to become independent of the wealthy churches that are so kind to them than it is to expect technically assisted churches to become independent of the grants-in-aid by which they are distinguished. We know perfectly well that the churches aided by sister churches, apart from local or general unions, could not go on without such aid. Nor is it any more a secret that if it were not for their endowments many of the endowed churches would be even in a worse financial position than are many of the technically assisted churches, and would, indeed, find themselves unable to go on at all. Why, then, should it be expected that the technically assisted churches alone should become independent? The truth is, the expectation is unreasonable and unjust, and quite impossible of realisation. If we could get someone to adequately endow these assisted churches, we could make them independent at once, in the technical sense, though, perhaps, we should thus make them really less independent than ever. Or if, again, we could secure for each one of them some half dozen well-to-do members both able and willing to finance them, we should be enabled to make them independent at once in the narrow sense intended. Neither of these plans is at all likely, however, for while, on the one hand, it gets harder and harder to imagine a regular succession of church endowments in these days, the whole trend of modern society is, on the other hand, for the well-to-do members of our churches to get further and further from the towns and so to make it more and more impossible for "working-class congregations" to be financed by richer members. Failing to get such churches adequately endowed, and failing to secure for each of them a sufficient number of wealthy and generous members, we might, indeed, secure their independence, if we could make them some five times more numerous than our average congregations; but no sane man would venture to look for any such removal of a long-standing difficulty. It is thus, as in other ways, clear beyond doubt that the baseless presumption that the assisted churches, in the technical sense, ought, as a matter of course, to become independent will itself have to be abandoned absolutely.

II. Passing on now to the fact that these same "assisted churches" are, alternatively, spoken of as "mission churches" in some distinctive sense, the issues raised are equally curious, suggestive, and contradictory. It is not, of course, strange that the assisted churches should be regarded as mission churches, also, for there is a sense in which all churches are mission churches. The strangeness comes in when we see that "assisted" and "mission" are regarded as simple alternatives for the same thing, and still more, when "independent" is taken to mean not the antithesis of "assisted" only, but, none the less, the antithesis of "mission." This singular confusion of terms has gone so far, in some of our local unions, as to have led to the very singular notion that for a church to receive a grant is "to go on the mission," while to become independent of a grant is "to go off the mission." Ministers and members of our churches who write or speak thus cannot surely be taken to mean that only the technically assisted churches are mission churches; that, for instance, the endowed churches and the churches helped in other ways than by grants from their local or central unions, are neither mission churches nor in the least expected to be so. To say the least of it, all churches whether independent or not, endowed or not, assisted or not, informally, are mission churches, or ought to be, and woe be to them if they are not or do not seek to be. Moreover, the more distinctively the assisted churches do actually become mission churches, the more unreasonable does it become to expect them to become independent also. Mission churches are supposed to be churches for "the lapsed masses," though Heaven knows that the "lapsed" classes need mission churches still more. The whole economic and social trend of things being, as we have seen, for the "lapsed classes" to get as far away from the homes and the churches of the "lapsed masses" as they can, anyone who so looks at these well-known phenomena as to look into them will not need to be told that to expect churches to be at once specially mission churches and yet financially independent is to expect flat contradictions to work well together.

III. Bringing all these matters to a head, and putting them into the shape of fruitful reflections and helpful lessons, there are three things that suggest themselves at once. In the first place, it has thus been made clear that we shall have to revise and reform our nomenclature in this as in some other respects. The confusion of terms which differ has gone almost as far as it can, and the loose, reckless process of misnaming should end as swiftly as possible. Let "assisted" mean assisted, let "mission" mean mission, let "independent" mean independent, neither more nor less. Care in speech implies care in thought, and correct naming is the sign of correct thinking on the things named. Still more important is the lesson that we shall have to change our whole method of procedure with regard to the assisted churches, more especially. The arbitrary treatment dealt out to such churches and their ministers, for many years past, should cease forthwith. All churches that need assistance from their sister-churches should receive it as a matter of course, without the smallest assumption or presumption of general superiority on the part of the churches that help, and with no thought of general inferiority on the part of the churches that are helped. If one church is called upon to report itself, let all the churches be equally so called upon, and if those who help are not so called upon, so neither let those be who receive the help. Perfect equality, both as respects churches and ministers, is the only right order, and no paltry finance should be allowed to adversely intervene. With a revised nomenclature resting on fact and not on fiction, and with perfect equality in our ecclesiastical procedure, the difficulties in the way of our common mission will be far fewer in number and far less grave in character. A greater, grander, diviner mission than ours no body of churches ever had, and no year within my recollection ever opened with so much promise as this for our Free Churches and for the Liberal faith for which they stand, have stood, and will stand. W. MELLOR.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Bridport (Resignation).—The Rev. H. Shaen Solly, M.A., has resigned the pulpit, which he has held since 1888, as successor to the late Russell Carpenter. At a congregational meeting held on Wednesday, Feb. 20, the resignation was accepted with great regret, and a resolution passed recording the congregation's desire "to convey to Mr. Solly their warm appreciation of his work amongst them, of his earnest endeavour to inculcate high principles and ideals, and of his constant efforts in the service of the larger community of which they are a part. They sincerely hope that many years of health and happiness lie before Mr. and Mrs. Solly." A note in the Western Union Chronicle adds:—"Mr. Solly has always brought to the minds of his congregation all the latest and newest phases of thought in the world of theology. He will be remembered for his ripe scholarship and for the generally informing nature of his sermons. His kindly ministrations among the sick and sorrowing in the congregation will be remembered by many. In the work of the town of Bridport he will be much missed, as he has been on the committees connected with educational matters, both elementary and secondary, as also of the Literary Institute and the Ramblers' Club. Of the Dorset Field Club he has been an active member, frequently reading papers on the geology of the district, &c. He is much esteemed in temperance circles for his intelligent zeal in that cause, and his work in connection with the chapel Band of Hope will be long remembered."

Dover.—The new schoolroom was quite unable to accommodate all who wished to attend the entertainment given a fortnight ago by the Sunday-school young people, and arranged by Mrs. Igglesden and Miss Martindale. The entertainment was accordingly repeated on Wednesday evening to a large and very appreciative audience.

Ipswich.—Readers will remember the discussions in the Ipswich local press arising out of the refusal to admit the Rev. Lucking Tavener to the Brotherhood of the Social Settlement, on the ground that he was not a Christian. This was seven years ago. During the years which have elapsed, the opposition has been lived down, and on Saturday evening last he gave his lecture "Among the Dutchmen" to a crowded audience, consisting of 1,200 persons. His reception was most enthusiastic, the audience listening most attentively for two hours, while he described his experiences in Holland during the International Congress of 1903.

Kidderminster.—On Wednesday evening, Feb. 27, a very successful social meeting of the congregation was held in the schools and church, when the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie was the guest of the evening. After tea in the schoolroom a meeting was held in the church, which was completely filled. Colonel W. H. Talbot, J.P., presided, and Mr. Bowie gave an address, in which, after referring to the "New Theology," he gave an able exposition of Unitarianism. Speaking on the 100th anniversary of Longfellow's birth, he said it was interesting for Unitarians to be reminded that the father of Longfellow was one of the founders of the American Unitarian Association, and its first vice-president. Longfellow himself regularly attended from a boy onwards the Unitarian Church, at Cambridge, near Boston. They saw in Longfellow a brave, noble, simple, pure life; and in his poetry beautiful, simple, pure, a very fine example of Unitarian religion. No one could say how many lives had been elevated, ennobled, sweetened by the poetry of Longfellow, and in the life of Longfellow and his brother, who wrote many hymns, they had noble examples of what a reasonable, simple, and beautiful Christian faith could produce. The Rev. J. E. Stronge, who also spoke, said they had already raised £1,000 towards the cost of the Congregational Hall, which they hoped to open in October.

Manchester: Dob Lane (Resignation).—The Rev. George Knight, who has been settled at Dob Lane since 1885, has been compelled to resign the pulpit, on account of ill-health, and to take a prolonged rest.

Manchester: Oldham-road (Appointment).—The Rev. W. Griffiths, Ph.D., B.D., has accepted an invitation to the ministry of this church, and has already entered upon his duties.

Stalybridge.—A sale of work, to raise £100 for the Guild Building Fund, was opened on Friday, February 22, by Mr. Elias Wild, J.P.; Mr. William Thompson, president of the Guild, in the chair, and supported by the Revs. W. G. Price, G. Evans, and others. On Saturday afternoon the sale was re-opened by Mr. J. O. Kerfoot, J.P., the Rev. W. G. Price in the chair. The net proceeds of the sale are expected to reach £120.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

DR. CHANNING'S well-known volume on "The Perfect Life," has been added by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association to its series of popular Sixpenny reprints, and is a most valuable addition to this series. The book, on better paper, bound in cloth, and with a portrait for frontispiece, is also to be had for eighteenpence.

WE have already called attention to the forthcoming novel by the Rev. J. L. Haigh, "Sir Galahad of the Slums" (Liverpool Booksellers' Co., net cash price 4s. 6d., by post 4s. 10d.), and are interested to find a note on the book in the March Calendar of Hope-street Church, by a writer whose initials we recognise as those of a very competent judge of good literature, the minister's wife: "Those among us—and we know there are many—to whom 'Brotherhood' is no empty word, will delight in the spirit in which this book is written, and the loving interest which penetrates to the essential man beneath all external accidents and conditions. The local colour is of course strong; and some of the most pressing problems of our day are presented in such a vivid manner as must surely help to force them into recognition. Very many of the incidents are within the range of Mr. Haigh's personal experience, and most of the 'characters' personally known to him. But the story, as a story, never flags; there is no undue exaggeration or emphasis; and the danger of luridness on the one side and mawkishness on the other is carefully avoided. Certain personalities familiar to most of us are admirably portrayed under a thin disguise: We heartily recommend the new 'Sir Galahad.'"

DR. JAMES MOFFATT concluded his course of Jowett Lectures at the Passmore Edwards Settlement, Tavistock-place, on Wednesday evening. It was a course of ten lectures on "The Conception of the Spirit in Early Christianity," and the last lecture was a most able summary of the conclusions of the study; but out of all London only a handful of eighteen, mostly grey heads, were there to hear. We cannot help thinking that there is some fault in the method of making these lectures known. That only such a mere handful should have been found to hear the author of "The Historical New Testament," on such a subject, is greatly to be regretted. The lectures, when published, will certainly command a much wider public.

REFERRING to Mr. Roper's recent letter asking for information as to Boys' Brigades for physical drill and training in first aid, or similar instruction, other than distinctly military exercise, Dr. J. B. Paton wrote from Nottingham, "that the Boys' Life Brigade has been formed distinctly for this very purpose; that there are some three or four hundred companies of the Life Brigade established in different parts of the country, and that there has been no work for boys that I know of which has been more useful than this."

It appears that there are now companies of the Brigades, both for boys and girls, organised on this principle, and particulars as to the forming of a company (code of rules and regulations, post free, 4d.) may be had from the Brigade Secretary, 56, Old Bailey, E.C. From an interesting account of the Girls' Life Brigade, we take the following:—

"The Girls' Life Brigade had its origin in the Boys' Life Brigade, being really a product of the earlier organisation for boys. The Boys' Life Brigade had its origin in an idea of Dr. Paton's, and was formed with these splendid aims: The objects of the Brigade are to lead our boys to the service of Christ; to train them for an active, disciplined, and useful manhood; and to promote habits of self-respect, obedience, courtesy, and helpfulness to others, and of all that makes for a manly Christian character. It is sought to attain these objects within the Brigade chiefly by means of drill, which is not associated with the use of arms, but with instruction and exercises in the saving of life from fire, from drowning, and from accident. The physical training given in the different kinds of drill is intended to fit the members for rendering helpful service to others, while imparting healthful vigour to the body, and giving the moral discipline which results from the obedience, self-regard, and mutual trust necessary where drill is practised in a way which fulfils the true idea of the term: In short, the principle of the Brigade is life-saving; and the pursuits, operations, and tone of the Brigade are in harmony with that principle.

"The Boys' Life Brigade being formed and launched on a useful career, the next step was to form the completing half of the organisation—the Girls' Life Brigade: 'What a vast scope there is for the Girls' Life Brigade! Every home, every work-room, every day-school, every Sunday-school, every playground, every holiday trip, one might almost say everywhere, presents scope for practising the useful knowledge gained in the duties of the Girls' Life Brigade: The life-saving lessons, whether in regard to fire or water, should impress girls with a desire to be of service to others, and teach them in times of danger to care for the weak and helpless: The confidence fostered by knowing what to do in cases of emergency will stimulate the needful quality called presence of mind: Teach girls to develop their muscles, their lungs, their general condition, and it will help you who venture to undertake the training of their souls in your strenuous endeavours to instil into their minds and hearts a noble ideal of life.' So Mrs. Cadbury wrote when commending the Girls' Life Brigade to those who are engaged in Sunday-school and kindred work. Wide as is the scope for the Boys' Life Brigade, when one thinks of the world of women's life, of the home, of tending the young, of nursing the sick, and of the many ministrations which naturally fall to the gentle touch and loving care of women, it is seen that the scope for the Girls' Life Brigade is still wider, and that the opportunities for service are more numerous and of daily and even hourly occurrence."

THE Captain of a Company of the Boys' Life Brigade, in the Midlands, commends it as specially useful for boys in mining villages and manufacturing towns, and describes what may be done, as follows:—

"In the first place, the members of this Brigade get all the valuable physical and 'foot' drill common to the other brigades, but in place of the absolutely useless drill with 'dummy' rifles they learn ambulance 'first aid,' and, what is more to the point, they learn it thoroughly. Life saving from water, from fire, and from accident, form the basis of the Life Brigade drill. Those who are acquainted with the excellent work done by the St. John Ambulance Association in mining and manufacturing centres where accidents are common, will at once see the value of training boys in this work. Last year a member of my Company saved a life from drowning; and this year another member saved the life of a man by preventing his bleeding to death. That the drill is quite as attractive as 'dummy' rifles is proved by the fact that since my Company was formed it has absorbed a 'rifle' corps. In colliery districts, particularly the Life Brigade, properly conducted, has been proved to be an invaluable institution, especially when associated with a St. John Corps. If a Company has good officers and a moderate amount of capital, a very great deal besides ambulance instruction can be done for the benefit of the members. A Club Room will be much appreciated during the winter. Gymnastic Classes will be found a great attraction. A Brass Band will 'go like hot cakes.' By means of such attractions members may be induced to do other things of greater benefit to themselves. Attendance at some religious service or Bible Class on Sunday may be compulsory. Attendance at Night School may be counted towards promotion and prizes. Last winter the whole of my Company, over 100 strong, attended Continuation Classes."

THE remarkable series of articles on creed revision, to which attention has been called in our pages, continue to appear in the Glasgow Herald. A local poet declares the problem to be that of finding out how to say one thing and mean another, or to express belief and doubt at the same time. In the Herald of March 2, in a separate article on the "Ecclesiastical Outlook in Scotland," a "Wee Free" writer endeavoured to stem the tide by maintaining that the only spirit in which to effect urgent modern social reforms is that of adherence to "the whole doctrine of our historic Confession." This writer appears, however, to be very much alone; and as to the weight of the arguments his article is nowhere in comparison with those he criticises. The movement for greater freedom of teaching is not confined to one journal. We observe that another Scottish clergyman, who has been writing some articles in the Weekly Scotsman on "What it Means to be a Minister," concludes his series with a severe rebuke to the people in the pews. He declares that "the clergy would often be willing to lead if the people would permit them." He quotes Martineau respecting the average church-goer: "Thought chills him with doubt and fear," and says himself, "Instead of the imaginary demand for light of which we read, he (the minister) is conscious of being surrounded by good and worthy people, who intensely desire to be let alone." But that is a very old story, and has its parallels outside of Scotland.

CORRESPONDENCE.

WOMEN'S SUFFRAGE.

SIR,—As a constant reader of your paper, may I ask for a small portion of your space to make a few remarks on the letter concerning the above in your last issue?

I feel somewhat diffident in entering the lists against such a doughty champion as your correspondent Ellen B. Drewry, who is so well known, and whose work is so highly appreciated in scholastic and literary circles. I am not authorised to write on behalf of the Central Society for Women's Suffrage, but I should like to point out that as a society it has taken up an absolutely neutral position in regard to the action of the so-called (and foolishly nicknamed by the Press) "Suffragettes." Among the numerous members of the Society it would be stupidity indeed if there were not diversity of opinion, some approving in their individual capacity and others disapproving of the tactics of the "fighting contingent." However, the society, as a corporate body, continues its work of propaganda on the old constitutional lines, neither opposing the Social and Political Union, nor upholding it, considering there is room for both organisations.

As a veteran in the cause, and having worked for many long weary years without any appreciable result, I personally sympathise with the younger members of our sex, who, realising that forty years of "lady-like" methods have completely failed to secure the Parliamentary franchise, have thought it right and expedient to have recourse to more stirring tactics, and are prepared to make great sacrifices to gain their end. It is not to be wondered at that after the many rebuffs these young enthusiasts have encountered, some of them should have lost the "patience" the Prime Minister so kindly counselled, and, as their opponents would say, their heads also. I would remind your correspondent that few great causes have been won without the breaking of laws and the use of physical force. I need only mention two with which your readers above all must have the most intense sympathy, viz., the emancipation of the slaves in America and the abolition of compulsory Church rates.

Your correspondent is surprised "that in the eagerness to obtain the franchise the privileges and duties of educational government, and the fact that these have been withdrawn from women, in spite of their having fulfilled them with admittedly exceptional ability, seem to have been quite lost sight of."

Surely, Miss Drewry cannot be ignorant of the fact that the "Women's Local Government Society" has been working steadily for many years trying to induce Parliament to bring in a Bill to make women eligible to serve on all local governing bodies; and its persistent efforts have been rewarded by the promise of the Government, made in the King's Speech, that such a measure is in prospect, so that we may reasonably hope that, at no very distant date, women will recover their lost position, and once more take their part in educational government.

But many of us want more than this. As taxpayers we think we have a right to have a voice in how our money is spent; as workers, we consider we should be able to decide on hours and conditions of labour and rate of wages; as women we claim to be consulted in the making or alteration of divorce, intestacy, and other laws which specially affect our sex. The responsibility of having a vote and a stake in the country would have an educational and steadying influence, and "the deficient and lawless spirit" your correspondent so much deplores would, in happier circumstances, die a natural death. The determined opposition of so many members of the Liberal party has been a great disappointment to many true and life-long Liberals, and must have strained the loyalty of its ardent women supporters almost to the breaking point; and they must now, I should think, fully and painfully realise that they have given up to party what would have been better used for womankind.

ELLEN C. MCKEE.

SIR,—Opinions may differ about the tactics of the militant section of the Women's Suffrage party, but there is no doubt that they are in earnest, standing the test of ridicule which is often harder to bear than imprisonment, and have made the question a live one, so that the movement, in consequence of their action, has made more progress in a couple of years than the older societies were able to achieve. For over forty years the constitutional party have been working by meetings, by petitions, by interviewing members of Parliament, and helping them in their candidatures, in the hope that gratitude for past services would make them give the desired boon, and it is no wonder that now the younger and more active of the Suffrage party are determined to bring the question more forward.

Many women worked hard at the last General Election to return the Liberals to power, and it is with a bitter feeling of disappointment that they now realise that after last Friday's "talk out," the party whose motto is "No taxation without representation," will not give this elementary right to their women fellow citizens.

ALICE BARTRAM.

Highbury, March 13, 1907.

[WE have received other letters on this subject, but these two must suffice. Correspondents should remember that matter received only on Thursday has often the poorest chance of publication.—ED. INQ.]

"ASSISTED CHURCHES AND MISSION CHURCHES."

SIR,—With your permission, I should like to offer a few observations on Mr. Mellor's article on the above subject. It is not my purpose to give an exhaustive answer to it, for that, I think, is rather a matter for the officials of the local mission than for myself. But he quotes a sentence from a former letter of mine, and I desire to remove a misconception from his mind under which he is evidently labouring. The sentence he quotes is to the effect that "in fifty years we have not raised one independent church," that is, in Yorkshire. This he calls a "complaint," and then points to my inconsistency in making this "complaint" by saying that I have been minister of a church for twenty years which receives more financial aid from a neighbouring church than many of the so-called "assisted" churches, and yet has not become a bit more independent. This I regard as a gratuitous attack upon me: I should think Mr. Mellor is the only person who has construed the sentence in question into a "complaint." Such an idea never entered my mind, and, indeed, I had no right to make any such "complaint." I simply stated a plain and palpable fact, and I did this for the purpose of showing the advisability of adopting a different policy from that which has hitherto been pursued. I search Mr. Mellor's article in vain for any such policy, and it does not appear to help matters forward over much. Evidently he regards me in the unenviable light of trying to pluck a mote from my brother's eye when there is a beam in my own. If he cherishes that conviction he is welcome to it. I plead guilty to not having made my late congregation independent, and no one regrets that more than I. All fields are not equally profitable to till: A farmer cannot get the same results from a piece of barren moor or bog as he can from a fertile plain. It is the same with congregations. But I can inform Mr. Mellor that I was the first minister of the first "mission" congregation in the North of England, and that in half the time I was with my last congregation I lifted it off the shoulders of the local mission, and that it became one of the most flourishing congregations in Lancashire.

I am not personally concerned in the other matters of Mr. Mellor's article: I think he makes more ado about our nomenclature than is needful or helpful.

We cannot get beyond the fact that churches are "aided" when they receive grants from outside. Nor need there be any confusion between "aided" and "mission" churches. I should call that a "mission" church which is started by a missionary organisation, and that an "aided" church which has not been so started, but which such a body rescues, or seeks to rescue, from decay or death.

Mr. Mellor complains of the restrictions put upon these congregations in the matter of reports and the election of ministers. I agree with him that there is more reporting than is needful. I have never believed that the quarterly reports do any good, and they always reminded me of John Sterling's youthful gardening, when he was in the habit of pulling up his plants every morning to see whether they were growing. There were no quarterly reports in the first mission I served under. There was a short and simple statement sent each year from the churches concerned for the annual report, and a visit paid to them by a representative of the committee, who also made a short statement for the report, and that was deemed sufficient, and that mission has been as successful as any in the land.

On the question of the election of ministers it has never seemed to me there were any undue restrictions. The congregations concerned make their own choice, as a rule, and unless there is something decidedly objectionable in the man of their choice, it has been sanctioned by the mission committee: I have known instances, indeed, when the judgment of the committee has been overridden by the mission congregation in the choice it had made:

On the question of endowments Mr. Mellor seems to me to display considerable confusion of thought. He asks, "Who expects our endowed churches to become independent of their endowments?" He further says, "It would not be a bit more unreasonable to expect them to become independent of their endowment : : : than to expect technically assisted churches to become independent of the grants in aid by which they are distinguished." But what need is there for endowed churches to become independent of their endowments? And how are they to do this except by throwing their endowments away? Such an idea is absurd. As well expect the well-to-do to impoverish themselves in order to become independent. The case is totally different with grant-aided churches, and it would certainly be a benefit to them if they could rise above such necessity and become self-contained. We cannot change the meaning of the word "independence," whether it applies financially to churches or individuals, and by the common usage of language we regard all as being in that condition who have an assured income which enables them to live and pay their way. Would that all our churches were in this happy condition!

Leeds, March 11, 1907. JOHN FOX.

THE REV. J. R. BEARD, D.D.

SIR,—I am preparing a Memoir of my father, the Rev. John Rely Beard, D.D., and find the difficulty of the work increased by the lapse of time since his death, a period of nearly 30 years, during which all of those with whom he was on terms of special intimacy have also departed. I have a considerable quantity of interesting correspondence addressed to him by other people, which would imply that he must have reciprocated in a similar degree, but his letters to members of his own family were those of a very busy man, and afford little insight into his mind or his projects. May I through your valuable paper ask that any of your readers, who have letters written by Dr. Beard or any documents likely to be of use to me in the work I have in hand, will kindly lend them to me. I shall gladly pay any expenses incurred in sending them to my address at Hazlefield, Knutsford, and will return them in due course. I am aware that a favourable response to this request must entail considerable trouble in searching for the material I ask for: I can only say that I shall feel greatly indebted to anyone who will take this trouble.

"THE Bible: Its Inspiration and its Authority" is the subject of the Rev. Charles Hargrove's sermon in this month's Mill Hill Pulpit, No. 4 of the series on "Thirty Years' Changes of Religious Thought."

TO CORRESPONDENTS:—Letters, &c., received from D.A., J.M.B., I.A.C., J.M.C., J.T.D., J.E., A.H., A.L., E.W.L., G.F.M., T.M., G.von P., A.H.S., E.T., W.G.T., A.W., L.W.

THE WAY OUT OF DOGMA:

If anyone could win our consent to the necessity of dogma, it would be Mr. Chesterton; but failing this, he has contributed not a little to the illumination of the subject by a parallel, which he put forward in his review of Mr. Lloyd Thomas's book in the Daily News: Just as society at large finds it necessary to be dogmatic on the subject of morality, and lay down strict rules, e.g., on the marriage relation; so the Church must issue its decrees or dogmas of theology. The parallel really hides more in itself than Mr. Chesterton would be willing to accept, and, to use a characteristic saying of Henry Sidgwick's, "I think we are on the way of finding a right method for forming a sound theory on the subject." Both in morals and in religion the voice of society, of collective man, must be heard; that is what the parallel means: Social constraint and collective direction there must be. Unfortunately, however, Mr. Chesterton's views would, in the long run (and he runs a long way), hand us over to the Inquisition or the Wee Kirk. How is social constraint exercised in morals? In the first place by the Law. But the Law dictates only the minimum of what the best mind of the community considers desirable: It prescribes, in marriage, monogamy: It cannot prescribe tenderness: It cannot even prescribe fidelity: These other higher and weightier matters are nevertheless prescribed, and largely enforced, by society and public opinion: And society and public opinion have any number of graduated varieties, from that which forbids downright physical cruelty up to the very finest ideals that have entered into the marriage relation: The law can, indeed, safely refrain from insisting on these higher ideals because they are securely contained, as in germ, in the monogamy which Law decrees: The Law leaves them to the development of the human spirit, for the Law itself is the fruit of that development. Moreover, we can see how at every successive stage there is a degree of emancipation from one sort of constraint, and at the same time an increase in constraint of another kind. Where the Law ceases to dictate, the dictation of the collective conscience becomes more penetrating, in a sense more exacting even, than Law: The Law is too external, too mechanical, to deal with the finer issues and delicate relationships which marriage, in its higher development, implies: But in order to get more liberty and elasticity for the spirit's play, the moral imperative, no longer depending on legal sanctions, must be made all the more absolute: You must screw the spring down tightly somewhere in order that you may have free play anywhere.

Further, all progress in morality has depended on making the social constraint less and less like that of the Law, and more and more that of the Spirit, i.e., of conscience, inwardness, affection: But, we are to observe, this has not meant a movement towards individualism—that is the error of Protestantism: Differentiation from the law-status has not meant departure from the collective status. That was the error of Maine, with his formula that society in its progressive development moves from status to contract; or, one might say, from collectivism to anarchy: It has meant rather the deeper interpretation of the collective principle: Any other conclusion leads straight to the morass of the antinomians: for on any other conclusion law and liberty are antagonistic.

Is now this same deeper interpretation possible in religion, as in morals? Mr. Lloyd Thomas says, Yes: His book means, I take it, that while hitherto the rationalistic advance towards a liberal faith has usually assumed that we must replace collective authority by individual judgment, we are coming to see that this assumption is an error: Rationalising theologians have generally gone a little mad on this point. "What?" they have said, "is truth a social matter to be decided by counting heads?" forgetting that the moral ought is just as much a matter of the individual soul as truth itself, and yet, as we have seen, morals are collective as well as individual. We are reminded of Loisy's jest about the singular case of a religion which seemed made for the angelic hosts of which every individual constituted a species, rather than for men living together on earth. We are coming to see that the consensus and the individual judgment are not, and cannot, be rivals or substitutes one for the other. Learning from the parallel to which Mr. Chesterton has directed our attention, we can understand that the stronger individual judgment becomes, the stronger becomes also the consensus, the constraining collective consciousness: And if we ask: Is dogma the right and natural form for the expression of this collective consciousness of religious man? the parallel will once more come to our aid. It is not the most nobly moral men who need the sanctions of the Law to induce them to be good. And so, in the case of religion, in proportion as men are truly religious they will not need the support of dogma: They need the consensus. But the consensus tends ever to be of the kind that we call unity of spirit: At a former, less developed stage of the Church's life, the consensus took the form of dogma, and said, "Thus shall ye think." The new consensus comes ever nearer now to saying, "Ye shall be of this spirit, this loyalty, this fellowship." It need not now be doctrine at all that the constraint is directed towards. It may be something that holds doctrine in solution, as it were, just as (to refer again to our parallel) the higher tendencies and more ideal relations of modern marriage hold in solution the elemental facts of human nature, only transformed and socialised, i.e., moralised. It is thus an indispensable condition of any progress to a higher Church life that the Church shall leave the law-, or decree-, or dogma-status: But (once more), this must not mean departure from the collective status: In what way, then, can such progress take place? Where can the spring be screwed down? The thing must be very difficult to understand, judging by Dr. Robertson Nicoll's remarks in the British Weekly on the free trust deeds of Presbyterian chapels a few weeks ago: He thinks that while the evangelical churches insisted on the Christian faith, our English Presbyterians left these matters to trustees, subscribers, or seat-holders; the contrast intended being that between a great, common united legacy of conviction, and a poor abstract residuum of theological opinion: For often, indeed, the advocates of the "free and open trust" have spoken in a way to justify the supposition that they only differed from the dogmatic churches in requiring that the doctrines taught should be in the temporary fashion, and that their only business with Christianity was what Loisy calls la recherche d'une quintessence: Mr. Thomas, however, will enlighten Dr. Nicoll as to the true aim of our "free and open" tradition: That tradition has, it may be obscurely and dimly, but truly, been groping its way towards the new deliverance of the Christian consciousness which is now at hand: We are witnessing a real development of the Church idea into a fuller realisation of its own presuppositions. There is only one possible result of such a development. The consensus must insist at last upon itself, and upon the actual reality of the Christian religion as being contained within itself, and no longer upon the incidents of a bygone stage of its history: Not the Church doctrine, but the Church itself, will be the central point and hold-fast. For an abstract idea we must substitute a concrete object, for a proposition an organic life. Instead of doctrinal agreement we must have historical affiliation and affectionate attachment. In the place of an -ism (Theism, Unitarianism, and the like), we must put the Church—the spiritual Church: Whereas, on the one hand, dogmas coerced men, and, on the other, individualism sundered them, love for a Person will unite them: And if the Church means Christ writ large in the world's history, "filling up that which is lacking in his sufferings," and carrying out the redeeming purpose of Love that worked through him, then belonging to the Church will mean believing in Christ, and fellowship will be equivalent to faith. The Christian consciousness, the Christian spirit, this is the true inheritance of the ages, at once more comprehensive than dogma and more powerful. And so we overcome Mr. Chesterton's dualism: He sees the necessity of the social constraint to correct the waywardness of human fatuity: So do we: But we need not seek it, as he does, on the lower levels of human nature, and by setting up afresh the gaping antithesis between intellectual liberty and religion: There is no such opposition in real life, but only in obsolete theory. Real, human religion, religion held in social solution, religion in church fellowship, that is the very climax of what human liberty means: Spirituality through solidarity, is our true line. Preach Christ crucified (not only on Calvary, but all through the Church's life), and the intellectual difficulty is transcended.

And this suggests a final consideration which ought to be felt as cogent even for a purely intellectual view of the matter. Any truly spiritual faith ought to be able to comprehend and synthesise, as it were at one cast, all the great leading convictions of Christianity, so that they would be seen to play into one another as so many aspects of the one undivided truth, and in such a way that any one of them might be felt to contain or imply in itself the whole Gospel. Now it is just the Christian spirit, or consciousness, as that expresses itself in the Church fellowship, that thus finds itself at home in any of the great dogmas of the past, when they are spiritually interpreted: The Lordship of Christ, the Redemption by Man, the Love of God, the vicarious travail of the saints, the mediating value of the Church—any of these, and such as these, is at once felt to stand for all the rest, as soon as it is approached, not as a mere intellectual proposition, but as the glowing deliverance of Christian faith: It will surely be granted that when we have reached such a point of view, we have obtained a method of treating Christian doctrine which carries in itself the proof of its own validity: As soon as we can see how the great principles for which the respective Christian dogmas stood, can be taken out of their fragmentariness and arbitrariness, and transformed into glancing lights of the one all-sufficing spirit, as soon as the spirit of religious life in Christians finds that it can pass indifferently from one to another of these dogmas and find in any one of them the expression (although an imperfect expression) of its own aim, then we have secured two things: (1) we know that we have at last transcended the dogmas without losing their truth; and (2) we have a proof (on the method of solvitur ambulando) that the transition thereby effected is the genuine, natural, and inevitable development of religion, and no mere tour de force of dialectics: Whatever religion does justice to every element in the Christian consciousness and does violence to none, is surely the highest we can attain: And this is the religion of solidarity, of redemption, of the communion of saints.

W. WHITAKER.

THE ETHICS OF INTERNATIONALISM AND INDUSTRIALISM.

THE International Journal of Ethics for October last contains a noteworthy address on "The Ethics of Internationalism" given before the Society for Ethical Culture of Philadelphia by Mr. John A. Hobson of London. Mr. Hobson vividly points out the many influences which are now working together to break down the barriers which dissociate nations, and to extend the conviction that ethical relations and obligations are authoritative not only between the several members of one political state, but also between the states themselves. In olden times nations were so little conscious of common interests and sympathies that they generally regarded each other as "hard, separate and antagonistic entities"; and even in the present day there are many persons who, when the relations between nations are brought up as a subject of thought, immediately picture antagonistic powers. Nations seem to them natural competitors and not co-operators: Among the material influences which are tending to dissolve this conception of nations as isolated unities perhaps the most important is the growth of commercial intercourse between all countries, and the rapidly increasing freedom with which the productive powers of mankind, capital and labour, are flowing over the whole world: Richard Cobden and his friends were so impressed by this tendency of commerce to create a consciousness of community of interests among nations, that they imagined that if free-trade were universal this would so link the nations together that it would be impossible for war to be maintained in the future. Experience, however, has now taught us that commerce alone is not competent to realise this conception of a world-wide harmony. As Mr. Hobson truly says:—"Those who see to-day that the fiercest struggles between members of the different nations are for the markets of the world, smile scornfully on this dream of Richard Cobden. What Cobden and his friends failed to take account of was the continued power of certain classes of interests within the nation, as distinguished from the national interests conceived as a whole—the power of certain people to misrepresent the people. The identity of commercial interests which he saw between different nations is real and substantial, and commerce might have been made the great peace-maker if the antagonism of groups within the nations had not been so powerful as to override the community of interests between peoples. Cobden, of course, and his friends, and the spirit of his time, made overmuch of commerce. We now understand that nations, like individuals, cannot live by bread alone, but by every sound feeling that comes forth from the heart of humanity."

But while the dream that commerce alone can bring in the reign of universal peace is now seen to be unrealisable, there has arisen another dream which is deluding many minds at the present time. While the Cobdenites imagined that a community of material interests would link nations together, what we may call the new Imperialists cherish to-day the dream that mutual fear will finally hold in check all combative impulses. Their dream is "that the world is destined by absorption on the part of the stronger nations to pass into a smaller number of vast estates, so large and so strong that they will find it necessary to come into closer union with each other because the shock of arms and the waste of competition will prove too disastrous. When the lions have swallowed up all the lambs, then with glutted appetites a certain torpor will come, and from that torpor they predict a world peace. . . . But this equilibrium of mutual fear is as far from true attainment as the Cobdenite dream—perhaps it is farther, if we look upon the actual condition of the world to-day. It is not true that the whole world has been absorbed or digested by a few great nations, or is on the point of being so digested. The seven great western powers of the world have already before them the absorption and the assimilation of nearly half the world which remains undivided." Further, there is no reason to think that there could be anything like stable equilibrium in any such combinations of states. And hence Mr. Hobson concludes that the dream of a few empires dividing among them the power of the world and existing in amicable relations with each other, proceeding upon the line of national self-development purely, is less warranted than even the dream of Cobden:

If, then, neither the appeal to mutual selfish interests nor the appeal to mutual fears is of a nature to bring in the era of perpetual peace, where can we hopefully look for the influences which will finally make wars impossible and cause all nations to refer all their disputes to friendly arbitration? It is to be noted that both of the above-mentioned theories rest upon the philosophical assumption of Hobbes that every man by nature is at war with his fellows, and that society is a contract by which mutual concessions are made, because it is supposed that in this way each person secures the greatest possible gratification of his own selfish desires. As Mr. Hobson elaborately explains, a deeper psychology has shown that this account of human nature is wholly erroneous. It is now proved that men in the early stages of society, and even animals before the human stage was reached, are gregarious and sociable, concerned not only with their own interests, but with the interests of one another. We have, so far as the relations between individuals are concerned discarded the notion of pure selfishness as a basis of development, yet when we regard the society of nations we still, too often, fall back into Hobbes' exploded fallacy and assume that the social feelings cannot pass the limits of nationality. But throughout all the civilised world the conviction is growing that "this hard-shell nationalism is false in the same way and to the same degree as the hard-shell individualism of the older times." It is by the development of this parallelism that Mr. Hobson eloquently shows how, with the fuller awakening of cosmopolitan sympathies and ideas of international justice, wars will be seen to be as needless and immoral as duels are now seen to be, and thus by degrees will be realised the condition of a society of nations animated and united by the true spirit of humanity. Mr. Hobson does not dwell on the important function which religion will ultimately perform in this unifying process; and to what is so admirably urged in his address we should be inclined to add, that whatever influences help to bring into clear consciousness the universal, i.e., the Divine, element in humanity, such as philosophy, poetry, art and religion, all conspire to transcend political barriers and to make the principles of righteousness and love dominant in all international relations.

Closely akin to Mr. Hobson's able address is a very interesting and original paper by Mr. B. Kirkman Gray in the present (January) number of the same journal. Its title is "The Ethical Problem in an Industrial Community." While Mr. Hobson discusses the ethics which should obtain between nations, Mr. Gray attacks the problem of the growth of ethical and emotional sentiments towards the vast number of persons with whom, in the present complex conditions of society, we are brought into relation, but of whom we cannot possibly have any personal knowledge. Such a simple transaction as the purchase of an article of clothing illustrates the dependence of the individual upon many complex groups of persons who to him must remain anonymous and unknown. And so with regard to our fellow citizens and fellow countrymen: In small cities such as ancient Athens, it was possible for civic enthusiasm to inspire and unite all the inhabitants, but, says Mr.

Gray, "it is less easy to see how a citizen can apply this enthusiasm to a population-mass of forty millions." Yet this has to be done; and how it may come about Mr. Gray thus admirably explains:—

"In some form or other the social morality which will disregard and so triumph over the lion form of the anonymous must crystallise round the idea of justice and that not as an abstract conception but as an immediate and persuasive force. The contemporary phrase which most adequately expresses the idea is the love of humanity. Only it must be recognised that love of humanity is not necessarily love of the individuals; These last, so far as they are unknown, cannot be objects of affection and even when they are known are not necessarily loved. Justice, or a love of humanity, is predisposition to love and act rightly towards individuals: It is an attitude of emotional preparedness, and I wish to inquire how this emotional predisposition is to be cultivated and rendered available for units who must till the end remain anonymous units in a crowd: I suggest a two-fold inquiry into the function of social knowledge and of social imagination respectively."

Our space will allow us only to glance at Mr. Gray's most instructive and suggestive exposition of these two functions which combine in the moralisation of society. As regards the intellectual function, it would be difficult to over-estimate the importance of the sociological study which has yielded so much information as to the conditions of social life. The grand economic truth of social solidarity has brought in its train ethical insight of far-reaching influence. The perceived physical interdependence necessarily awakens some consciousness of social responsibility. But Mr. Gray well reminds us that though the sociologist may be impelled to his study in the first place by the pull of human sympathy, as sociologist he is concerned with conditions; and persons are not his immediate goal. Knowledge leads away from personal considerations.

To reach, then, the "emotional preparedness" which is needed to vitalise the study of statistics, we must turn to the function of the poetic and philosophic imagination, with its marvellous mystic potencies: "Through the imagination," writes Mr. Gray, "the obstinate distinction between the known and the unknown is found to be malleable: Even those who are dear to us because of their idiosyncrasies (i.e., our friends) are inadequately known till they are discerned also in their representative character: So far as this operates, the mind is able to reach forth to the crowd without an overwhelming feeling for its unknown individuals."

Mr. Gray proceeds to illustrate this by showing that it was the characteristic of Walt Whitman's work to evoke this kind of interest. Almost all his portraits are of deliberate purpose portraits of nameless men: "The passing stranger to whom he does not speak has power to sound in his mind the call of a common humanity." In another part of the paper Mr. Gray finely says that the deeper experience we have of love for a particular individual, the more we are able to realise our ethical relation to the unknown crowd; "for every deep affection reveals something of cosmic meaning to the lover. He finds the universal Human in the particular person."

CHARLES B. UPTON

THE CLEANSING OF LONDON.*

IN following Mr. Jephson's account of the Sanitary Evolution of London, the reader will not forget that a similar evolution has been going on in other towns and in many countries, so that while he studies the movement in London, he may feel that the history of immense effort and slowly won improvement there is not merely a local history, but is representative of the whole great toil by which the human mind has striven to fit the city, this and every city, to the requirements of urbane human life. Mr. Jephson's book, while in many respects excellent, is not particularly easy reading, and it may be useful, therefore, by way of introduction to its pages, to bring into prominence a few of the architectural lines on which it is constructed. In the first place, we may mark a chronological interest. The successive chapters begin (after the second) with reference to the decennial census results from that of 1861 onwards. And from a comparison of these, we obtain a graphic conspectus of the growth of London, precisely that unprecedented increase and crowding which determines the most unmanageable of its sanitary problems. The difficulty was constantly emerging in a fresh place. For while the total population was multiplying, certain districts were emptying. The centre (the "City" of the book) was becoming more and more like the void vortex of the whirlpool. Other districts (the "inner ring") were reaching "saturation point" and could hold no more. The outer districts were and are still filling up. But within the period of our history, there was no adequate power to provide beforehand for the needs of the morrow, and accordingly the same disgraceful and dangerous conditions are repeated from centre and inner ring to outer ring and to the outermost areas of extra metropolitan London.

The subjects to be treated in a history of sanitation are definite and prosaic. In themselves, they lack that interest rising to a kind of excitement which so materially facilitates the absorbing of a narrative. This must be drawn, if it is to be gained at all, from a consideration of the transcendent problems of human fate which are involved. The origin of tramways will always appeal to people who have to ride in them; for water we may, if we love St. Francis, create some sense of sisterhood. The measures for checking adulteration of food, or for establishing a Port Sanitary Authority, are interesting, because they affect us so nearly. But the keen duel which always goes on between analyst and adulterator might have been utilised to give more dramatic appeal to these sections of the work. We will not linger over the graveyards, only noticing that while here as elsewhere, Mr. Jephson, so far from exaggerating, rather sheers off from the most graphic details, his description will prove gruesome enough for most tastes. We read also of streets, slum clearances, houses, workshops, bake-houses, mortuaries, and drainage, though in connection with this last, we miss the impetuous controversy, connected with the name of Chadwick. Mr. Jephson was, until the recent election, a member of the London County Council, and it is needless to add that he gives some account of the development of open spaces. In a word, he records a comprehensive and instructive history, which should be familiar to all Londoners. It may be asked what impulse led to these vast efforts to overtake the abuses and remove the filth and poison which distinguished London at the time of the Great Exhibition? The answer would be manifold and is partly suggested by Mr. Jephson. Amongst other reasons he adduces the fear of epidemics, and here he is, of course, in agreement with other inquirers in the same field. The cholera of 1832, 1848, 1853, 1866, became progressively alarming, and perhaps more fear was occasioned by the rumour of cholera in Egypt in 1888 than by its actual devastations at home half a century before.

Who were the protagonists in this Titanic struggle? For struggle there has been and is, a fight, stern, stubborn, and not always successful, against "vested interests in filth and dirt." The men whose labours find the deep touch of human indignation, and who conduct the long drawn-out struggle with seemingly immovable opponents, which on the battlefield or in the senate we call heroism, are for the most part unknown to fame. They are only salaried officials, whose business it has been to expose nuisances and to draw reports, but for all that the medical officers of health are the real captains in sixty campaigns against dirt and the "rights of property" in dirt. The medical officers, I say, have it for their yearly business to present a report. There is unfortunately no corresponding compulsion on vestry men to heed or even to peruse the documents which, for the most part, pass out of sight, and if they were ever remembered, are yet quickly forgotten. But there is a large collection of them in the Council Library, and Mr. Jephson has read them. I had almost said unfortunately has read them, but that would be untrue, since, had he not studied the now dusty pamphlets, we should have missed a book for which we ought to be grateful. But the temptation simply to lift solid blocks of these reports into the "Sanitary Evolution" was evidently a sore one. Extracts are rightly given. Facts, invaluable facts and opinions, which still merit close attention, are thus brought before the eye of the reader. But in places, the catena of extracts introduced by the formula "And the Medical Officer of Health for ——— says," does become monotonous. So much must be confessed. The narrative tends to be featureless and it is difficult to retain the proper attitude of attention. A little more skill in arrangement might have made the book more generally interesting without impairing its really great value as the record of a very important branch of our recent history. One thing these voluminous excerpts achieve. They enforce one of the main lessons of sanitary history. There is no more important public personage in a town community than the Medical Officer of Health. His function is a high one, and we might even adapt a famous sentence of Bishop Butler's and say, had it might as it has right, had it power as it has manifest authority, it would altogether transform the outward aspect of the town and enhance the physical well-being of the city crowd. BOSTON CONFERENCE.

SIR,—Will you permit me to offer a few suggestions to those of your readers who hope to attend the Conference?

I have in mind especially those who will need to return immediately after the meetings are over.

There is much to be seen, and much will be heard, at the "Hub of the Universe," but there are a few charming scenes between the hub and the circumference. Apart from any sentiment of patriotism, as one who has sailed to the United States and also to Quebec twice, I strongly advise all who can arrange to do so to sail to Quebec, and return from New York. The three days' trip inside of Belle Isle is a glorious experience. Land at Quebec. See old Quebec, the Plains of Abraham, and then go to Montreal by train. If circumstances press, go by train from Montreal to Boston, about 340 miles. There is a choice of routes. If there is no such pressure go up the St. Lawrence by boat, passing Lachine Rapids, and through the Thousand Islands to Toronto, "very English, you know." Toronto is delightfully situated on Lake Ontario, and deserves more than a flying visit. Go by train to Buffalo, staying at Niagara Falls en route.

This seems to be a natural turning point, and I recommend intending travellers to consult Messrs. Cook & Son's booklet and literature as to further movements. What I wish to emphasise is this. Everyone who goes should get a glimpse of the great Dominion, the largest part of the British Empire, with a boundless future. The warmer days should be spent near the water. Canada becomes chilly in October. There is much to be gained by sailing to one port and from another.

Ample literature can be had free at the C.P.R. offices, Charing Cross, and from any of the shipping agents.

THE REV. R. J. CAMPBELL IN MANCHESTER.

THE much debated visit of the Rev. R. J. Campbell to Manchester took place on Tuesday. It was in connection with the centenary meetings of the Lancashire Congregational Union. Mr. Campbell had been engaged for many months past to preach the official sermon. When, however, the storm began to hurtle around the "new theology," many timid souls, and some very bitter ones, were stirred to write to the papers suggesting re-consideration of the matter. There have been many letters, pro and con., and eventually the committee solved the difficulty by confirming the engagement, while changing the place where the sermon should be preached. Instead, therefore, of one of the many fine old Independent churches which exist in the city, the Free Trade Hall was fixed upon as a meeting place, and the expenses involved were paid by a very wide sale of tickets of admission at 1s. and 2s. each. The hall was packed to the utmost of its enormous capacity. Rarely indeed, even at great political meetings, is it so crowded. The audience was made up of all classes, and men were easily in the majority. The service was simple in the extreme, and showed the skill of our Congregational friends in managing large assemblies. There was no ornate music, no anthem whatever, only well-known hymns to immemorial tunes, all of which went with a roar. The hymn from our own Bowring, "In the Cross of Christ I glory," seemed as familiar as all the rest, and, curiously, this was the only one with any "Christology" in it, all the rest being fine old general hymns familiar in all our services. A local minister conducted the first part of the service, after which Mr. Campbell offered prayer, addressed almost entirely to Christ. The sermon was on the "Gospel of Reconciliation," and to the surprise of some was read from manuscript in a quiet, even voice, with very little attempt at oratorical effect. At times it reached points of real passion, but there were long level, quiet passages, and it closed quietly, almost abruptly. All the same, it was listened to throughout with rapt attention. Frequently the audience broke in with storms of cheers, sometimes again and again renewed. A few words will suffice to summarise the sermon itself. It was bold in spirit, beautiful in form, and wonderfully simple and clear in its arrangement. It showed how Paul's conception that death, physical death, was the consequence of sin, was a belief which no cultured person could now hold: It defined sin as selfishness, and reconciliation as turning to love. Christ did not die to satisfy God's anger. His death was the seal of his unselfish love. Love would redeem the world, love was the true Gospel, its real power, and mere talk about "belief" in an atmosphere of suspicion and mistrust was "nauseating."

It had all been said before by Mr. Campbell, and it sounded familiar, but none the less true and beautiful in our ears. Indeed, it was good to hear our real good tidings proclaimed with such power, and followed with such sympathy. For, if possible, the audience and its attitude was more remarkable than the preacher.

It seized upon and cheered every point in the argument, and never once was there the least sign of dissent. As a bit of oratory, the sermon rather failed in that it somewhat dragged after its real climax. Consequently, the real storm of cheering was in the middle, and not at the end, but the cheers, if not the spontaneous tribute of feeling deeply stirred by an eloquent peroration, were the mark of deep sympathy and warm admiration; nor could there, one felt, have been a single soul in all the vast audience who did not pray that the preacher might live to make his gospel of love a real power in men's lives. THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

ONE of our happiest games in childhood is sailing boats. At first anything that will float on the water will serve as a boat—a cork, a chip, a nutshell, a clothes-peg, a piece of stiff paper twisted into shape. If only our boat will float we can imagine the rest. After a time we want our boats to be more like real ones. Besides just not sinking in the water, they must keep right side up and front foremost, without turning round and round in the moving water.

Do you remember, after buying a real boat at a toy-shop, perhaps for a penny, the excitement of first trying it in water—in a bath or a pond—to see if it would behave as a boat should? Many of our toy boats would behave beautifully as long as the water was quite still, but as soon as we made the least attempt at a storm, or even a ripple, our boat would fill with water and go down to the bottom. The new toy might be very pretty, and look like a boat, but it was no good except to look at. Even a clumsy cork that would float in our storm was better than such a mere show-boat.

How proud we were, however, if our new boat would ride properly on our toy waves, and even keep afloat when it had shipped just a little water, giving us the chance to bale out—as if for our lives! If our ship would keep front foremost in a current of moving water it was a still greater triumph.

To move along, driven by the moving water, is called drifting. Most of us had to be content with toy boats that would keep afloat and would drift right side up and front foremost. And we called it sailing our boats when we just put them in the water and watched them drift. But perhaps some of you have had or watched toy boats with real sails to catch the wind, or with some machinery inside to make them move through the water. Such toy boats can be started in a certain direction across a pond or lake, and they may reach the other side in safety. But there is always much uncertainty about the voyage. The wind may rise, the sail prove too big, and the boat be capsized; or the machinery may go wrong, or the wind or current may prove stronger than we expected when we started our boat, and it may be driven ashore in the wrong place. As long as there is no one on board to manage the boat, moving through the water is not much better than drifting with the water. Indeed, to be driven through the water by the wind without guidance is also called drifting.

A real boat must be managed not by someone on shore, but by someone on board. It is not enough to start the boat from shore in the right direction. It must be steered during the voyage. It is not enough for a sailor to keep his ship afloat and to move forward wherever wind or wave may take him. He must be able to manage his ship so that it will go where he wants. His voyage must be no mere drifting. He must be able to steer.

You will understand the difference between drifting and steering in our own lives. Only a few of us can ever have a boat to manage. But we have each one of us to live our own life, to steer our own course. To do as others do without any will of our own is mere drifting.

I once heard of a small boy who refused to walk through a muddy puddle as his schoolfellows were doing. They laughed at him as a "baby," but still he refused. At last he told them that his mother would clean his boots, and it would be a shame to dirty them more than he need. Then they left off teasing him, and I expect they felt ashamed of themselves. That boy would not drift. He was learning to steer.

I wonder how many of you love the sea?

"The sea, the sea, the open sea!"

The blue, the fresh, the ever free."

What happiness it is to spend long hours on the shore, busy with our digging, and making holes and ditches for the water to fill as the tide rises, or castles to be surrounded by the water! You know how, now and then, you have stood upright to straighten your back after digging, and have let your eyes wander off to the distant horizon, where the sea seems to stop and the sky to begin. How interesting it is to watch the sails of a ship or the smoke of a steamer gradually disappearing in the distance, and how wonderful it is to see a vessel coming up over the edge, as it seems, out of the beyond, and gradually coming nearer and nearer.

Have you realised that from the seashore anywhere we have an open road, as it were, to sail away to any other part of the great ocean?

Have you ever wished to sail away toward the distant horizon—right into the sunset perhaps—into the beyond? Imagine the wonder of setting out across the unknown ocean to a distant shore out of sight. It is a strange sensation to be on the open sea quite out of sight of land.

Perhaps it is the mystery of that distant horizon, with its suggestion of a distant shore out of sight, that suggests to us the picture of life as a voyage. We start on our life's voyage and sail on into the unknown future. We believe in a harbour beyond, but we do not see it.

I expect you all know the hymn—

"We are sailing o'er an ocean,

To a far and distant shore."

Words and tune together express for us the delight of going on—in spite of difficulty and danger, with glad faith in the beacon light of God's love. And there is another mariner's hymn, which you will like for its picture language:—

"Launch thy bark, mariner!

Christian, God speed thee!

Let loose the rudder-bands;

Good angels lead thee;

Set thy sails warily,

Tempests will come;

Steer thy course steadily:

Christian, steer home!"

RELIGION IN ETHICS.

OUR Manchester correspondent sends us an account of the remarkable gathering which crowded the Free Trade Hall on Tuesday evening, when the Rev. R. J. CAMPBELL preached the commemorative sermon in connection with the centenary of the Lancashire Congregational Union. The Manchester Guardian next day published the sermon in full, and it is a great thing that Mr. CAMPBELL'S appeal should have such impressive and wide publicity. There was another gathering, in its way no less remarkable, though of much smaller numbers, in London on Thursday week, when Mr. CAMPBELL addressed the Union of Ethical Societies in the Caxton Hall. In both addresses he went straight to the heart of religion. In Manchester he dealt with the "ministry of reconciliation," declaring it to be the life of unselfishness, of self-sacrifice, which reveals perfect love, the only power that can overcome sin, and that so GOD is revealed, and man reconciled to GOD, for love is GOD. In the life and the perfected self-sacrifice of the death of JESUS, that perfect love was manifested to the world; therein was GOD reconciling the world to Himself. And now we know, as PAUL knew, that nothing else will avail, and that is the only true life for us, the life of love revealed in sacrifice. During the hundred years of the Union's existence Mr. CAMPBELL said, in conclusion, "The forces of GOD have been clearing many hoary evils out of the way, and making this part of GOD'S earth a little healthier, a little happier, and fuller of life and love. By the part you and yours have taken in this work is your real worth to be judged in GOD'S heaven. This is the work of reconciliation—the destruction of everything that makes for selfishness and materialism in thought and deed, and the increase of everything that makes for more abundant life and love. Thank GOD for a ministry of reconciliation, and for the high privilege of being called upon to take a part in it. We are ministers of CHRIST and stewards of the mysteries of GOD just in so far as our lives are able to reveal the love of GOD, and not otherwise. The truth could not be simpler, and it is all the sad world needs. It is the glorious gospel of the ever-blessed GOD."

And to the Union of Ethical Societies Mr. CAMPBELL said the same essential thing, that religion is life, the true life, which gives of self for the well-being of the whole; and they, who believed in the absolute supremacy of the moral law, and the master power of love, whether they knew it or not, actually believed in GOD.

Self-sacrifice, he said, did not necessarily mean self-immolation: there was a duty of self-formation, to make the most of one's life, that it might be the completest possible gift to the life of the whole; that desire to give oneself for the good of the whole was the secret of morality; the happiest life was that of noble self-sacrifice.

Life in this universe they must recognise to be compassed about by a mysterious, unfathomable power, of which STEVENSON had spoken as "something which means intensely, and means good." And his own plea was that such a Power, the primal source of all, could not be less than that which it produced. Love and self-sacrifice, which they found in humanity, and knew to be the best and highest things in life, must be recognised as an expression of that primal reality in the universe for which only one name would suffice, that of GOD.

Therefore he believed in the love of GOD, which was most perfectly manifested in JESUS CHRIST. And their own life in that universe, true to the moral ideal, they must feel to be an accomplishing of the same Divine purpose, in the self-realisation of the Infinite.

Thus for orthodox and most unorthodox alike, Mr. CAMPBELL had one appeal. The one essential thing for true progress, and the perfecting of life—the life with GOD, both for the individual and the community, is surrender to the highest claims of love and unselfish service. So, he said in Manchester, they would fulfil the reconciling ministry of CHRIST; so, he declared to the ethicals, they would realise their completest manhood for the common good, and find that they were actually living the true life with GOD.

At the Rochdale Reform Club on Friday evening, March 8, two presentations were made to the Rev. T. P. Spedding, the newly appointed Field Agent of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, in recognition of his loyal services to the cause of progress during the past twenty years. The "Liberal Forwards" gave him Morley's "Life of Gladstone" and other books by the same writer, while other Liberals presented a handsome silver tea service, inscribed to "A valiant fighter in freedom's cause," together with some articles of library furniture.

PAUL GERHARDT.

BORN March 12, 1607 (according to the generally accepted date), Paul Gerhardt, the greatest of Lutheran hymn writers of the seventeenth century, was a year and a half older than John Milton, and he lived two years longer. When Milton, in 1648, made his second attempt to put some of the psalms into English verse, from which we have our two well-known hymns, "The Lord will come and not be slow," and "How lovely are thy dwellings, Lord," Gerhardt, who appears to have been living at that time in Berlin, and had not yet received his first pastoral charge, had already proved himself a hymn-writer of great power and depth of feeling, and in particular celebrated that year of the close of the terrible Thirty Years' war, which had desolated Germany, in a hymn of thanksgiving for the peace.

He is best known to us, as we said in a note last week, through John Wesley's free but fine translation of his "Befiehl du deine wege,"

"Commit thou all thy griefs
And ways into His hands," and we have also some verses of another of his hymns, translated by Richard Massie, as

"Evening and morning
Sunset and dawning,
Wealth, peace and gladness,
Comfort in sadness,

These are Thy works, all the glory be with the third verse beginning:

"Griefs of God's sending
All have an ending."

But the great power and beauty of Paul Gerhardt's hymns can only be fully realised by those who are familiar with them in their native German. More would, perhaps, have found their way into our hymn-books if it had not been for their elaborate metre and the great length of the hymns. There are about 120 of Gerhardt's hymns, and the average length is 15 stanzas, with sometimes ten or even more lines to a stanza: One of his finest hymns, "Was Gott gefällt, mein frommes Kind," has 20 stanzas. The best English representation of Paul Gerhardt, on the whole, is in the twenty-three translations in Miss Winkworth's "Lyra Germanica."

Lovers of hymnody, who are also readers of German, should by all means procure Professor Wernle's masterly study of Gerhardt,* to which we referred last week: It presents, first of all, a picture of the religious condition of Germany in the seventeenth century, and tells what little is known of Gerhardt's life, and then proceeds to a study of the hymns.

It was a miserable time in which he grew up to manhood: Born at Gräfenhainichen, about ten miles from Wittenberg, where his father was a man of some position, he was a boy of eleven when the Thirty Years' war broke out, and ten years later he went to Wittenberg, to Luther's university, to study theology. When peace was concluded in 1648 he appears to have been in Berlin, but what he had been doing through all those years is not known; nor how it was he came to Berlin; but from certain festive poems of his, and the fact that he found his wife there, it is concluded that he was for some years a tutor in that city, and no doubt preached on occasion. In 1651 he was appointed to the pastorate of Mittenwalde, a little town a few miles south of Berlin, and thither four years later he took his wife. In 1657 he was recalled to Berlin as one of the ministers of the Church of St. Nicholas, and it is of the next few years of his Berlin ministry alone that anything in detail is known of Gerhard's career.

He made for himself a position of great influence, and was much beloved by his people; but he was brought into sharp conflict with the Elector of Brandenburg, and finally had to relinquish his post. The Elector was earnest in his efforts of conciliation between the Lutheran and Reformed churches, but Gerhard held to the strictest Lutheran dogmatism, and made an uncompromising strictness in that respect matter of conscience. In that troubled time his wife died, and in 1669 he accepted a charge at Lübben, fifty miles away from Berlin, but among a rude and unsympathetic people, and there, in 1676 he died.

It appears to have been a life largely shadowed by tragic circumstances, and yet in Gerhard's hymns we see how completely faith had triumphed, in the simplicity of his surrender and the joy of his trust in the perfect love of God. He had much to suffer, but he had learnt to suffer as a child of God, and even all the misery of the Thirty Years' war, as Professor Wernle remarks, could not silence the rejoicing of the Lutheran hymns:

Paul Gerhard expressed in his hymns all that was most beautiful and profound in Christian faith, as Luther understood it, faith standing fearless against the whole world, and rejoicing in the possession of perfect love. He refused to compromise his strict orthodoxy, but often as he sings, mindful only of the things of the spirit, the barriers of creed fall away, and he is found in the greater company of all devout souls in the one Household of God. Gerhard, says Professor Wernle, is the most natural of all religious poets. There is in his hymns a simplicity and sincerity of language which remind one of Goethe. He does not strive after effect; often he simply paraphrases a psalm or other passage of Scripture, and speaks out quite naturally what is in his heart; but however unassuming his manner, the true poet cannot be mistaken.

Let us recall here some of his verses, as they are given to us in the translations of "Lyra Germanica."

One of the happiest notes in Gerhard is in the opening verses of this hymn of thanksgiving:—

"Geh aus, mein Herz, und suche Freud
In dieser lieben Sommerzeit
An deines Gottes Gaben!"

Go forth, my heart, and seek delight
In all the gifts of God's great might,
These pleasant summer hours;
Look how the plains for thee and me
Have deck'd themselves most fair to see,
All bright and sweet with flowers.

The trees stand thick and dark with leaves,
And earth o'er all her dust now weaves
A robe of living green;
Nor silks of Solomon compare
With glories that the tulips wear,
Or lilies' spotless sheen.

The lark soars singing into space,
The dove forsakes her hiding-place,
And coos the woods among;
The richly gifted nightingale
Pours forth her voice o'er hill and dale,
And floods the fields with song.

* * * *

The corn springs up, a wealth untold,
A sight to gladden young and old,
Who now their voices lift
To Him who gives such plenteous store,
And makes the cup of life run o'er
With many a noble gift.

Thy mighty working, mighty God,
Wakes all my powers; I look abroad
And can no longer rest:
I too must sing when all things sing,
And from my heart the praises ring
The Highest loveth best.

Other verses follow, picturing the more perfect joy of heaven, but these in the pure gladness of their natural rejoicing may quite well stand alone. Another of the best known hymns begins:—

"Sollt ich meinem Gott nicht singen Und in ihm nicht fröhlich sein?" with the constant refrain through eleven of the twelve verses:—
"Alles Ding währt seine Zeit, Gottes Lieb in Ewigkeit."

Shall I not sing praises to Thee,
Shall I not give thanks, O Lord?
Since for us in all I see
How Thou keepest watch and ward;
How the truest, tenderest love
Ever fills Thy heart, my God,
Helping, cheering, on their road,
All who in Thy service move:
All things else have but their day,
God's love only lasts for aye.

When I sleep my guardian wakes,
And revives my wearied mind;
Every morning on me breaks
With some mark of love most kind;
Had my God not stood my friend,
Had His countenance not been Here my guide, I had not seen
Many a trial reach its end.
All things else have but their day,
God's love only lasts for aye.

As a father ne'er withdraws
From a child his all of love,
Though it often break his laws,
Though it careless, wilful, prove:
Even so my loving Lord
Doth my faults with pity see,
With His rod He chasteneth me,
Not avenging with His sword.
All things else have but their day,
God's love only lasts for aye.

When His strokes upon me light,
Bitterly I feel their smart,
Yet they are, if seen aright,
Tokens that my Father's heart
Years to bring me back again
Through these crosses to His fold,

From the world that fain would hold
Soul and body in its chain.
All things else have but their day,
God's love only lasts for aye.

All my life I still have found,
And I will forget it never,
Every sorrow hath its bound,
And no cross endures for ever.
After all the winter's snows
Comes sweet summer back again,
Patient souls ne'er wait in vain,
Joy is given for all their woes.
All things else have but their day,
God's love only lasts for aye.

Since then neither change nor end,
In Thy love can e'er have place,
Father! I beseech Thee send Unto me Thy loving grace.
Help Thy feeble child, and give Strength to serve Thee day and night,
Loving Thee with all my might,
While on earth I yet must live;
So shall I when time is o'er,
Praise and love Thee evermore.

The conclusion of this hymn is thus rendered by Mr. Richard Massie:—
Grant me grace, O God, I pray Thee,
That I may with all my might
Love, and trust Thee, and obey Thee,
All the day and all the night;
And when this brief life is o'er,
Love and praise Thee evermore.

This other hymn Professor Wernle mentions, as perhaps the most characteristic of the man himself, of all that Gerhard wrote:—

"Gieb dich zufrieden und sei stille
In dem Gotte deines Lebens!"

Be thou content; be still before
His face, at whose right hand doth reign
Fulness of joy for evermore,
Without whom all thy toil is vain:
He is thy living spring, thy sun, whose rays
Make glad with life and light thy dreary days.
Be thou content.

In Him is comfort, light and grace,
And changeless love beyond our thought;
The sorest pang, the worst disgrace,
If He is there, shall harm thee not.
He can lift off thy cross, and loose thy bands,
And calm thy fears; nay, death is in His hands.
Be thou content.

Art thou all friendless and alone,
Hast none in whom thou canst confide?
God careth for thee, lonely one,
Comfort and help will He provide:
He sees thy sorrow and thy hidden grief,
He knoweth when to send thee quick relief.
Be thou content.

And so through fifteen verses, twelve of which Miss Winkworth has translated, with the one refrain, "Be thou content," closing with a final thought of the heavenly home at last, in which, for the redeemed,
"The Everlasting is their joy and stay,
The Eternal Word Himself to them doth say,
Be thou content!"

We have already mentioned as one of Gerhard's finest hymns, "Was Gott gefällt, mein frommes Kind." These are some of the verses in Miss Winkworth's translation:—

The best will is our Father's will,
And we may rest there calm and still,
Oh, make it hour by hour thine own,
And wish for nought but that alone
Which pleases God.

What most would profit us He knows,
And ne'er denies aught good to those
Who with their utmost strength pursue
The right, and only care to do
What pleases God.

If this be so, then, World, from me
Keep, if thou wilt, what pleases thee;
But thou, my soul, be well content
With God, and all things He hath sent;
As pleases God.

And must thou suffer here and there,
Cling but the firmer to His care,
For all things are beneath His sway,
And must in very truth obey
What pleases God.

True faith will grasp His mercy fast,
And hope bring patience at the last.
Then both within thy heart enshrine,
So shall the heritage be thine
That pleases God.

This hymn is also translated by Mrs. Findlater, the younger of the Borthwick sisters, in "Hymns from the Land of Luther":—

"What God decrees, child of His love," of which the second verse may be compared with Miss Winkworth's as given above:—

The wisest will is God's own will,
Rest on this anchor and be still;
For peace around thy path shall flow,
When only wishing here below
What pleases God.

There are other hymns we might have quoted, and other verses of some of these, with much more of the language of orthodoxy in them: There is, for instance, the well-known hymn, "O Haupt voll Blut und Wunden," after St. Bernhard's "Salve caput cruentatum," which is often found in English orthodox books. But we have preferred to dwell upon those hymns which are the possession of all alike. "Gerhardt's hymns," says Professor Wernle at the end of his little book, "are the classic work of Lutheranism, clearly and concisely showing what it has signified for the world. Yet undoubtedly they are more than that; in the simplest of them, they belong to Christendom, nay, to humanity itself, as an expression of that which men, the most joyous, but also the most tried in suffering, have experienced with their God, comprehensible to every other human heart."

It is interesting to note, in the great company of singers, not only that Gerhardt was a contemporary of Milton, but that he was born just a hundred years before Charles Wesley, and two hundred years before Whittier.

THE best kind of religion is the religion of being kind. One's form of faith is worth nothing if it does not inspire one to deeds of kindness.—C. W. Casson.

THE WAY OF THE IDEALIST.

OFTEN in these changing times of ours, when even the denizens of the "Abyss" are beginning to see visions and dream dreams, one is tempted to think that a day will soon dawn when the way of the idealist will no longer be difficult, nor his end devoid of peace: Such optimism may be doomed to chastisement by the world, which still regards people of imagination very largely with suspicion, if no longer with actual hostility; but one is justified, at least, in looking to the future with more definite expectations of a better state of things being prepared for our descendants than we should have dared to entertain so confidently even a decade ago. The philosophical plead for caution, even in regard to our aspirations; and many of us are imbued with such an innate dread of being ranked with the "visionaries who live a thousand years in advance of their time" that we dare not, as a rule, confess to more than such expectations. But these receive more encouragement day by day, and certainly offer great advantages as a basis for action: When a man has no faith either in his own generation or the next, his outlook takes on a colourless aspect, and it is not to be wondered at if the day's work seems doubly tedious, and the object of it all increasingly futile.

Idealism is often reinforced in unsuspected ways, and nurtured in comfortless cradles. The most rationalistic thinkers are not guiltless of it; and our leading satirist, whose gibes are in everybody's mouth, is plainly in its thrall—though he himself would be the last to admit the truth of this. The pessimism of noble minds is actually the child of idealism; for it is only when a great soul is most keenly awake to the contrast between what life is, and what it might be, that despair has any chance of finding entrance to his thoughts. An idealist of the rarest kind was lost—barely lost—in Leslie Stephen, who, as his biographer tells us, became an agnostic only as a result of a poignant consciousness of the pain in the world; and in Matthew Arnold's lyric wistfulness, what a straining there is towards the "world above man's head," where it were "good to live," and "breathe free!" Yet the natural home of idealism is in the fervent, prophetic mind, which is lit by a glow of inspiration not comprehended by the multitude, and supported by a courage men may underrate, but not deny.

The time of martyrdom has not yet gone past, and in some European countries to-day—notably in Russia—the way of idealism is still the way of bloodshed and death. But with us things are different; and, although "the friend of the people," or the "prophet of the future," has to suffer a good deal of adverse criticism, and face a considerable amount of prejudice and misunderstanding, he is not refused a hearing: Neither does he find loyal adherents only among the poor and unlettered. Men and women of all classes are becoming more and more susceptible to the influence of ideas, and practical minds are committed to schemes which would have been regarded as visionary and Utopian twenty years ago: when one hears a Secretary for War speaking hopefully of a time when, as he believes, all the nations of the world will recognise the futility of armaments; or an eminent judge discoursing with almost poetic eloquence on the future of the Garden-city movement, or a famous scientist reconciling his logic with the teaching of the dreamer of Nazareth; or a courageous President putting forth a scheme for curtailing the fortunes of millionaires; or one of these said millionaires publicly confessing that he would consider it a disgrace to die rich, one cannot help feeling that a new spirit is waking in the world, to which the coming generation will inevitably kindle when a few more fetters of tradition and prejudice have been snapped asunder.

It is impossible even to read one's daily paper without gleaning further proofs of the activity of this new spirit: Amid the records of Court and Society functions, Parliamentary doings, law reports, and the world's disasters, one finds column after column devoted to such subjects as the founding of associations to promote amity between the nations, the claims of the new democracy, the ethical solution of the problem of the unemployed and unemployable, the socialist ideal and its relations to art and life, the comfort and health of the people, the pageant of Nature, the "new theology," and the duties of citizenship. The best intellects of our time are devotedly working to create better conditions for the men and women that are to be, whether by writing books, speaking in Parliament, beautifying our cities, brightening the lives of the little ones, exposing abuses, or caring for those who have begun their lives hampered by mental and physical disabilities. Wealth may dominate the world with more shameless effrontery than it has even done before; but the greater its extravagances the more pungent is the criticism to which it lends itself on the part of the once-submerged classes, who are advocating their claims to the best opportunities for human development with no uncertain voice, and who represent a formidable enemy that capitalism will have to reckon with. Everywhere, men and women, dissatisfied with the old creeds and formulas, yet finding no rest in the cold negations of ultra-rationalism, are striving to build up the fabric of a Universal Church in human hearts. Books explaining and defending the ethical ideal are widely read among the "self-educated"; the slum children are now taught to find a meaning even in their games, while the order and beauty of the physical world are explained to them in classes for nature-study. What does all this mean, but that idealism is establishing itself anew on the foundations laid by freer thought, scientific knowledge, and a more imaginative conception of the destiny of man?

Much can be said, and much is said, by those who take a hopeless view of their age and race, as to modern influences which tend in quite an opposite direction: One tries, occasionally, to see things through their coldly critical eyes, if only to balance what these sceptics call, with a bitter inflection, our "enthusiasm"; and lest we should forget, in dwelling too much on the "bright side," that humanity has yet a long way to go in darkness and pain before its highest hopes are achieved. But when the spirit of youth and freedom is in the air, it is impossible not to be infected by its glow and courage; indeed, it is nothing less than morbid to insist only on that brutal realism which deals with the plague-spots of modern civilisation, as if the fact that they exist is an indisputable proof that we shall never be without them.

In a recent poem entitled "New Year's Eve," Thomas Hardy arraigns God for making "another year" when there were "nine-and-ninety" reasons why He should not have done so. God replies in two stanzas that the cause of his prodigality is as inexplicable to Him as to his questioner.

"Sense-sealed I have wrought without a guess

That I evol'd a consciousness
To ask for reasons why,"

He says, adding—

"Strange, that ephemeral creatures who
By my own order are,
Should see the shortness of my view,
Use ethic tests I never knew,
Or made provision for."

Well, one remembers noting with amusement the patronising way in which a young essayist, in a "composition" on "Winter," alluded to the Creator's foresight in making the cycle of the year so varied. "It was a good idea of God's," said this schoolboy critic (in the profoundest spirit, of reverence, one feels convinced), "to divide the seasons into four, so that we can appreciate each in turn without being wearied." As a commentary on the purposes of the Eternal this is a crude statement; but even cruder, to some minds, will seem the theory of the distinguished writer we have quoted, that God not only labours without a plan, but without the slightest notion as to what His thought is likely to produce! Such a doctrine to-day will scarcely seem alluring even to the practical man, who often has so much more of the visionary in him than he will admit!; while, to the idealist, the "light that never was on land or sea" discovers, even in the darkest abysses of human suffering, motives, efforts, aspirations, and victories which are as complete a refutation of this soulless creed as the sunlight gleaming on a butterfly's wing is a refutation of the limited idea that the darkness in which the chrysalis abides is the only manifestation of life.

There has always been a charm about idealism which has appealed even to its enemies, who have had to admit that it was something more than the art of looking through rose-coloured spectacles that gave men, in crueller times than our own, the courage to ascend the scaffold, or burn at the stake, for their opinions. It has, however, been left for the twentieth century to demonstrate that the way of the idealist is also the way of economy and common sense, the way of logic, of humanity, and of truth.

LAURA G. ACKROYD.

THERE is no work so small, no art so mean, but it all comes from God, and is a special gift from Him. If, when at thy work, thou feel thy spirit stirred within thee, receive it with solemn joy, and thus learn to do thy work in God, instead of straightway fleeing from thy task.

UNITARIAN HOME MISSIONARY COLLEGE.

PRESENTATION OF PORTRAIT OF DR. BEARD.

A MEETING was held at Summerville, on Thursday, March 7, for the purpose of unveiling a portrait of the first Principal, the Rev. J. R. Beard, D.D., presented by his son. The portrait is a copy of the one in the possession of Mr. J. R. Beard, painted by George Patten, A.R.A., in 1851. The copy, made by Mr. J. Binney Gibbs, is an excellent piece of work, and a most faithful reproduction of the original. In conveying his wish to present the portrait, Mr. Beard said, in a letter to the committee last December, that the portrait represents his father as he was in 1851, when he was already meditating the plan of the College, eventually established in May, 1854.

"And this picture," Mr. Beard added, "I wish to present to the Unitarian Home Missionary College, that its students may learn to know the outward semblance of the man even as they are daily becoming imbued with his spirit of strenuous loving service of God and of man. And, while the men educated at the College have ever shown themselves to be his spiritual children in their work as pastors, as preachers, and as missionaries, it is with a special pleasure that I present this portrait to the College at this juncture, when they have distinguished themselves in the initiation and successful conduct of the Van Mission, than which nothing could be more consonant with his ideals. I was at the receptive age of boyhood when the College was established in 1854, and its inception and development were so integral a part of the interests of our family, that every successive step in its progress was graven on my mind. It grew with my growth until I almost came to regard it as a younger child of the family. The names of its chief supporters were held in reverence, and our Lares were called Gaskell, Yates, Sharpe, and Mackie. The earlier students received instruction in my father's library; they taught in the Sunday-school at Bridge-street; they formed part of our family circle at Christmas or New Year, and my sister and I were constant guests at the annual soirées, held by them at the old rooms in Marsden-street. When they entered the ministry their missionary enterprises and pastoral labours engaged the sympathies of our household, and were habitual topics of comment and conversation.

"As President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, of the Triennial Conference, and of our District Association, I have found the men trained at your College among the foremost all over the country in missionary enterprise, in pastoral devotion, in organising ability, in preaching power, in social effort, in wrestling with sin, ignorance, and misery, and in personal piety. Each has laboured to the glory of God according to his gifts. And especially has it seemed to me that amongst these men has been found the enthusiasm for that measure of God's truth which has been entrusted to Unitarians, which enthusiasm and zeal can alone make it of redeeming efficacy to the souls of men. Their cry has been, 'Woe unto me if I preach not the Gospel,' and in public halls, in back streets, in market places, and fair grounds, as well as in churches sanctified by holy memories of communion with the Divine, they have delivered the message which has been given them to speak. This is the same spirit which urged my father in his student days to initiate religious services at Malton, 22 miles from York, the scene of his daily labours—the same spirit which moved him in the formation of the Manchester District Unitarian Association, of the Unitarian Herald, and of this College. The Rev. Wm. Binns once said of him, 'Crusading was as necessary to him as to Peter the Hermit. Popular appeals were the breath of his life, and nothing more rejoiced him than that the common people should hear him gladly. He was a Radical among Whigs, an enthusiastic among men of judicious common sense—a free-will fighter on the side of providence among pious Necessarians who were contented with trusting in Providence. He went into the market-place, he enlisted lay preachers into the Christian army.' Such was the man who founded your College, and such are they who have been trained in it. Long may it exist to send forth men Unitarian in faith and missionary in spirit. I trust that this portrait on the College walls may always be to the students an incentive to imitate the strenuous and self-denying activity of its founder, and to follow his example of love and service to God and man."

The unveiling ceremony took place in the libraries, which were crowded. The President, Mr. Grosvenor Talbot, took the chair, and the Rev. C. Peach read some letters of apology. The Rev. C. T. Poynting wrote regretting his absence. "As one of those," he wrote, "who can well remember the founding of the Home Missionary College, who has for many years been one of its committee, and for some years counted it one of the greatest privileges of life to be one of the tutors, it would have been a source of great pleasure to be present when all the old friends of the College are gathered together to do honour to the memory of its founder."

Professor UPTON wrote from Littlemore expressing his great regret that the state of his health prevented him from being present, as he had special reasons for cherishing with warm affection and gratitude the memory of his uncle, Dr. Beard. "When a youth (Mr. Upton wrote), I spent some years under his roof in Higher and in Lower Broughton, and I can vividly recall not only countless instances of his kindness to me and others, but also the warm admiration which I felt for his upright and truly religious character. While most strenuously and faithfully discharging his onerous duties as schoolmaster, writer, and minister, he yet found time to conceive and execute many a plan for the good of the public, and of that Christian denomination to which he felt proud to belong. Of these noble efforts of his, the foundation of the Unitarian Home Missionary College was the most important and the most successful. It was his happy fortune to see his anticipations of the great good which the College was to perform to a large extent realised during his own lifetime; and it is our great privilege now to see in the good work that is being done in Summerville a verification of the founder's firm faith that in the future the College was destined to perform an ever-enlarging service to the cause of sound theological education and of true religion."

The CHAIRMAN said that the meeting was an evidence of the interest taken in the college and a recognition of the need and value of the work it is doing. He was not fortunate enough to remember Dr. J. R. Beard, but they all had vivid recollections of his son Dr. Charles Beard, while another son, Mr. James R. Beard, was, as long as health allowed, a leader in all good movements. He could not help thinking how the founder of the college would have rejoiced to see the position it occupied to-day. It had advanced, not by leaps and bounds, but steadily and persistently, and from a great present it was fitting itself for a greater future. He was glad to see the portrait of the founder placed on its walls now that the college had a home of its own: As in their private homes, they preserved portraits of their ancestors and so cultivated a tradition of family honour, so in great public institutions, they should honour and reverence their founders in order to preserve their spirit. He hoped to see, in time, all the stages in the history of the college represented on its walls, a complete gallery of all who had taught or studied under the auspices of the college. Meanwhile it was good in days when too many gave out an uncertain sound that they should have before them the portrait of a man who never denied his Unitarianism; but who, while honouring it, made it also to be honoured by others. The Chairman concluded by expressing his great pleasure in visiting Summerville for the first time: He was immensely struck by the beauty and dignity of the grounds and the house, and he congratulated the committee on the excellent property they had acquired:

Col. PILCHER, chairman of the College committee, then unveiled the portrait. It would, he said, always be an inspiration to them to look on the features of Dr. Beard, for he was one of the most strenuous workers Manchester had ever known.

Principal GORDON, in accepting the portrait on behalf of the College, said Dr. Beard was a man who could inspire enthusiasm and filial reverence. One proof of the latter was the touching letter from Mr. J. R. Beard, which accompanied the portrait. By the former they had indelible evidences in the history of Manchester. As a pioneer of popular and progressive education, Dr. Beard did a great work for Manchester. As an inspirer of missionary enthusiasm he did a great work for his own denomination. A scholar by mind and taste, he might have gained fame in the ranks of scholarship, but he preferred the practical paths of public service because he believed in that way he could do most good.

The Rev. J. C. STREET, one of Dr. Beard's earliest students, told in eloquent and picturesque terms the story of how he came under the influence of Dr. Beard, and the manner of man he found him to be. After fifty years those early impressions were as vivid as ever, and he still felt the old inspiration to missionary enterprise which it was the special genius of Dr. Beard to develop, mature, and direct in every man: That genius Dr. Beard had stamped on the College: It must ever be a Missionary College, and the present Unitarian Van Mission, born in the hearts of alumni of the College was the true child of Dr. Beard—the prince of missionaries:

Mr. F. W. MONKS moved and Mr. A. E. PATERSON seconded a vote of thanks to the Chairman and speakers: Mr. A. DUGDALE, in supporting it, recalled old memories of Dr. Beard, by whom, he said, he had been christened and married. Mr. F. MONKS suggested that an effort should be made to secure portraits of men like the late Ald. Rawson, who had been so closely associated with the College. The resolution was carried, and the meeting dispersed:

MIDLAND CHRISTIAN UNION:

ANNUAL MEETING:

THE annual meeting of the Midland Christian Union of Presbyterian, Unitarian, and other non-subscribing churches, was held at the Newhall Hill Church, Birmingham, on Monday.

The President, Mr. W. Byng Kenrick, took the chair at the business meeting, and there was a fair attendance of delegates. The report of the committee stated that progress was being made by the aided churches. The committee had reason to believe that the churches in the Union were in a more prosperous condition than had been the case in recent years. The generous support which enabled it to extend and enlarge the work of the union would, it was believed, eventually result in greater improvement, and in helping forward the objects for which the union was established—namely, the establishing and fostering of churches which imposed no creedal bonds on their own or succeeding generations, but existed to promote the knowledge and practice of that religion which regarded God alone as Lord of the conscience, and refused to circumscribe the thoughts of men concerning the Divine.

The financial statement showed an excess of expenditure over income for the year of £78 16s. 7d:

The PRESIDENT, in moving the adoption of the report and accounts, spoke hopefully of Unitarian prospects. After congratulating the Rev. Joseph Wood on his appointment to the presidency of the National Triennial Conference, he said he felt sanguine as to the future. He did not say that throughout the district every church that was at present not self-supporting was going to become a vigorous and independent church. He did not think that came within the limits of human possibility. It was idle to suppose that they were going to sweep the district; yet there were those who rightly contended that where this message was brought home to people in a clear, intelligible, and hopeful spirit, it would appeal strongly to numbers. He believed that many abstentions from religious observance were due to the fact that numerous people felt they could not honestly associate themselves with the forms of religious worship largely predominant throughout England at the present time. It they could reach that class of person with their message of free worship in a free church without creed or dogma, their future would be very satisfactory:

The Rev. JOSEPH WOOD seconded the resolution, and acknowledged the chairman's congratulations. He went on to say that one of the ways to increase their numbers was by those who already belonged to the church attending the services regularly. He believed the question of church attendance lay at the root of their failure. If they could quicken a revival of interest in public worship he had no doubt as to the result. He could not but believe that many of the tendencies of modern life were against Sunday observance and public worship: The week-end holiday, Sunday golf, billiards, tennis, and dinner parties—how many things there were tending to break down the observance of public worship! He believed these tendencies were all fatal to the vitality of religion, and they were more fatal to the liberal faith than any other. Unitarianism now had its finest and greatest opportunity. He did not speak of the New Theology with any desire that they should exploit it for denominational purposes, but he did say that the public attention which had been roused by the controversy gave them an opportunity—he would not say for denominational purposes—but it gave them an opportunity for making known the liberal faith and for getting the ear of men and women such as they had not had in their lifetime: He trusted they would all be on the alert to seize the opportunity, to make the most, speaking reverently, of the chance which Providence seemed to have offered them in the present position of religious thought and enquiry and excitement in this country: Let them be men of the time in which they lived, eager to seize its opportunities, and then he believed a great future was before them:

Mr. W. Byng Kenrick was unanimously re-elected president of the union, and the following officers were also re-appointed: hon. treasurer, Dr. J. W. Russell; joint hon. secretaries, the Rev. A. H. Shelley and Mr. E. Ellis Townley:

THE CHURCHES AND THE SOCIAL PROBLEM.

After lunch, the Rev. B. KIRKHAM GRAY, gave an address on the work of the National Conference Union for Social Service: It was essential, he said, in the effort to solve the social problem, that the moral and religious principle should not be lost sight of. If they were to leave social reform to the men whose only concern was scientific legislation and efficient administration they would be making a great mistake. There was in the present day a more acute conflict between their faith in humanity and the actual facts of life than there had ever been. Public life was consequently in a condition of dangerous unrest. They had either to deny their faith in a common citizenship and human brotherhood, or they must alter the facts of life. They had to consider by what means they could alter the facts of life. What they wanted to see was not only members of the church acting individually as members of political parties and local governing bodies, but they also wanted religious societies to recognise in this question an integral part of their duty as religious communities. Their union proposed social study as an introduction to social service: There should be a more adequate conception of the conditions under which the poor lived, and they proposed to hold a summer school at Oxford for social study.

In the course of the discussion that followed the Rev. JOSEPH WOOD said that one of the most hopeful signs of the times was that people were no longer content to sit at ease and let those social problems alone, simply alleviating their most miserable features. They must strike at the roots of the social problem, and first find out the causes of the distress which prevailed. There was sufficient sociology in the New Testament, and the union's real work was to call attention to the unrealised ideals of the gospel.

The Rev. T. P. SPEDDING afterwards delivered an address on "The Unitarian Van Mission," and votes of thanks were accorded the speakers.

In the evening the Rev. H. D. ROBERTS of Liverpool, preached to a large congregation:

MANCHESTER DOMESTIC MISSION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE annual meeting of the Manchester Domestic Mission was held in the Lord Mayor's parlour of the Town Hall, on Wednesday. The report, which had been circulated before the meeting, bears eloquent testimony to the range and efficiency of the work carried on at the two mission stations. The outstanding feature of the year is the completion of the extension scheme. The Renshaw-street extensions were carried out two years ago, and last year it was the turn of Willert-street. A report appeared in our columns recently of the re-opening ceremony, with an account of the work done. It only needs, therefore, to note now that the annual report shows that the fullest use has been made of the extensions, and that the various institutions show considerable progress as a result of their enlarged opportunities. On turning to the detailed reports it is seen that the missions have worked on the lines which long experience has approved. Definite religious work occupies a prominent place at both centres. There are over 800 scholars under instruction in the two Sunday-schools, morning and evening services are well attended on the Sunday, and there are week-evening meetings for worship also. Temperance work is carried on at both centres, and due care is given to the sick, the poor, and the lonely. Of the recreative work it is impossible to speak in detail. Clubs of all kinds there are, apparently for all ages and both sexes; while a very prominent place is given to summer holidays, both for the mothers and the scholars, well over three hundred from the two missions having spent a week at the Holiday Home at Great Hucklow, in addition to the ordinary Whit-week trips and many other special day excursions. The one unsatisfactory feature of the report is the financial situation which it reveals. There has been a lamentable falling-off in subscriptions, and the balance-sheet shows a deficit of nearly £200 for last year, which, added to previous deficits, brings up the total deficiency to over £700. The work is conceived and carried out, as the reports show, on broad, unsectarian lines. It is making its permanent impress on the lives and characters of the people, as witness, for example, the fact that a great number of the teachers and workers at both missions were formerly scholars in the schools. When the urgent and very pressing need is realised, surely Manchester will not allow such work to be crippled for want of the necessary funds.

Mr. G. H. LEIGH, who, in the absence of the Lord Mayor and the Rev. S. A. Steintal, presided, in moving that the reports be taken as read, referred to the extensions at Willert-street, which had realised their hopes and justified their efforts. He commended to the meeting the perusal of a book recently published entitled "The Next Street But One." In it would be found a study of certain social questions of the very first importance to all workers among the poor.

The LADY MAYORESS, who seconded the resolution, conveyed the apologies and regrets of the Lord Mayor. She was herself, she said, glad to be present. She had been struck since becoming Lady Mayoress by the great number of good societies at work in the City, and it had given her a higher opinion of Manchester people. All these people were working for noble and charitable ends in the name and love of the Master. They represented that religion of love, and fought against that sin of selfishness of which Mr. Campbell had been preaching. She confessed she went to hear Mr. Campbell the previous night with something resentful in her heart towards him; but her feeling was quite changed by what she heard. It was a beautiful plea for real Christian love, and it had deepened her love for God and man. It was the Gospel they needed; it was the Gospel for the homes and lives of the people; the Gospel of charity and love. In this spirit the Domestic Mission, she believed, did its work, and she wished it God speed.

Mrs. MANNING, who moved the adoption of the report, contrasted the enlightened activities of to-day in missions, settlements, municipalities, and Parliament on behalf of the education, feeding, training, and housing of the children of the poor, with the neglect against which the Society was one of the earliest protests when it was established 70 years ago. All these activities to-day gave them good hope, although as yet they brought no release from the labour. They must work on as ever before, except that with the increased care of the community for the physical needs of the poor the missions could give more care to their moral, social and spiritual needs. From her own first-hand acquaintance with the work at both missions, Mrs. Manning spoke in glowing terms of the devotion of both missionaries, but even they, she said, could not have achieved the results they had if they had not had the aid, in the one case, of the initiative and enthusiasm of Mrs. Timmis, and in the other of the constant, devoted, and untiring service of Miss Bishop, who was in all but name a curate to her father. In appealing for more workers at the Missions, Mrs. Manning emphasised the joy that comradeship in a good work would bring into their own lives. While they would feel the pity of the narrow, squalid, monotonous lives of many of the poor, and the real tragedy of the sacrifice of the childhood of many mere children compelled to work for their living, they would also feel the joy of helping them to a little brightness in life. Girls in happy cultured homes did not know how the poor lived, did not know that the touch of children's tired fingers was on many of the things they wore. But they should know, because only in that way could they fulfil the obligations of their own happier state.

The Rev. DENDY AGATE, who seconded the resolution, spoke of the conditions under which the missionaries worked and the evils against which they strove. Referring to the visit of the Rev. R. J. Campbell to Manchester, he said they must all be thankful that he had been able to pass below all the divisions of the churches, and to reaffirm the truth that it is love as opposed to selfishness which is to save the world.

The Revs. J. W. BISHOP and A. W. TIMMIS spoke upon some of the more personal aspects of their work, after which the meeting closed with various votes of thanks spoken to by Mr. E. Steintal and the Revs. J. E. Manning, E. L. H. Thomas, and W. Holmshaw.

FROM HUNGARY.

THE Editor's friendly warning came when we were yet very near the new year: Even without that, I had in mind to say a few words of our country and this dear old Church, in which we live and move and have our being. But, alas! we here are very few, and the work is much and absorbing.

Inasmuch as Hungary has been playing lately an important part in politics, I am tempted to speak first of politics. A year ago we were all out on the battle-fields in order to break down an old system, which was simply poisonous to the whole nation. The most simple men, and even those who had nothing to do with politics, began to feel that a political system, which was created under the most unsettled circumstances, as you know was the case after the great German-Austrian war in 1866—could not be good for ever. The victory of the national party was complete, and, as I told you last year, a new Government was formed with the strongest men of the country. Picture the sons of the great minister Andrássy and the great leader Kossuth, sitting in the same cabinet, assisted by equally grand politicians! The work they began was uplifting and fructifying in every direction, since their aim was: equal rights to every man in this country, and progress, side by side with the great Western nations. We knew full well that the inner and outer enemies of the country would not wait long to show that they are not dead yet, and their power is not extinguished. Recently a special attack has been directed against the Minister of Justice, Mr. Polonyi, who was formerly a lawyer, and as such was often entrusted with delicate matters. Everybody is already convinced that he is a man of rare talent, and one who is able to do a great service to the country, but his former opponents and present enemies are doing their best to secure his fall. We hope that whatever his fate may be, the Weherle ministry will not have to resign: This would lead to such quarrels as have not yet been known here: The peace of Europe, and especially that of the East, depends to a great extent upon the integrity and power of Hungary.

Count Andrassy, the Minister for the Interior, in his excellent work on the political history of Hungary, points out most forcibly the position which Hungary had in the past and must have in the future. The book contains most interesting chapters on the history of the English Constitution, the only one which has a thousand years history and which was close by that of Hungary. It would be a great pity that English readers should not have the chance of reading this most valuable work, and I hope that a translator and a publisher will soon be found.

It is encouraging to know that most competent men, such as the members of the Eighty Club, come over here to see, face to face, what Hungary is like, and what she is to be.

In our own circle we have had some very anxious days, because our beloved bishop was dangerously ill some weeks before Christmas. The illness lasted long, but ended well, for he is now quite strong and well again, and able to do his work as before. Our old men are getting rather scarce, and many of the younger generation have also fallen: In December, we lost Professor Gregory Benezédi, the second Hungarian student in Manchester College. Very few men have left a deeper gap behind them in the Hungarian Unitarian Church. Mr. Benezédi was 66 years old, but still quite strong and vigorous. Some years ago he retired from his professorial chair, and became treasurer of the Unitarian Church. The confidence and trust of the Unitarians in Mr. Benezédi as a treasurer was, I may say, extraordinary. Everybody knew that he was heart and soul a most zealous Unitarian, who was ready to do any service for his church. All his life long he was studying the history of the church and schools. He wrote several accounts on the most occult historical questions: Like a good shepherd, he cared for everybody, poor and rich, who belonged to his household of faith. Our history, and those tremendous sufferings and drawbacks which every Unitarian had to endure, made Mr. Benezédi, I may almost say, a Unitarian hero worshipper. He wanted to make everybody feel exactly as he did. As professor, he was influential and appreciated by his pupils.

I am glad to inform you that we are publishing the book of the Geneva Conference addresses, and expect a good effect from it.

Our life and activity is going on as usual, and, I may say, with an increasing hope for the future. Just lately we had the pleasure of a visit from the Minister of Education and Religion, Count Apponyi, in our college. He was quite satisfied with what he saw and experienced. Though a strong Roman Catholic, he shows a great sympathy to us, and proved it by raising the State's aid for the college and the church. We hope that perhaps we shall very soon get aid even for our theological college, which needs it very badly. The teaching staff continues to be always too small.

Our social life is also sufficiently active. Our social organisation, the Francis David association, is carrying on its work with much zeal. Last month I had the pleasure of reading a paper at Budapest before this Association on the "Messiah." I am glad to say that our liberal ideas were fully appreciated by the large audience, which consisted in the greatest part of strangers. Perhaps the time is not very far distant when we shall be able to send out missionaries to propagate our ideas far and wide.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Aberdare: Highland place.—The Rev. J. Page Hopps lectured on Wednesday evening, March 6, on "The Ultimate Authority in matters pertaining to Religion." The Rev. M. Evans presided, and there was a large congregation. The ultimate authority Mr. Hopps found to be not Church or Bible, but the voice of God in the living soul. The lecture made a deep impression.

Aberdare: Old Meeting.—A very successful Children's Musical Festival was held at the O.M.M. on Monday. Miss Gwenellian George was the leader, Miss Constance Evans was accompanist. The chair in the first meeting was occupied by the Rev. M. Evans, of High Court Place, and in the evening by Mr. D. R. Llewelyn, M.E.

Accrington.—The Oxford-street Unitarian Church has lost a faithful and highly esteemed supporter and trustee through the death, on the 11th inst., of Mr. John Taylor, Lemon Grove, after several weeks' illness. Mr. Taylor was in his sixty-sixth year, and up till lately had enjoyed remarkably good health. Being an Accrington boy, not favoured by circumstances of birth, he steadily worked his way up to the respect and confidence of his fellow-citizens, whom he served for many years on the Town Council. The funeral service at the Accrington Cemetery, on Thursday, the 14th, was conducted by the Rev. J. Islan Jones.

Cardiff.—The Rev. J. Page Hopps preached at the West Grove Church on Sunday, March 10, to crowded congregations both morning and evening. The subject for the morning being: "The Longing for God and the Response," and in the evening: "The Working Together of God and Man." On the following evening he lectured to a very large audience on: "The Rev. R. J. Campbell's Theology and Ours." The annual general meeting of the congregation was held on Tuesday, March 5, in the school-room, Mr. H. Woolcott Thompson, presiding. A general survey of the work of the past year was made and the report and accounts passed. The meeting agreed to send a message of cordial goodwill to the church at Swansea on the welcome of their new minister, and to offer to the Rev. Simon Jones their best wishes for a successful ministry.

Holywood.—The proposals for the better organisation of the Irish congregation were considered at a largely attended meeting on Wednesday evening, Feb. 27. Dr. S. H. Mellone presided, and Dr. John Campbell read a paper in exposition of the scheme. It is proposed that the congregations of Unitarians should be grouped under the name of the Free Presbyterian Churches. An interesting discussion, generally favourable to the proposals, followed, in the course of which the name "Unitarian" naturally came in for discussion. Dr. Mellone said that to bind themselves to a doctrinal name would be a great mistake.

Newport (Mon.).—The Charles-street church was crowded to overflowing on Tuesday evening, when the Rev. John Page Hopps lectured on "The Teachings of the Rev. R. J. Campbell, M.A., and Ours." In spite of having spent a laborious week among the churches of South Wales, the veteran lecturer showed no signs of fatigue, and gave an address which was remarkable for its vigour and directness. He took up Mr. Campbell's declarations upon various points, and, after welcoming his courageous advocacy of a more reasonable and enlightened faith, showed that all that is best in the New Theology has been the everyday teaching of Unitarians for generations past. The lecturer looked forward to the time when all churches would be one at heart in these larger truths, and the need for sectarian names would have passed away. The audience included several ministers of other denominations, and at the close a very hearty vote of thanks was unanimously accorded to the lecturer.

Pontypridd.—On Friday, March 8, though an inconvenient night for public meetings in the town, about 100 people came to hear the Rev. J. Page Hopps, whose address on "The Faith of the Church of the Future will be the Faith of the Unitarian Church of To-day" was greatly appreciated, and listened to with evident attention and pleasure.

Sheffield: Attercliffe.—A most successful sale of work was held at the School Church, on Thursday, March 7, opened by Mr. Simon Ryan, Mr. J. K. Lister presiding. The object of the sale was to raise some money for several desirable improvements in the church. £31 was the net amount realised. Attercliffe members had been working hard for several months. Friends from Upper Chapel, Uppertorpe, Rotherham, and Stannington came in to help by their presence and purchases.

Sunderland.—On March 3, the Rev. E. T. Russell, of Glasgow, preached at the Unitarian Free Church, his subject being "What I Mean by Serving God." The following evening Mr. Russell delivered a lecture on "Recasting Religious Belief," which was very much appreciated by a fairly good audience.

Swansea (Welcome Meeting).—The Rev. J. E. Manning, formerly minister of the Unitarian Church, preached morning and evening last Sunday, in connection with the welcoming of the new minister, who succeeds Dr. Tudor Jones, the Rev. Simon Jones, of Pontypridd. On Monday evening the welcome meeting was held. After ten the chair was taken by Councillor Moy Evans, and Mr. C. H. Perkins read a number of letters, one from Dr. Tudor Jones, "14,000 miles away," with his congratulation, and another from a local Congregational minister. Mr. John Lewis, of Pontypridd, spoke highly of the good work Mr. Simon Jones had done during his three years' ministry there; the Rev. J. E. Manning, as one of his college tutors, also bore his testimony, and there were other speeches, after which Mr. Simon Jones acknowledged the welcome, and spoke with modest hope of the work he was called upon to undertake.

Treorchy (S. Wales).—On Thursday evening, March 7, quite a crowd of interested people gathered together to hear the Rev. J. Page Hopps lecture on "A Scientific Basis of Belief in a Future Life." The Rev. J. Lewis, congregation minister, Tou Uprad, presided, and the lecture was greatly appreciated.

It would be interesting to know who the special correspondent is who sends to this week's Christian World an account of the Rev. R. J. Campbell's sermon at the Congregational Centenary in Manchester, of which we also have an account this week. The correspondent describes Mr. Campbell's prayer in the following terms:—"It was a prayer addressed direct to the Lord Jesus Christ, to Whom he appealed as the 'Eternal Majesty.' In this prayer he spoke of our coming 'to God the Father through God the Son.' It concluded with specific and piercing confessions of sin and petitions for forgiveness. In this prayer, and throughout the great sermon that followed, there was reverential, devout recognition of the unique divinity of our Lord. The language could mean nothing less; I never heard utterances more entirely inconsistent with Unitarianism, more completely loyal to Christ. It was an immense relief to those who had been expecting something very different." The sermon may be read in full in Wednesday's Manchester Guardian.

What Liberal Leaders

SAY ABOUT

The Nation

SIR EDWARD GREY.

"The help which a good weekly paper can give to Liberal work is most valuable, and I very cordially wish THE NATION all success."

MR. R. B. HALDANE.

"I think the whole of your first number admirable—a far higher level than has yet been touched since the days of the old 'Saturday'—full of life as well as of learning."

MR. HERBERT J. GLADSTONE.

"A message of goodwill and good wishes to Mr. Massingham and THE NATION. From his brilliant pen the Liberal Party will receive the criticism which stimulates and helps and does not discourage. My congratulations on the first number."

MR. LEWIS HARCOURT.

"My warmest congratulations on the very admirable and powerful paper you have produced."

MR. WINSTON CHURCHILL.

"I am sure THE NATION will be of great value to the serious purposes of Liberalism, and will be distinguished in current journalism for the strong personality and the lofty political conceptions of the Editor."

NOTICE.

Next week, on account of Easter, "The Inquirer" will be published on Thursday. Editorial Matter and Advertisements should be sent in as early as possible.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE annual meetings of several important societies are reported in our present issue. Friends of the London Domestic Mission are requested to note that the annual meeting is to be held at Unity Church, Islington, on Tuesday evening, May 14, when the chair is to be taken by Mr. Charles W. Jones, of Liverpool.

AN exchange for three months has been arranged between the Rev. Hobart Clark, of New Brighton, N.Y., and the Rev. G. L. Phelps, of Evesham. Mr. and Mrs. Clark have many friends in this country, he having been minister at Cardiff, 1882-88. They will be at Evesham until the end of July, Mr. Clark being due there for Sunday, May 12, and will be returning to the States early in September.

THE publication of the Rev. R. J. Campbell's book, "The New Theology," has been the literary as well as the theological excitement of the week, and full reviews appeared on Wednesday, the day of publication, in most papers of any consequence; The Manchester Guardian had a two-column review, by "W. H. D." (initials very familiar to our readers), which concluded as follows:—

"Undoubtedly Mr. Campbell's book will be read widely and discussed eagerly, and it will penetrate into quarters where theology of a more formal and scholastic type would never obtain a hearing: Let it be counted to him for righteousness if he stirs stagnant waters and compels men to think. It is the book of a preacher, written evidently with great rapidity, with a large and expectant congregation rather than a quiet and meditative reader in view. Hence its repetitions and its tricks of popular emphasis, both quite legitimate in an author who never forgets that he is first and foremost a speaker. It is hardly literature at all, and it is not as such that it makes its claim upon our attention. Its strength lies, where we are sure Mr. Campbell meant it to lie, in its incisive clearness of statement, its passionate moral fervour, the breadth of its religious sympathies, and the optimism of its social vision."

Dr. Horton, in the Christian World, surely with some exaggeration in the fervour of his affection and admiration for his friend, speaks of Mr. Campbell as the George Fox of the twentieth century, and of his book (if its system of thought should prove to be true) as likely to rank with such religious classics as Augustine's "City of God," Anselm's "Cur Deus Homo," and Calvin's "Institutes."

CERTAINLY one of the most capable, and to our mind most discerning notices, was that in the Westminster Gazette, which says of the book:—"It is an able and interesting attempt to re-state Christian doctrine in terms of philosophy. It is not, perhaps, so original as Mr. Campbell thinks, for any reader who is acquainted with recent philosophical writing will be able to trace a good deal of it to its sources—to Hegel, Thomas Hill Green, Caird, Harnack, Pfeiderer, and so forth. The application of 'monistic idealism' to the philosophy of the Christian religion is at least as old as Hegel, and, if we get past the phrase to the ideas behind it, as old as the Christian religion itself. The essential idea at the back of it is supremely expressed in the first and second cantos of the "Paradiso" of Dante. The dogmatic questions which Mr. Campbell raises are, in essence, the questions which were debated by Church councils from the fourth century onwards, and earlier, in the disputes between the Jewish-Christians and the Gentile-Christian gnostics." "There must be somewhere a real revival of thought," this reviewer concludes, "when a preacher can cause this stir by an attempt to combine Hegelianism with Christianity."

THE March Atlantic Monthly contains a memorial poem on "Longfellow, 1807-1907," by Thomas Bailey Aldrich, beautiful in itself, and speaking to us with a touch of deeper feeling, as we receive the news of the writer's death. Mr. Aldrich's name will be always associated with the Atlantic Monthly, for he succeeded W. D. Howells as Editor, and was the friend of Lowell and Holmes. Thus he wrote of Longfellow:—

"They do not die who leave their thought
Imprinted on some deathless page:
Themselves may pass, the spell they wrought

Endures on earth from age to age:
And thou, whose voice but yesterday
Fell upon charmed listening ears,
Thou shalt not know the touch of years;
Thou holdest time and chance at bay.
Thou livest in thy living word
As when its cadence first was heard:
O gracious Poet and benign,
Belovéd presence! now as then
Thou standest by the hearths of men.
Their fireside joys and griefs are thine;
Thou speakest to them of their dead,
They listen and are comforted.
They break the bread and pour the wine
Of life with thee, as in those days
Men saw thee passing on the street
Beneath the elms—O reverend feet
That walk in far celestial ways."

THIS same number of the Atlantic Monthly (Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.; London: Archibald Constable & Co. 1s. net. Postage 4d.) contains an article on "The Centenary of Longfellow" by Bliss Perry, who remarks, in passing, that "there is but too much truth in Mr. Oliver Herford's witty description of the present-day New England as the abandoned farm of literature. Apparently the soil must lie fallow for a while. . . . But while the old orchard was bearing, what bloom and fruitage was hers!" And of Longfellow, he says, in conclusion: "Until simplicity and reverence go wholly out of fashion he will continue to be read."

THERE were some Wesleyan revival services recently at Rawtenstall. They included a men's meeting, at which nearly a thousand persons are said to have been present. A curious item of the programme was the singing of the hymn, "I heard the voice of Jesus say," to the tune of Auld Lang Syne. That is not a case to illustrate Rowland Hill's (or some other man's) protest against the devil having all the pretty tunes, for surely the Prince of Darkness never owned the copyright of Auld Lang Syne. But it is a curious transference nevertheless—the story of a soul told to the tune which has been associated from times beyond memory with the meetings and partings of convivial friends. It is the social glass suddenly confiscated and extemporised into a communion cup.

So it is said that at some similar meeting held a long time ago, and not at Rawtenstall, the hymn "Come, O thou traveller unknown," was sung to the tune of "Rule Britannia." No profanity could have been intended. It was the outcome of a sudden desire to crown Jesus Lord of all; patriotism, sociality, all times, tunes, and tempers, must belong to Christ. At times we have shared that feeling. By and by we discover that certain of the current coins of this world are not stamped with the lineaments of Jesus at all, and yet are not, on that account, to be deemed base metal. They are an excellent medium of exchange, and would be none the better for a sacred inscription and a saintly figure. They have their use in this world. The king of our spirits claimed no proprietorship in them. Render them to Cæsar he said. It is as well to know that in the realms of thought, in pictorial art, in music, there are also territories over which Christianity has no special claim. As John Wesley devoted one hour to the preaching of the cross, and the next one to reading Homer's Iliad, or the latest whimsicality of Laurence Sterne, so we shall be none the worse Christians if we give our various faculties due exercise; to each hour its duty or pleasure, to each function its own tune. It is not written of Jesus, but only of Jehovah, "the Lord thy God is a jealous God."

THE concluding part of the second volume of "Die Schriften des Neuen Testaments neu übersetzt und für die Gegenwart erklärt" is promised by Messrs. Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, of Göttingen, the publishers, for Easter. The seventh part of this most admirable work, which, when completed, will form two large volumes, with a full index, was issued early last year, and only the illness of one of the writers has delayed its completion so long. But, meanwhile, a second edition has been in progress (the first volume is already complete), making an issue of 20,000 copies in all, which, for a work of this kind, is most remarkable. The subscription price for this second edition is only M.12 up to the end of the present month, and we strongly recommend readers of the New Testament, who can use such a German book, not to miss this opportunity of securing it. Professor Johannes Weiss, of Marburg, is the general editor, and among the contributors are Professors Baumgarten, Bousset, Gunkel, and J. Licher. A notice of the first volume appeared in THE INQUIRER of April 7, 1906.

"The wagon of Socialism needs to be hitched to the star of religious faith."—R. J. Campbell.

A RECENT memoir of La Musée Sociale (Paris, February 2) is of especial interest to English people: It consists of a comparison between the Popular University movement as it exists in France and in this country. The writer draws on his personal knowledge of Ruskin College at Oxford for his description of the working of the idea among us: French perceptions of our national character and institutions are often true and always ingenious and suggestive: The address now before us does not lack the best qualities of rapid but not superficial appreciation, and its judgment will come to the members and friends of Ruskin Hall as a shrewd and kindly greeting from their French comrades: In one point only does the comparative study seem to be less than just to the popular Universities of Paris and its sister towns. They are mainly or entirely for working people after their day's work. Ruskin College, on the other hand, is a body of students whose business for the shorter or longer time being is primarily to study. That difference should account for the more strenuous nature of its curriculum without calling in the racial distinction of the two national characters:

It is not possible to transcribe the spirit and verve of this sketch, but a few points may be noted: The spirit of Ruskin College is both civic and religious, religious, that is, in the English sense: And the writer's definition of English religion is worth pondering: The students may be of any "faith" or none, the religious influence consists in a "discipline of the conscience." The civic direction of the college leads to careful scientific study of the great social and political problems of life. In place of this religious citizenship the end of the French study is found in intellectual idealism: Oxford is concerned with what its students will have to do, Paris with what they should know; Oxford seeks to control the will, Paris to guide the thought; Oxford would create citizens, Paris men: The memoir, it will be seen, is an essay towards disentangling the national psychology of the two groups of working men: To this we may add one physical aspect of the Ruskin students. The writer has been impressed with the rugged strength and force of the masons and other hand workers, as compared with bourgeois undergraduates. It is the pick of our wage earners who go to Oxford, but it is none the less a subject of gratification that to the eye of an observer from France they appear as men of power and promise.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:—Letters, &c., received from A. W. B., J. M. C., E. G., A. M. H., W. C. H., F. G. J., T. J., R. M. G., S. H. M., P. P., M. R. S., E. J., E. L. H. T., A. W., T. S. W.

Impressions of a Wanderer, by Manmath C. Mallik, is a surprisingly dull book, considering that its contents have been suggested by experience of travel in many lands. The author's style has no charm, and his "impressions" of national character are not, as a rule, very discriminating. He devotes special chapters to Norway and Japan. [Fisher Unwin. 5s. net.]

SPIRITUS DEI.

KEEN blows the breath of Spring o'er land and sea;

Mountain and mere,
Country and town, wholesome and strong and free;

New life draws near:

There is a breath of God, a spirit pure,
Cleansing the heart,
Stagnation and corruption it can cure,
Sweet health impart:

Blow shrewdly, wind from Heav'n—still, if we shrink

From thy rough breath,
Destroy to save; for more than mortals think

Life springs from death:

The wither'd leaf and process of decay
Precedes the birth

Of Spring's fresh beauty; help it on its way
Up from dark earth:

The lower life, with morbid zest for sin
And sloth, must die,

If God's good Spirit may our spirits win
To soar on high:

R. BRUCE BOSWELL:

THE CROWN.

I SOUGHT a crown without a thorn,
If such a crown might be,
A wreath of glory, won and worn
In easy victory.

Thro' all the world from east to west
I sought, but sought in vain,
For never soul was truly blest
Without the touch of pain.

Nay, when the victor's wreath is won,
His glory seemeth loss;
Hath God a well-belov'd Son—
Behold him, on the cross!

The crown I sought I never found,
A nobler crown sought me—
'Twas that with which my Lord was crown'd
For all eternity.

W. G. TARRANT.

THERE is a story which we have read somewhere of the searching examination of a young ambitious man by an evangelical minister. The young man was going abroad, where he expected to gain a lucrative employment. "And then?" said the minister. "Then I shall stay there so many years, and be able to save so much." "And then?" "Then I shall come home and rest." "And then?" "Well, then, then I shall die." "And then?" The young man considered it. Unitarians and Liberals will have to consider. By and by they will see the old harsh dogmas given up, the Fatherhood of God everywhere acknowledged (in words at least); the pre-eminence of Christ very widely confessed; the Old Testament rationally interpreted, as it is by Professor Peake; the fellowship of the Saints made to include not only Unitarians, but men whose heresies were much graver (a kindly lecture on Voltaire was given the other day by a Methodist minister). And then rational Christianity will have to die and be judged, or it will justify its life by transforming modern civilisation and making it worthy of the great teacher whose name is now too often taken in vain.

LITERATURE.

SIR GALAHAD OF THE SLUMS.*

THE author of this book has been for twenty-five years a devoted minister to the poor in the North End of Liverpool, and before that he was an elementary school teacher in the same district, the poorest and most neglected of the city. He knows the district and its people through and through, and his story is woven of a succession of vivid pictures of their life.

The structure of the story is very simple: It tells of a young minister, an Oxford man, who has come straight from the University to devote himself to Missionary work in the poorest quarter of Liverpool, and of an old school friend of his who has taken up the management of slum property as a business. These two find common interests in the courts bordering upon Vauxhall-road, in the sanitary renovation of the property, and in the lives of the people: With these two, there is also an educated woman, a hospital nurse, and another, a student away at Oxford, until she comes to Liverpool on a visit, while her relatives also have a part to play in the fortunes of the story. But it is not from this circle that the hero is drawn; he is simply a dock-labourer, Jim Stephens, a man of men, physically and morally, essentially noble in his generous humanity and great unselfishness, one who felt that to wrong a woman was the supreme infamy; to him it was that the Oxford professor, from whom the young minister had gained his first inspiration, gave the name of "Sir Galahad of the Slums." His story furnishes the deepest interest and the most pathetic incident in the book, with that of his sister and a younger brother, who brings disgrace upon them, and upon a young girl, whom they thereupon receive into their home.

We shall not tell the story here, it must be read in Mr. Haigh's pages. And there, we can promise our readers that they will meet a variety of characters pictured with abundant humour and penetrating sympathy; the rough lads of the street corner, and among them plenty of good material going to waste and worse than waste for lack of honest and interesting occupation; the stalwart policeman, the steady workman; the victim of drink, who in a dramatic episode signs the pledge in the minister's blood, and yet that same evening makes a dash for a glass of whisky, but finally regains his manhood; those egregious frauds, the men from Middleton, "Spouty," and "Dummy," so nicknamed of their familiars in the common lodging house; poor old Mother Flannagan, "Boots and Basket," whom the hospital nurse in time introduces to a new world of cleanliness and comfort, and in whose heart a deep well of tenderness is finally disclosed. These and others we find living in the story, as we are confident they have lived in the Liverpool which Mr. Haigh knows so well. He shows us the dark side of the city life, the disgraceful filth of the slums, the cruelty of the degraded life harboured there, the coarseness and the hopeless apathy, but at the same time the nobler side of poverty, homes that are kept sweet and clean, lives that are true and brave and pure amid the most distressing and discouraging conditions. We see the minister and his friend working at relief through a winter of terrible distress, and what gymnastics and music can do even for the roughest lads. There is much in the book which workers among the poor will do well to study; but it is never didactic, it all comes in amid the constant interest of the story. One of the most beautiful things in the book is the opening of the new world for Jim Stephens in the little garden he makes, when they move from the Vauxhall-road court to a house up in Everton, and his growing delight in all the glory of nature: Something of this is told towards the end of the book by an enthusiastic girl, the student, who is engaged to the minister, and afterwards writes to him, recalling a day they all had together in the open country:

"I want to tell you the effect your Jim produced upon me that day we walked together towards Bidston Hill. It was just as if I had found a worthy brother in him. He has 'the face of a man in the morning of the world,' and the purpose of a man who relies upon his own strength. There is the quiet dignity of certainty about him, and the clean unconscious majesty of the child—a calm, irresistible force, not self-assertion; one must accept it on account of its very selflessness. Not mere negation of colour, but the blending of all in a grand affirmative. . . . For instance, when I was showing your Jim the beauty of a wayside flower, with which he was enraptured, he simply said: 'It's very good of you to tell me this,' and I was at one with the goodness of the sunlight, the clouds, and the breeze. Can you understand me, Vernon? I simply told him; I had a right to tell him, he had a right to know. All things were his, and all things were mine. I think he is one of Nature's mystics. Or was it simply that I caught him in a certain mood? . . . The soul of the man was there, silent, sacred, strong, and by its presence made me see as I never saw before. Oh, Vernon, how clean and pure the sunlight was that day; how stately and majestically the clouds went sailing by; how deep the blue expanse beyond the clouds; how intimate the joy and praise that came from field and hill, from gorse and tender floweret. Your friend enriched them all for me. And when we stood on the hill, gazing into the crimson west, he added to the benediction of the day. I have met noble scholars and large-souled philosophers here in Oxford, the chosen representatives of their class. Their power and intensity and beauty of expression have made me wonder, and lifted me into the seventh heaven of delight. I now know a magnificently simple man."

And then read further what Vernon Carruthers, the minister, said about this man, a plain dock labourer, after he was dead (pp. 540-549).

While Jim Stephens, the "Sir Galahad of the Slums," is hero of this book, Carruthers himself has a special interest for us in the record of his work, his growing experience of life, and the manner in which he makes his way into the affections of the people; and it is only here that we feel seriously inclined to dissent from Mr. Haigh's representation, and that in one particular. We cannot believe that a man so essentially natural, so happy in his relations with the people, a friend in their homes, a comrade of the men, could have been so long in discovering that academical sermons, most carefully prepared and read at Sunday service, were of no use at his mission. Surely, he would not have waited for Eva King's exhortation, but must have seen for himself, after very few weeks of preaching, that the only way was to speak simply and face to face with his people, and so have found his sermons out of the life they were living together.

There may be other minor points in this story open to criticism, in the details of conversation and other matters, but, taken altogether, it is a very genuine book, and a true record of life and work among the poor. It is warmly to be commended as of special interest to all Liverpool people, and not only of living interest as a story, but of serious value to those who are facing the problems of city life, and desire to grapple with them in the spirit of a true Christian brotherhood.

THE NATURE AND ORIGIN OF LIFE.*

THE designation of this treatise by a Professor of the Faculty of Sciences at the Sorbonne raises expectations which are doomed to disappointment, for we are left at the conclusion of the book in the same darkness as at the beginning.

"The anthropomorphic error," complains our author, "locates a human mental quality in all bodies considered to be living, and one of the consequences is the belief that an abyss separates living from not-living bodies." So far is this from being the case that the most notorious anthropomorphists, like the Hindu Rishis, insisted upon the continuity of life in the mineral and the mammal, and believed in the language of Schelling: "What sleeps in the crystal and slumbers in the flower dreams in the animal and wakes in man." Anthropologists ascribe to lower forms of life not a human mental quality, but a mental quality of less developed order but of the same kind as in themselves; and in this "error" scientists like Romanes and Francis Darwin are ready to confirm them.

Like the unscientific world, the world of men of science is divided into two sections, one of which, by constitutional temperament, will insist upon pointing out that, after all, roses are only transformed mould growing on very prickly thorns; while the other will utter glad surprise that the guiding life, through the instrumentality of so savage a medium as the briar, has been able to create so delicate and fragrantly beautiful a thing of joy as the rose.

Professor le Dantec belongs to the former category. So he has no scruples in saying: "Life is only a surface accident in the history of the thermic evolution of the globe" (p. 22). "To our vital phenomena we have applied language adapted to the description of all chemical phenomena; and the fact that such language is sufficient to characterise life goes to prove that the particular essence of life is of chemical order" (p. 55). "Vital phenomena are at once colloid and chemical" (p. 82). "Give me a living protoplasm, and I will re-make the whole animal and vegetable kingdoms" (p. 249).

Therefore he believes that the attempt will be successful in creating life in a laboratory one fine day. "Our acquaintance with colloids is still so recent and rudimentary that we ought not to count on any speedy success in the efforts to fabricate a living cell. But the time will come when methodic analysis will allow of a reasoned synthesis."

That, then, is what modern materialism in the light of new knowledge promises, that is the confidence of the new science; but an old science said of this life, "It is not born, nor doth it die; nor, having been, ceaseth it to be; perpetual and eternal, it is not slain when the body is slaughtered" (Bhagavad Gita, ii. 20).

To our author, who is sure that "between life and death the difference is of the same order as that which exists between a phenol and a sulphate," and, in spite of Blake and Dante, and on the strength of the limitations of the vivisector's dissecting-chamber, has the boldness to affirm that "we shall never see a man functioning without heat or oxygen," the passage from the Gita is an instance of his abhorrence: "Old mystic ideas which preceded the advent of the scientific period." But the suggestive articles upon the nature of life from the pen of Sir Oliver Lodge would seem to indicate that the old mystic ideas are coming back and are destined to lead the science of the future into more fertile fields than the arid plains of the past. What the Principal of Birmingham University has said by way of criticism of Haeckel applies equally to M. le Dantec. Both regard the total value of life as consisting in the material organism and the reaction upon it of the environment; both emphasise the least important manifestations of vitality, and define it in its narrowest meaning. Thus, to the French professor, man is a complex mechanism comprising several trillion cells co-ordinated by a highly perfected nervous system. Is this aspect of human life the chief aspect of man in the eyes of the biologist? Does not the very name "man," the thinker, suggest a higher?

Or is the biologist content to be reckoned among those who—

"Not grieving that their greatest are so small,

Do judge all Nature from her feet of clay,
Without the will to lift their eyes and see
Her godlike head crown'd with spiritual fire,

And touching other worlds."

One would suppose that such books as the present, so lacking in a sense of wonder, so deficient in consciousness of the greatness and sublimity and mystery of life, so bare of reverence and humility, would have long ago consigned the mechanical theory of life to its place in the limbo of insufficient hypotheses. But facts are facts, and have their interest as facts, quite apart from the theories they are intended to establish. So M. le Dantec's book, written in a concise and succinct style, and with thorough acquaintance with a large number of sciences, has a value apart from its general purpose. The analogies he establishes between the lower biological operations and chemical or physical phenomena are particularly engaging. Thus, under the general function of bipolarity, he ranges chemical affinity, the electricities, biologic assimilation, and sexuality. Hibernation and perfect chemical repose furnish another parallel. The same instances which he relates have, however, been used to uphold quite contrary theories; for example, the behaviour of the antherozoids of ferns in malic acid, which is only a lower form of misled intelligence manifested by the fly laying eggs upon an orchid emitting odour like decayed meat, or shall we say, a human pilgrim of the infinite taking false for true, and illusion for reality?

DR. BRIGGS ON THE PSALMS.*

THIS second volume completes Dr. Briggs's Commentary on the Psalms, and is marked by the same qualities which were conspicuous in the former half of the work. We still think that much space is occupied by matters which the student may be expected to know already, and which, in any case, he could easily discover for himself by the help of grammar, lexicon, and Bible dictionary. Dr. Briggs is a great deal too bold in his emendations of the text, and his corrections are scarcely ever felicitous. They are not of such a kind that, whether right or wrong, they restore sense where it had ceased to exist in the Massoretic text, are effected by sparing alteration, and enable us to see how its corrupt reading arose. In other words, Dr. Briggs is not a critic of the same rank, or anything like the same rank, as Bickell, Wellhausen, or Duhm. It is also a very great defect in such a bulky work that it gives the reader no account of the best emendations due to other Hebrew scholars. Indeed, the same thing is true even of the interpretations previously advanced. Take, for example, Psalm lxxxiv. Dr. Briggs may be right in his view of the meaning in v. 4: "Yea, the bird doth find a home for herself, and the swallow a nest for herself where she may lay her young. At Thy altars they praise Thee ever, my King and my God." We say this may be right, though we doubt whether either the textual correction or the exegesis will commend itself to many. Dr. Briggs sees that the Massoretic text, according to which the birds find their nest on or at the altars, cannot be maintained. The altar, with its smoke and fire, would never have tempted a bird to build its nest there. But where all is uncertain, a choice of emendations and renderings should have been given, e.g., that of Hupfeld: "The sparrow hath found a house, and the swallow a nest where she hath laid her young: [But I] Thine altars, O Lord of Hosts, my King and my God." Or, again, the still more ancient and widely supported view that the birds and the nestlings are metaphors for the Israelites, or, it may be, the Levites. At the same time we must not, for a moment, forget that Dr. Briggs, besides his acknowledged learning and ability, is a man of independent judgment who forms his opinions after exhaustive investigation, and without the least inclination to follow one school rather than another. For him a view is never antiquated till it has been proved untrue. Sometimes, also, his remarks are singularly illuminative. What, for example, could be better than the following criticism of Psalm cxix.? "The law has become to him (i.e., the psalmist) the representative of his God. Throughout the psalm he ascribes to the law the attributes older writers ascribe to God; looks to the law for the help and salvation that ordinarily come from God alone. The law is to him almost hypostatical, almost what the Memra became to later Judaism. It was eternal in heaven before it came to the earth and to man to remain everlastingly. Upon its observation depend life, salvation, knowledge, wisdom, happiness, and every joy. It is not true that this author has the Deuteronomic spirit. The personal allegiance to Yahweh of D. has become a legal allegiance. The psalmist is far in advance of the priestly attitude of P. He is a scribe, an early Pharisee of the highest and noblest type." The student of the New Testament as well as of the old will be thankful for a statement such as this.

WOMAN'S POSITION LONG AGO.*

DR. DONALDSON has brought to his study of woman's position in ancient times the historian's singleness of purpose, and we have to thank him for a most delightful and informing book. Woman, in the times of which he tells, did not dream of claiming political equality with man, even under the most democratic régimes. Nevertheless, she was often the power behind the Government, whatever its form or complexion, and the principle of the "Carecr to the talents" received many a startling illustration and application at her hands. Readers of Homer are aware of the fine spirit of chivalry that characterises the two great poems. It is not merely that the story in both Iliad and Odyssey turns on affection for women, but that nearly every reference to them throughout these poems is pervaded by an almost tearful tenderness of love and admiration. As for the women themselves, they seem fully conscious of the love that protects them, and, though troubled at times by the thought of the uncertainty of Destiny, their days, as a rule, are serene and bright. Homer, doubtless, idealises to some extent the life which he depicts; but, as our author observes, "even his idealisations are indicative of the current of his age." For his illustrations of woman's life in the Homeric period, Dr. Donaldson does not go beyond the Iliad and the Odyssey, though we could wish that for once he had done so in order to include that glimpse of fair women keeping holiday amid the happy throng described in the Hymn to the Delian Apollo. Coming to more historical times, and to Sparta and Athens, Dr. Donaldson gives an excellent account of the political situation in so far as it affected woman's life and lot. This is particularly necessary in the case of Athens, for a true understanding of the position of the stranger-women, the Hetairai or Companions. From these women, as a class, Dr. Donaldson seeks to remove the moral reproach which they have so long borne; and, indeed, throughout the volume his effort is to judge of men and women by the ethical standards and ideas of their time rather than by those of our own. Of Roman maids and matrons he has naturally much to say, and specially interesting is his account of that gradual extension of the right of intermarriage which finally made it lawful for any man to marry any woman—a consummation that would have astonished the early patricians had they lived to see it.

It is generally maintained that woman owes much to Christianity, and, in the long run, this is doubtless true. But the obligation is not very apparent in what we learn of her condition in early Christendom. The first three centuries were, perhaps, the most unchivalrous age in history. For such vilification of woman as we find in the writings of Tertullian and other Fathers there is hardly a parallel in Pagan literature. The exaltation of celibacy and the general absence of real home-life in these three centuries "may account in some degree," says Dr. Donaldson, "for the striking features of the next century, and especially the prevalent hardness of heart. Then men disputed with the utmost bitterness and ferocity about minute points of doctrine which are now incomprehensible almost to everyone, and matters of absolute indifference to this generation, and they pronounced sentence of eternal damnation without the slightest compunction on all who differed from them. Then treatises were written the show why every heretic should be put to death in this life and tortured eternally in the life to come. And there is scarcely a champion of the faith, orthodox or heterodox, who was not accused of fearful crimes." This explanation of the odium theologicum has, no doubt, a great deal of truth in it, and it suggests that charity, in more senses than one, must begin in the home.

SHORT NOTICES.

Selections from Dr. Johnson's "Rambler." Edited with Preface and Notes by W. Hale White. One day, having read over one of his "Rambles," Mr. Langton asked him (Johnson), how he liked that paper; he shook his head, and answered, "Too wordy." Those whom this bright little volume of selections has again attracted to Johnson's "Rambles" will probably be inclined to endorse that verdict. Every Tuesday and Saturday, for the space of two years, Johnson so far overcame his constitutional indolence as to have a " Rambler " ready for the public. "This is a strong confirmation," says Boswell, "of the truth of a remark of his, that a man may write at any time, if he will set himself doggedly to it." Very true! But the doggedness which helped the writer may somewhat bore the reader. Perhaps that is one reason why the circulation of the paper only averaged about 500 copies. When after "having supported for two years the anxious employment of a periodical writer, and multiplied essays to upwards of two hundred"—Johnson—"determined to desist," he confessed that he had "never been much a favourite with the public." He who has not the art to command popularity is very ready to scorn it, and Johnson posed as the instructor rather than the entertainer of his readers. "I shall never envy the honours which wit and learning obtain in any other cause, if I can be numbered among the writers who have given ardour to virtue, and confidence to truth." In this high endeavour, it must be confessed, Johnson is not seldom exceedingly dull and excessively wordy. No man could make a platitude look more momentous. And to cut the " Rambler " up into extracts does not improve matters. A work of art should never be mutilated; and Johnson's "Rambles" are art, though by no means, the best of their genre. The felicities of Addison, the easy good humour of Goldsmith, were unattainable by the author of the " Rambler." Unsatisfactory as such "Extracts" are, Mr. White's book is welcome. If it does not incite us to take down the volumes of the " Rambler " from their dusty seclusion, it may furnish a good excuse for again dipping into that masterpiece for all time—Boswell's Life of Johnson. (H. Frowde. 2s. 6d. net.)

TWO HISTORIANS.

THE late eminent historian, F. W. Maitland, some years ago, read a paper before a legal society on "Why the History of English Law has not been Written," and concluded it by a story.

"At the end of this long and dismal discourse, let me tell a story. It is said that long ago a certain professor of English Law was also the Chief Justice of an ancient episcopal franchise. One of his rulings was cited in the court presided over by a Chief Justice of a more august kind, the Lord Chief Justice of England. 'Did he rule that?' said my lord. 'Why, he is only fit to rule a copy-book.' Well," concluded Maitland, "I will not say that this pedagogic function is all that should be expected of a professor of law, but still, copy-books there ought to be, and I would gladly spend much time in ruling them, if I thought they were to be filled to the greater glory of the history of English Law."

And very much of his time was spent, if not in ruling copy-books, in smoothing the way for future historians. According to Maitland, the time of the future historian "should not be wasted over bad texts, ill-arranged material, or assertions for which no warrantor is vouched." To prevent this he gave himself heartily to what is usually regarded as the very drudgery of research. That recondite branch of history, diplomatics, was a delight to him, and he succeeded in inoculating his pupils with something of his own enthusiasm.

"And yet thy heart

The lowliest duties on herself did lay," said Wordsworth of Milton. Why of Milton I could never understand; but the words are true of Maitland. Some of "the lowliest duties" in historical investigation he laid upon himself. In the thick, obscure jungle of legal history he did the work of a pioneer, making straight in the desert a highway for the future historian. As Sir Frederick Pollock put it, in speaking of the work of his late friend and colleague (I quote from memory only), "Whereas a former great authority on the history of institutions," who shall be nameless, "on demolishing a false position would leave the rubbish about, Maitland made such a clean sweep of it that no stone of stumbling—in other words, no unexploded fallacy—was left to embarrass the later investigator." Those who would examine his work in this particular might well consult his edition of Bracton's Note Book, or some of the texts he so well edited for the Camden Society. He also contributed to the "Dictionary of National Biography" the life of Henry de Bracton, the man who compiled the most important law-book of mediæval England. Though a laborious, painstaking, and always interesting editor, Maitland was something much more. That history of English Law alluded to in the paper from which I have quoted was at last to be written, and written by Maitland in co-operation with Sir Frederick Pollock. Its two bulky volumes are a monument of learning and lucidity. For masterly condensation of a vast subject, what can match Maitland's brilliant introduction? But though law is a thing so intimate and universal, its disinterested study has few attractions for the average man, hence one of our greatest historians was known to few before the untimely end of his career. But one book outside the range of his legal studies will appeal, and not in vain, to a somewhat larger audience; I mean his beautiful record of the life of his friend Leslie Stephen.

While Cambridge is still mourning the death of her Downing Professor of the Laws of England, Oxford has more recently suffered a somewhat similar loss by the death of Professor H. F. Pelham, Camden Professor of Ancient History, and President of Trinity College.

On a dull March afternoon, barely a year ago, the present writer found himself in the quaint old Hall of Serjeants' Inn, then the temporary home of the Royal Historical Society, listening to a lecturer who, with the aid of a big map, was interpreting for us "A Chapter in Roman Frontier History." The bustle of Chancery-lane and Fleet-street was hushed, the feverish rush of modern life—what was it? The mind had gone back into the great past. The policy of the Flavian Emperors, the powerful tribe of the Chatti, the great Roman barrier 300 miles long, so recently and so thoroughly explored by the German Imperial Frontier Commission—these were the things that held our attention as we listened to the quiet conversational tone of Professor Pelham's voice.

The late professor of ancient history was by no means a prolific author. Like another great historian, the late Lord Acton, he left very little in print. He might be called a one-book man, and that one book is the valuable "Outlines of Roman History," a reprint, with additions and alterations, of his article on "Roman History," which appeared in the last edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica. The work attained its fourth edition in the latter part of 1905. It is an admirable example of clear, condensed narration, entirely free from the scrappiness and superficiality which so often mark the attempts to tell in one small volume the history of a long period. We feel, as we read, that the sure touch is derived from a reserve of deep and accurate scholarship.

"A Chapter of Roman Frontier History," to which allusion has been made, forms part of the Transactions of the Royal Historical Society for 1906. It shows how exhaustively the writer of the "Outlines of Roman History" could deal with a detail of the great story, and intensifies our sense of the loss which historical science has suffered by the death of Henry Francis Pelham.

CLEMENT E. PIKE.

THE SPIRITUAL ENDEAVOURS OF THE BRAHMO SAMAJ.

AN ANNIVERSARY ADDRESS.

BY HEM CHANDRA SARKAR, M.A.

ON a thoughtful consideration of the religious history of the world one is inclined to believe that all modern religious movements are shallow. When we think of the faith, devotion, and sacrifice of ancient times we cannot but be moved. The hunger and thirst after religion which we find in people of those days seem to be altogether missing in modern times. In India, Buddhism, in spite of its stern, austere, and lofty ideal was enthusiastically embraced by men and women of all classes and ranks. Thousands of people became monks, who carried the gospel not only to the distant parts of India, but throughout the Continent of Asia. Even the son and daughter of Emperor Asoka became Bhikkhus and went as missionaries to Ceylon, such was the enthusiasm of the age. The faith and sacrifice of early Christianity are well-known. Even in the middle ages thousands of men and women completely effaced themselves for religion. They might have been mistaken, we are not considering their doctrines and views; but what grand faith, devotion, and sacrifice were in them. When we compare our age with these epochs of human history, a suspicion creeps into our mind that perhaps religion is losing its hold on the minds of men. We do not find the same devotion and sacrifice for religion; at least, not in the same proportion. This barrenness is visible in all religions and denominations. At the present day the several religious denominations are making various provisions for the present and future comfort of their missionaries; there are Provident Funds, Sustentation Funds, Pension Funds, and so many sorts of facilities and attractions. Yet they do not get men for religious work in sufficient numbers. In ancient times there were no board of directors for Mission Societies, no provision for the families of the missionaries, nor even for themselves. The only prospect before them was that of hardship, poverty, persecution and death. Yet people flocked in large numbers in order that they might devote themselves to the service of God. These signs point unmistakably to a falling-off in the religious earnestness of the age. Emerson says a man's highest is his God. We can hardly say that our age has God for its highest concern.

Many thoughtful people have been pained in noticing the shallowness of the religious spirit of the modern age. Amiel, a retired but deeply thoughtful Professor of Geneva wrote in his journal:—"The great defect of liberal Christianity is that its conception of holiness is a frivolous one, or, what comes to the same thing, its conception of sin is a superficial one. The defects of the baser sort of political liberalism recur in liberal Christianity, it is only half serious, and its theology is too much mixed with worldliness." There is a deep meaning in Amiel's remark. Roughly, the religions and their founders can be divided into two classes. One class is inspired by the intellectual needs of men. They noticed some grave error or superstition in the current beliefs of men; their religion sprang in protest of these errors. The second class of religious teachers were impelled by the spiritual needs of humanity. They were deeply smitten by the sight of the sorrow and suffering of men. The sin and degradation of humanity appealed strongly to their hearts and in religion they found the solace and salvation of the human race; hence their cry was "come unto me ye that are weary and heavy laden." All the old religions were of this second class, that is, were based on a deep consciousness of sins and sufferings of men, whereas the modern religious movements mostly sprang from an intellectual protest against current theological error and superstition. In them the consciousness of human sin and suffering is not so keen; at their bottom was not that deep compassion for suffering humanity. This is what Amiel means when he says "the great defect of liberal Christianity is that its conception of holiness is a frivolous one, or, what comes to the same thing, its conception of sin is a superficial one." A religion which has its main emphasis on the intellect, which is not perennially fed from the living fountain of the heart, is found to be somewhat barren and weak. Conscience is critical not dynamic. Recognition of truth or righteousness does not necessarily bring with it an enthusiasm for and devotion to truth or righteousness; enthusiasm and devotion are the contributions of the heart. The secret of the devotion and earnestness of the great religious teachers like Jesus and Buddha was an agonising compassion for human suffering. It is not meant that the distinction between truth and untruth, right knowledge and superstition is to be made light in any the slightest measure. The defect of what is called rationalism is not that it lays too much emphasis on intellect, but it dissociates itself too much from the sin and suffering of men. There was no religion which was in its effect more rational and destructive than Buddhism. In a country like India, so thoroughly under the influence of priest and scripture, it did away with all traditional authorities. But it did this not so much by an appeal to intellect as to the heart. Buddha and his followers were inspired almost entirely by love for humanity. Similarly the unique success of Jesus's ministry has been traced by a thoughtful writer of the last century to what he calls his "enthusiasm for humanity." The same thing is proved by a fact of the present day religious world. Of the various religious movements of the present, all of which are working with commendable zeal and energy, the most successful is the Salvation Army; and this in spite of the fact that the Salvation Army cannot boast of the presence in its ranks of men of such high eminence, talent, learning or scholarship as of other denominations. The secret of the success of the Salvation Army lies in the fact that it is inspired by deep compassion for the sorrow and suffering of men, that it draws its inspiration from and appeals to the heart.

Of course it is easily understood how modern religious movements came to be pre-eminently rationalistic; it cannot also be doubted that this rationalistic protest was needed. But it has its dangers. It often leads to an indifference to or partial slackening of the importance of life and character. It makes religion an object of confession not of culture. Religion does not consist in intellectual assent to certain doctrines; religion is primarily a spiritual culture, a never-ending progress towards perfection. All the complaints of religious denominations of the present day spring from this fundamental evil of a wrong conception of religion. We have forgotten the spiritual ideal of religion and brought in what Amiel calls "the baser sort of political liberalism" in religious societies. The religious organisations of the present day have been too much influenced by the political model. The great task before the Brahmo Samaj is the establishment of the supremacy of spirituality in the midst of the materialistic and secularistic tendencies of the present day. Religion has been made too much light of in this modern age. People do not stand in awe and reverence before it. There is not a sufficiently deep reverence in the human heart for things spiritual. The words sin and salvation have lost their meanings. There is not that yearning of the soul which says "as the hart panteth after the waterbrook so panteth my soul for thee, my God, living God." That impassioned love for God, which is the highest state of religious life, is the fruit of much prayer and meditation, of life-long spiritual endeavours. In modern times men have forgotten this ideal of religion; they have forgotten that spiritual life can be attained only after arduous spiritual combat. It was this spiritual combat, their spiritual exercises, which generated such lovely characters, saintly lives among the religious sects like the Roman Catholics, the Vaishnavas and Sufis. Modern religions have much to learn from them. Can we not in this modern age attain to that faith, that hankering after God, that devotion and self-sacrifice which characterised the lives of so many men in ancient religious societies? Will not the Brahmo Samaj inspire a hunger and thirst for spirituality like those of the ancient days? The difficult task of spiritual revival in India rests on the shoulders of the Brahmo Samaj. The Brahmo Samaj alone exists as a body for spiritual awakening. It is not a shallow, half-political half-reforming association, with a sprinkling of spirituality;

It is a profoundly spiritual movement. Its object is to bring back a new faith, a deeper faith, a higher love in this age of materialism and secularism. In order to realise this object the Brahmo Samaj needs a living spiritual culture, an earnest, steady, impassioned seeking after God:

OBITUARY.

MRS. VANCE SMITH.

ANNOUNCEMENT was made in these columns a fortnight since of the death of the widow of the Rev. Dr. George Vance Smith. Miss Elizabeth Ann Todd, younger daughter of the late Mr. Edward Todd, formerly of Tadcaster, and later of Altrincham, was the second wife of Dr. Vance Smith, to whom she was married in 1894. She was an active and devoted member of the Dunham-road congregation, and a generous helper of much denominational and social work. She was specially kind and thoughtful in her sympathy with those in trouble. With a cultured mind and many interests she was particularly fond of foreign travel, and often made others share in her enjoyment of it. In the course of a memorial sermon preached on Sunday morning, March 10, the Rev. Dendy Agate said:—

"That which she seemed to be in outward graciousness and kindly ways that was she in her inner soul. She had strength as well as sweetness; she could take her own line and keep it in all things which appeared to her right and just. But the sources of true and upright and generous life were seated deep within. Some of us feel especially grateful to her for her strong devotion to the religious principles identified with this house of prayer, for her interest in all that went on here, and in the Sunday school. And the impression she made on us, who knew her well, she made also on others beyond our little circle of fellowship. The day after her death I was struck by spontaneous evidence of this, given by one belonging to another denomination, who knew her just as a customer in his place of business. I had said something of what we felt we had lost, and how good and sympathetic she was, and he answered: 'Yes, I knew her only by her coming in sometimes on business, but it always seemed to me that she was one of God's people.' It was simply and naturally said. I felt how true it was, and I rejoiced at the testimony thus offered. . . . To be truly 'of God's people,' in childlike trust, in faithful service, in brotherly sympathy, what more can any of us desire?"

Rather more than two years ago Mrs. Vance Smith presented to Chapel Lane Chapel, Bradford, a beautiful stained glass window in memory of her husband, who began there his career as a minister. The Rev. E. Ceredig Jones also made reference to her on March 10. Mr. Jones said:—

"She united in herself the widest culture and the guilelessness and simplicity of a child. No good cause in the neighbourhood which had for its aim the alleviation of suffering or the uplifting of humanity appealed to her in vain. Among the poor and friendless she went about doing good, like the great Master whom she loved to follow."

Having referred to the memorial window and Dr. Vance Smith's long and fruitful labours, Mr. Jones concluded:—

"The donor's memory, as well as that of her husband, will be perpetuated here for centuries, and successive generations of worshippers within these walls will feel grateful to her for her beautiful gift."

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

I EXPECT we have all of us at one time or another played at soldiers, and I know that one of our favourite hymns is, "Onward, Christian Soldiers." Have you ever wondered what sort of soldiers "Christian soldiers" should be? What sort of battles they should fight? What sort of victories they should seek to win?

Can we all be "Christian soldiers"? I wonder? Can we picture life as a battle for each one of us, as we picture life as a journey or voyage? We are taught not to quarrel, not to hurt anybody, not to fight. Then how can we be soldiers?

I have been reading a story about a small boy who wanted to be a soldier. It is a sad story, for he has a bad accident and does not live to grow up. But it is also a happy story, for though he has a hard battle to fight, he wins.

Near Leonard's home was a large camp, and the little boy was of course much interested in the soldiers and all their doings, in their talk and their ways of living. He made friends with an old Irish soldier, and soon declared that when he grew up, he was "going to grow into an owld, owld soldier."

One day Leonard was taken in a carriage to see the regiments march past out of the camp with their bands of music, and it was then the accident happened. Somehow, in his excitement, as he stood up with his puppy dog in his arms, they both fell from the carriage into the road. The dog Sweep was none the worse, but poor little Leonard's back was hurt so much that he could never run about again.

He had been rather a spoilt child, not accustomed to obedience and expecting to get just what he wanted. Now that he was a little invalid he expected more than ever to have just what he wanted. It was difficult to refuse him anything, and still more difficult to please him. For sometimes the pain was very hard to bear, and as he did not even try to be patient and brave, he grew more and more peevish and cross.

Leonard had a wheel-chair and sometimes could walk a very little with the help of crutches. These crutches were generally near at hand, and unhappily he found them convenient for thumping on the ground when he was cross, and even for striking anyone who displeased him.

One day, after he had been very impatient and naughty, his mother had a long talk with him about soldiers. It had been a terrible disappointment to him that now he could never be a soldier. He had meant to be such a brave soldier! Now instead of a sword he had to have a crutch and he was using it to hurt, not enemies, but friends—friends who were doing their very best for him. To hit his nurse because he was cross was to be a coward.

His mother helped him to see that there are different sorts of courage and cowardice, different sorts of battles to be fought and won. He could, if he tried, put the soldier spirit into his life as a cripple.

Leonard was only a very little chap—not more than eight years old—he was only six when the accident happened, but he was quite old enough to understand what his mother meant. He understood that even if he could never be a real soldier, he could still try to be like one. He could still "obey orders" like a soldier, he could bear pain patiently and bravely as a soldier should bear his wounds. Leonard knew that he had been a coward to his nurse Jemima, and he made a brave beginning by telling her how sorry he was.

"I beg your pardon, Jemima, I am very sorry, and I'll never do so any more. I didn't want to beg your pardon before, because I was naughty, and because you trod on my Sweep's foot. But I beg your pardon now, because I am good—at least I am better, and I am going to try to be good."

And he did try very hard. But he found it hard to believe that courage in bearing pain and disappointment could count for as much as courage in battle. He could not believe at first that conquering his own crossness and impatience could count as much as conquering the enemies of his country. So he thought he would ask the bravest man he knew. This was a young officer who, for some special deed of courage in battle, had received the Victoria Cross—the greatest honour a soldier can win.

This V.C., as Leonard called him, was coming the next evening, and Leonard was very good all the next day that he might be allowed to see him. When they meet, the boy tells the soldier all about it and asks his opinion.

"How do you do, V.C.? I am very glad to see you. I wanted to see you more than anything in the world. I hope you don't mind seeing me, because I have been a coward, for I mean to be brave now; and that is why I wanted to see you so much, because you are a very brave man. The reason I was a coward was partly with being so cross when my back hurts, but particularly with hitting Jemima with my crutches, for no one but a coward strikes a woman. She trod on my dog's toes. This is my dog. Please pat him; he would like to be patted by a V.C. He is called the Sweep because he is black. He lives with me all along. I have hit him, but I hope I shall not be naughty again any more. I wanted to grow up into a brave soldier, but I don't think perhaps that I ever can now; but Mother says I can be a brave cripple. I would rather be a brave soldier, but I'm going to try to be a brave cripple. Jemima says there's no saying what you can do till you try. Please show me your Victoria Cross." So they made friends, and the soldier carried the little cripple away into a quiet corner, to have a long talk. The V.C. was quite sure that it would count as much to be a really brave cripple as to be a brave soldier, and as a soldier who was a V.C. ought to know, Leonard was satisfied.

He did go on trying. The story tells how brave and patient he was, in spite of his pain. You should read it all. It is Mrs. Ewing's "Story of a Short Life."

THE NEW THEOLOGY.

THE REV. R. J. CAMPBELL's much expected book on "The New Theology" is published this week. It is to be taken, as he himself says both in the Introduction and the Conclusion of the book, simply as an outline or summary of the teaching which he has been giving from the pulpit of the City Temple ever since he went there. It is not an Apologia. There is no word as to his own position as minister of a church with an uncompromising dogmatic trust, nor as to his position in the fellowship of Congregational churches. It is rather a manifesto which gathers up into a convenient form the teaching which has recently been scattered broadcast, and has been the subject of a great deal of loose journalistic discussion. It gives to the public, interested in progressive religious thought, a welcome opportunity of considering Mr. CAMPBELL's teaching as a whole.

"Where or when the name New Theology arose I do not know," says Mr. CAMPBELL, "but it has been in existence for at least one generation. It is neither of my invention nor of my choice. It has long been in use, both in this country and in America, to indicate the attitude of those who believe that the fundamentals of the Christian faith need to be rearticulated in terms of the immanence of God: . . . Creeds or no creeds, we hold that the religious experience which came to mankind in JESUS of NAZARETH is enough for all our needs, and only requires to be freed from limiting statements in order to lay firm hold once more upon the civilised world. The New Theology is an untrammelled return to the Christian sources in the light of modern thought. Its starting-point is a re-emphasis of the Christian belief in the Divine immanence in the universe and in mankind."

And after all it is not theology as such that is the fundamental interest. That is only the necessary accompaniment of a deeper movement. What Mr. CAMPBELL is bent upon is not so much a re-statement of truth as the renovation of life. This he affirms at the outset and again at the conclusion of the book:—"It only remains to reiterate my conviction that the movement represented by the New Theology is only incidentally theological at all; it is primarily a moral and spiritual movement. It is one symptom of a great religious awakening which in the end will re-inspire civilisation with a living faith in God and the spiritual meaning of life. If what I am trying to do can contribute in any way towards this grand result, I shall be humbly thankful to the Giver of all good."

We have already pointed out on a previous occasion, what indeed Mr. CAMPBELL fully acknowledges in this book, that the movement in which he is engaged has about it nothing sectional or sectarian. He did not originate it, and does not claim to be its leader. It is going on among liberal Catholics in Italy and France, and in the Protestant churches of the Continent, and, of course, in America, while in this country Churchmen and Unitarians alike have a share in it. Indeed, Unitarians, while they must now rejoice to find themselves in the midst of a much larger movement of thought and life, cannot forget that their leaders have been for two generations at least pioneers and prophets of the spiritual freedom, the ethical awakening, the scientific loyalty to truth, which furnish the essential elements, by means of which the new victory of faith is to be achieved. Mr. CAMPBELL's distinction is that he holds the attention of a great public, and has compelled men to listen and to think. In this book he offers a fearless challenge, and we honour him for it. We are with him heart and soul in the desire that truth may prevail, and that in all the churches there may be a new sincerity of religious life, with a firm hold upon the real things of human need and aspiration, and an overmastering power to mould the world to nobler issues; for "the New Theology is the gospel of the kingdom of God."

This book, however, apart from the deeper purpose, is chiefly occupied with a theological restatement, and we naturally turn with the keenest interest to its doctrine of God and of CHRIST.

"It is the immanent God with whom we have to do," says Mr. CAMPBELL. How does he present this great truth to us? And will his statement stand the test of the deepest spiritual experience of our religious life? We hope very soon to have from Professor UPTON an examination of the religious philosophy of Mr. CAMPBELL's position, but may say here at once that there are aspects of his interpretation of the doctrine of Divine Immanence which we find entirely unconvincing.

"When I say God," we read in the chapter on "God and the Universe," "I mean the mysterious Power which is finding expression in the universe and which is present in every tiniest atom of the wondrous whole. I find that this Power is the one reality I cannot get away from, for whatever else it may be, it is myself. . . . What infinity may be we have no means of knowing . . . The real God is the God expressed in the universe and in yourself. The question is not whether you shall believe in God, but how much you can believe about Him? You may think with Haeckel that this universe is the outcome of the fortuitous interaction of material forces, without consciousness and definite purpose behind them; or you may believe that the cosmos is the product of intelligence, and 'means intensely and means good,' but you cannot help believing in God—the Power revealed in it.

* * *

My God calls always to my deeper soul, and tells me I must read Him by mine own highest and best, and by the highest and best that the universe has yet produced. Thus the last word about God becomes the last word about man: it is JESUS. Materialists may tell me that the universe does not know what it is doing, that it goes on clanking and banging, age after age, without end or aim; but I shall continue to feel compelled to believe that the Power which produced JESUS must at least be equal to JESUS. So JESUS becomes my gateway to the innermost of God. When I look at Him I say to myself, God is that, and, if I can only get down to the truth about myself, I shall find I am that too.

* * *

To all eternity God is what He is, and never can be other; but it will take Him to all eternity to live out all that He is. In order to manifest even to Himself the possibilities of His being, God must limit that being. There is no other way in which the fullest self-realisation can be attained.

* * *

To put it in homely, everyday phraseology, God is getting at something, and we must help Him. We must be His eyes, and hands, and feet; we must be labourers together with Him."

There appears to us, we must confess, a strange presumption in such a declaration of what God must do. Mr. CAMPBELL has said that "what infinity may be we have no means of knowing." But may we not with perfect truthfulness say that we are in our own life, in this present world, in the presence of God, who is the Infinite? And when we use the term infinite, it does have an actual meaning for us, as that which is for ever and immeasurably beyond all our infinite powers. God is not only immanent, but transcends the whole order of this universe, and our experiences as spiritual beings simply is that we find ourselves with God in this world, compassed by His presence, held in His care. But from the declaration "I also am God" we turn with utter repugnance, and distrust the religious philosophy that can draw such a conclusion. It appears to us false to the whole range of religious experience.

Mr. CAMPBELL finds in JESUS "the innermost of God." But then again we stumble. "Jesus was God, but so are we." "Jesus expressed fully and completely, in so far as a finite consciousness ever could, that aspect of the nature of God, which we have called the eternal Son, or Christ, or ideal Man, who is the Soul of the universe." "It is quite a false idea to think of Jesus and no one else as the Son of God incarnate. . . . Let us go on thinking of Jesus as Christ, the very Christ of glory, but let us realise that that same Christ is seeking expression through every human soul. He is incarnate in the race in order that by means of limitation He may manifest the innermost of God, the life and love eternal. To say this does not dethrone Jesus; it lends significance to His life and work. He is on the throne, and the sceptre is in His hand. We can rise towards Him by trusting, loving and serving Him; and by so doing we shall demonstrate that we too are CHRIST, the eternal Son." And we are told that in Manchester recently nearly the whole of Mr. CAMPBELL's prayer was addressed to CHRIST.

We do not find the exposition either lucid or spiritually convincing, and we cannot help noting throughout this book that of the FATHER, in whom JESUS trusted, and to whom he prayed and taught us to pray, we hear very little. Yet we have found Mr. CAMPBELL saying that "the religious experience which came to mankind in JESUS of Nazareth is enough for all our needs." There we should say, rather than in much of Mr. CAMPBELL's speculation, is the true guidance, by which the simple-minded and the simple-hearted will be led into the profounder truth of our life with God. JESUS with the FATHER, our life with God; but neither he nor we ourselves God: that is the thought in which we rest.

It is proposed to issue a memorial volume of "Essays and Poems" by the late Rev. H. Kelsey White, with a brief memoir by Lionel S. Birch. The volume is to contain Mr. Kelsey White's essays on "Shakespeare as a Religious Teacher," "Woman in Shakespeare," "The Supernatural in Shakespeare," and "Literature and Social Progress," and there will be a portrait. The issue depends on a sufficient number of subscribers being secured at 2s. net a copy, the price afterwards to be 2s. 6d. net. Orders may be sent to Mr. J. R. Tutin, 189, Albert-avenue, Hull, to be paid on delivery of the book.

"A PIECE OF SPRING."

A child? A fragment of the morn,

A piece of Spring!

At the beginning of the poem in which these lines occur, William Watson describes himself in the act of looking at a yellow curl, cut from the head of a five-year-old laddie living in a land of sunshine where "vineyards, steeped in ardent hours," slope to the shores of a beautiful Swiss lake. The soft little tress of gleaming gold, as it lies in his hand, reminds him of many things—of birds, of sunlight "scampering over corn," of the fuller radiance that fills those foreign skies, of the joyous spring-ecstasy which one must always associate with extreme youthfulness. But then his thought deepens, and he speaks of those in whom "the spirit waxes numb," because the glow and ardour has gone out of their lives; so that for them even the sun in heaven is no concern of theirs, nor the day anything more than the witness of labours which they perform like captives "chained to their task in sightless mine."

"How is it," some might say, who object to thinking on the ground that it makes one serious, "how is it that this lyrist cannot even allude to a little boy's curls without dragging in the sadness of humanity?" The poet would probably answer, if the question were addressed to him, "Because all things are linked together in this strange world—happiness and sorrow, truth and error, peace and strife, beauty and ugliness, so that unless one's vision is narrowed one cannot even look on a child's gleaming hair without thinking how life's tedium may one day turn its sunny gleam to ashen grey." And indeed, to the man who has really lived, and suffered, and loved at all, not even the primrose (as Wordsworth knew), can be just a primrose and—nothing more! He will feel as humble before it as Tennyson did when he marvelled at the flower in the crannied wall, realising that if he could but understand what that was, "root and all, and all in all," he would understand "what God and man is."

"A child . . . a piece of Spring!" How much we should like to think that every little one in the land did, in its own small body, bear about the living spirit of that vigour and beauty we associate with the months of April and May! How happy one might be if, in spite of all other ills that human flesh is heir to, one knew that childhood, at least, was everywhere protected from the sordid horrors of life! The glory of the summer, and the fruits of autumn, are dependent upon the simple flowering, in sunlight and showers of all growing things in spring; and how much more are the welfare of the human race, and the development of the soul in man, dependent on the love and wisdom which, like fairies, should hover round every cradle in the land? If one looks in certain directions one finds the work of these fairies noticeably shown in bright eyes, and velvet-soft cheeks—in sturdy limbs and tossing curls—in bright laughter and the sweet baby chatter which is so irresponsible and joyous; and it is quite possible to draw from these a feeling of pride in the nation which can produce such beautiful realities.

But what of the preternaturally shrewd eyes that peer out at one from under matted locks elsewhere, of the baby-faces that look so wondrously old and wizened as they drop listlessly against the toil-worn mother's shoulder, of the unkempt heads which are cuffed when they should be caressed, and the crippled and stunted forms into which the full tide of health has never yet been poured? These also belong to our country, and are the very real products of one knows not how much misery and wrong, crime and despair, in the past; and when one realises their utter pathos, one can only feel that the poet's words must be, indeed, almost a mockery to any but men and women living in a fool's paradise of selfish prosperity.

The articles recently written by George R. Sims on the subject of child-demoralisation, and the effects of drink, ignorance, and sheer stupidity on infant mortality, have opened many peoples' eyes to the appalling state of things which exists in the "Babes' Inferno." The writer makes no attempt at pretentiousness of style. He is neither a poet nor a philosopher, dealing picturesquely, in the literary manner, with certain interesting phases of human life. He is merely a journalist (it is all he claims to be) describing in plain language the facts he has seen with his own eyes; and sometimes the very baldness of his phraseology fills one with a keener sense of horror than a vibrating line out of Dante. If less than half of his statements were true, the pains he has taken to bring such facts before the public would have been justified; but not only is sincerity stamped on every word in his sparse, curt narrative, but (as the writer himself hints) there is more, a thousandfold, behind. And indeed one has only to remember what harm a little inattention to cleanliness, a little neglect of precautionary measures in regard to disease or contaminating influences, a little too-much self-indulgence, or too scant a knowledge of the purposes of life, can accomplish, even in a "comfortable" household, in order to dimly realise what unspeakable and irreparable mischief is done to the human race in sordid slums where every law of health and morality is violated hour by hour. Of all the ills done by men or women who had their birth in the veritable abysses of modern England, there is nobody living who, if he knew all the circumstances which have combined to bring about such evil deeds, would dare to speak of "punishment" in connection with these miserable beings, except as a necessary process of restraint and reformation.

One remembers how, in that memorable book, "No. 5, John Street," the author speaks of the terrible struggle that goes on in so many places for just enough food to satisfy the animal craving for an hour or two. That craving, so imperious and unconquerable, which has in it no idealism, no ethical purpose, no humanity, when it becomes—as it must become with thousands—the one absorbing aim of life, has stamped its terror on the faces of the children of our poorer brethren ineradicably. But on those wolfish little countenances there is the shadow of a worse thing than this, the shadow of positive viciousness, bred from the squalor amid which their eyes first opened. Cruelty, crime, passion—these are words which remind us unpleasantly of the crudities of life. We would rather talk about the hawthorn-blossom, and the flower by the river's brink! But truths must be faced, and ideals made practical; and every would-be helper in the work of reformation must go through the inferno before he knows what those ideals are worth.

That was a true saying of Mr. Campbell's that a church "has nothing to do with getting man into heaven, but with getting heaven into man." Religion, which is the highest idealism of all, does not consist in setting up the vision of a far-off and impossible Kingdom of God which people will climb to "when the time is ripe." It consists rather in bringing the vision of goodness right down into the beating heart of our own generation, so that it may daily become less possible for sane, healthy people to witness the sordid sights in our midst, and turn from them with a mere spasm of futile pity. It shows us, on the one hand, the beautiful human entity which is joyous and fragrant as the dawn or the spring-time; on the other hand, it shows us the wretched, unfledged soul of a child, robbed of its heritage of light, air, love, and nurture, and sternly proclaims that man must never rest until the last is even as the first.

Haunting eyes follow us from those dens of savagery where the hope of the future lies trampled, like a fair flower, in filth and grime. Piteous voices call to us from wretched homes where little ones are dying in misery and pain, whose mothers, even, do not know what love and decency are. Shall one put these out of mind, and pass on happily to our enjoyment of merry April, in cowslip meadows where laughing children play whose lives are veritably a part of the springtime of the world? Or shall we respond to that within us which calls on every human soul to do its share, however small, in the battle against evil; and so lend voice or hand, as we are best able, to support causes which shall ultimately make childhood in every land "a fragment of the morn"? LAURA G. ACKROYD.

IN THE CROW'S NEST.

THE first stroke awakened Corvus, who counted one—two—three—four. "Ah," said he with relief, "I have still a few min—," when he was interrupted by the alarm at a quarter to five. Before long he was hastening under the frosty stars to the station, and anon speeding down the dark Engadin, up the dim Val Bever, through the long tunnel beneath the Rhine-Danube watershed, and down the grey Albulatal. It was at first too dark to read "Jürg Jenatsch," so Corvus opened at random the book of memory—not his own autobiography, but a more pleasing volume. The page he hit on, prompted no doubt by the purpose of his journey, was that of England in April.

"Whan that Aprille with his shoures swoote
The drought of Marche hath perced to the roote,
And baythed every veyne in swich liquour
Of which vertu engendred is the flour;
Whan Zephyrus eek with his swoote breathe
Enspired hath in everiche holte and heathe

The tendre croppes, and the yonge sonne
Hath in the Ram his halfe cours yronne,
And smale foules maken melodie
That slepen all the night with open eye,
So priketh hem Nature in her corages,
Then longen folk to gon on pilgrimages," especially to return thanks for recovery from sickness; and Corvus hopes, when April arrives, to travel on a similar errand. To-day shall decide.

The early birds in the carriage are chattering Ladin, and what glimmers through the window is snowy mountain and pine forest; but against this background a many-coloured troop starts out, riding through the green lanes and copses, and the budding hop-gardens of Kent, and Corvus can hear their quaint old English speech. There goes the Knight who "never yit no vilanye ne said

In all his life, unto no maner wight," and his accomplished gallant of a son, with "lockes crulle, as they were laid in presse." Behind them rides the nut-headed yeoman, and not far off the gentle Prioress, whose French and manners were so unexceptionable; for indeed she "peyned hir to countrefete cheere Of court, and ben estatlich of manere."

The solid merchant
("There wiste no man that he was in dette") chatted with the Serjeante-atte-lawe, whose face was a closed volume of important affairs.

"Nowhere so besy a man as he there nas;
And yet he seemed besier than he was."

Here at Preda we are in the Rhine basin. Three children get in, going to school at Bergün, and beguile the time with a game of Jas. When the conductor comes round for tickets they proffer him an ace of spades; he laughs, and stops awhile to watch and criticise their game. The train plunges into a mountain, turns on itself and bores beneath its own tracks, swings across the Albula, back and forth, over a couple of viaducts, and threads another spiral tunnel underneath the first. Now it sees Bergün far beneath it, and in two long zig-zags, each ending in a spiral tunnel, it climbs down to the village; and to there, on the tip of Piz d'Aela, suddenly the golden sunlight!

The snow grows deeper and deeper, the opening valley gives us ever more romantic glimpses. It is upon a background of sheer walls of rock, groups of glistening peaks, frozen torrents, hoary pine-clad hills, that the pilgrims paint their old-world procession. The horsy monk rides well ahead of the bare-footed friar; both are rogues, but the monk is the manlier one. Neither takes any note of a poor parson of a town, that kindly, simple, hardworking type we have still with us:

"Christe's lore, and his apostles twelve
He taught, but firste he followed it himselve";

nor of the poor clerk of Oxenford, who was so glad to learn, and glad to teach. That is the mighty Tinzenhorn, there, visible for a moment through that cleft! and there beneath it is the group of liverymen, and their cook, laughing loud with the wife of Bath; there is the honest Franklin discoursing with the Doctour of Physike, whose "study was but litle in the Bible"; there is the Manciple colloquing with the Shipman—two strange fish to lie in one basket—the red-bearded miller roaring at some doubtful jest of the cherubic sompneur; the pardoner crying his wares, and, last of all, that vile sneak the reeve.

At Alvaneu a change must be made from train to mail-coach, and Corvus climbs up the long slope to Wiesen, dashes down to the Bärentritt, and travels through the beautiful Zügenstrasse to Davos. The Zügenstrasse is, next to the Viamala, the most romantic pass in Switzerland; but Corvus has seen its perfect beauty for the last time. Beneath the snow lie huge heaps of debris, flung out of tunnels which are being pierced for the new railway. Ah, civilisation, what crimes are committed in thy name!

All literature is one. Open the book where you will, you will find links with all the rest. The traveller through these majestic wintry scenes is not only at the same time in Chaucer's England, but in many another age and place. In Verona—"It was the nightingale and not the lark,
That pierced the fearful hollow of thine ear";

In the camp before Angiers—

"And hang a calf's-skin on those recreant limbs!"

In Cyprus—

"I look down towards his feet—but that's a fable."

In Egypt—

"Dost thou not see my baby at my breast,
That sucks the nurse asleep?"

In Thebes—

οὔτοι συνέχθειν ἄλλὰ συμφίλει ἔφην

In Mycenæ—

οὐτός ἐστιν Ἀγαμέμνων, ἔμδος πόσις, ἑκρός δὲ τῇδε ἐξείας χερός and thence by some strange gust of fancy in Säkkingen—

"Was ist das für ein Trompeten?"

But here he is actually in Davos Platz. To balance a personal disappointment, Corvus learns from the Chaplain that the bazaar for the Queen Alexandra Sanatorium realised £1,700, and that £80 more were obtained by a Gymkhana. Both of these were suggested by the Chaplain and his wife, and they may well be satisfied with the result. But about £12,000 is still needed, so that there is ample opportunity for Unitarians to eclipse this performance, if they will.

PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY OF LONDON AND THE SOUTH-EASTERN COUNTIES.

A UNION meeting for South London, similar to that held recently for the North at Mansford-street, was held at Effra-road, Brixton, on Thursday evening, March 14, but was only scantily attended, about seventy in all being present. After a short organ recital by Mr. John Harrison, there was religious service, conducted by the Revs. F. Allen and F. W. Stanley, and followed by four addresses.

The Rev. F. H. JONES, President of the Assembly, spoke of its foundation and the religious principles it embodies, especially the principle of non-subscription. The Rev. F. K. FREESTON spoke of the work the Assembly does, making for closer union and more effective co-operation on the part of the congregations, and more efficient ministry. It was for them still a day of small things, he said, but they were on the right lines.

The Rev. W. C. POPE spoke of the purpose of a church, to cultivate reverence and the true atmosphere of the soul, and to uplift life. They must have a Church, he said, with a door as wide as the gate of heaven, that would give to all the chance of going in.

The Rev. W. J. JUPP, spoke of the appeal of free religion, and asked why there was not more enthusiasm and passionate devotion. Partly, he thought, it was because they lacked inwardness; and they needed greater heroism of faith, swiftly and fearlessly to obey the call of the spirit, so that they might be able to say with profound truth: "I must work the works of Him that sent me; the words that I speak are not of myself, the Father who dwelleth in me, He doeth the works." That had ever been the secret of the power of great souls—of Jesus, and Paul, and Francis, of Fox, Emerson, and Whitman. The secret of their power lay in hearing and obeying the Divine voice; with their great confidence went the truest humility. They must aim at that intimate fellowship of the human personality with the Divine purpose, the eternal life and love focussed in each one, as earthen vessels, yet charged with heavenly treasure.

A closing hymn and the benediction concluded the service, after which refreshments were served in the school-room, and there was a pleasant opportunity for meeting friends.

LIVERPOOL DISTRICT MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE annual meeting was held in the Hope-street Church lecture hall, on Saturday afternoon, the 16th inst., when there was a fair attendance. The PRESIDENT, the Rev. J. C. ODGERS, gave an interesting account of the year's work; pointing out that, owing to the generosity of friends who had met their needs, they had wiped out the deficit of £180; and, in addition, were enabled to guarantee the missionary's stipend at Garston for another year. The Committee had felt that to desert the devoted friends at Garston would be very sad, and he was glad to bear personal witness to the good work accomplished by Mr. Hoole. He was glad to hear of the Social Problem Circles lately formed at Bootle and Birkenhead, and referred to the Temperance Report of the Social Questions Sub-Committee of the Association. He proposed the adoption of the Report and accounts.

Mr. PHILIP H. HOLT, in seconding, said they had all laboured during the year in advancing their views, and were delighted to hear from other voices something of what they had fought for in the past. It might be that Mr. Campbell would retract from what he had said, and he admitted the difficulty of the position. But the stone had begun to move, and the questions started must be faced. Whilst it was interesting to read the Bishop of Birmingham's lecture on the "New Theology," and the Unitarian position, and whilst much might be hoped from the Congregationalists, as being freest in their organisation, he was convinced there was much work still to be done by the members of the Liverpool District Missionary Association. The second resolution, proposed by

Mr. CHARLES W. JONES, and seconded by the Rev. H. D. ROBERTS, was as follows:—"That on receiving the reports of the Revs. J. Morley Mills, H. W. Hawkes, R. P. Farley, and Mr. Douglas Hoole, the members of the Association record their sense of the great importance of the work for the support of which they are largely responsible, and their earnest sympathy with those who are practically engaged in these efforts to extend the influence of a liberal religious faith and life; and are pleased to note the work accomplished at Hamilton-road and at Crewe."

Mr. CHARLES JONES testified to the quiet, earnest work of the missionaries. To Mr. Hawkes they were specially indebted for taking up the work at West Kirby; the experiment of planting Mr. Farley at St. Helen's was quite justified, and he confessed he saw reason to change his mind concerning Garston. It was noteworthy to see that the Sunday-school at Bootle was largely composed of children of members of the congregation, and that the Bootle church, under Mr. Mills, flourished, notwithstanding the perennial "moving" difficulty.

The resolution being carried with acclamation, the missionaries responded, each narrating the special features of his work. The Rev. J. L. Haigh also spoke.

The Rev. J. Fisher Short (Crewe) and Mr. Llewellyn Rowlands (Liscard) proposed and seconded the twelve members of the General Council appointed by the subscribers, and a cordial vote of thanks to the President, proposed by Rev. C. Craddock and seconded by the Rev. D. Jenkin Evans (Chester), brought a hopeful and hearty meeting to a close.

MANCHESTER DISTRICT ASSOCIATION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE annual meeting of the Manchester District Association of Presbyterian and Unitarian Churches was held on Saturday last. There was afternoon service in Cross-street Chapel, conducted by the Rev. J. H. Weatherall, who preached an earnest sermon of encouragement and inspiration on the essential things of religion to which the churches must be devoted. Mr. O. H. Heys and the Longsight Chapel choir had charge of the musical arrangements. After tea in the Lower Mosley-street School, the annual meeting was held in the Memorial Hall. The chair was taken by the president, Mr. T. Fletcher-Robinson, and there was a good attendance of ministers and delegates of the local churches. After an opening hymn, the Chairman moved the adoption of the Annual Report. It recorded the arrangements up to date for the holding of a great bazaar in aid of the Association's funds in 1908, and looked forward hopefully to a successful result. It noted with satisfaction the increased usefulness of the lay preachers' union, whose members had conducted 311 services during the year. While recording the excellent work done by the Social Questions Committee, the Report sought to dispel the erroneous idea that the Committee was unduly leaning towards Socialism as a solution of social evils. The Committee was in no way pledged to any particular theory, and it examined all questions with an open mind. The Report took note of the protest made by the Association against the action of the City Council in recognising the exclusion of the ministers of the associated churches from the rota of ministers appointed to officiate at Non-conformist funerals, and promised further action. After detailed reference to the various churches, the Report concluded as follows:—

"The present time is one of great unrest among the churches, and the movement described as 'The New Theology' illustrates once again the disturbing opposition between stationary dogma and advancing thought. The new movement, as did also the Scotch Church case, brings into prominence the value of the principle of non-subscription in religion. The logic of events is making clear the need for religious association and fellowship, apart from theological agreement, and we may rejoice that our principles are in harmony with this tendency. But, with all humility, let us confess that we do not yet show, as we might, the fruits of the freedom that we enjoy. Our churches, in their life, their worship, their power, do not as yet witness triumphantly to the principles for which they stand. And if we are to encourage others to join us in the path along which we move, we shall have to be born again of the spirit, and feel in our work, whether as individual churches or as an Association, a new life of earnestness, devotion, and joy."

The CHAIRMAN, in moving the adoption of the Report, after commenting on its various items, turned his attention to the interest aroused by the visit of the Rev. R. J. Campbell to Manchester. He had been struck by the frank, free, and open manner of Mr. Campbell, and he urged them not to be too critical in seeking for inconsistencies in Mr. Campbell's position. The next twenty years would, he believed, be a period of rapid theological change, and Mr. Campbell would be one of the great leaders in the movement. At the end we should, he believed, find ourselves on the common platform of free religious fellowship.

The resolution was seconded by Dr. GRIFFITHS, supported by Mr. J. PARTINGTON, and carried.

The financial statement, which showed a serious deficit, was likewise adopted on the motion of the PRESIDENT and Mr. H. J. BROADBENT.

The Rev. A. LESLIE SMITH said they needed to drive out the demon of ineffectiveness which was crippling all their work, and the only way to do so was by realising the power of prayer. Only by going down to the roots of life could they find life, and religious life apart from constant private prayer was impossible.

Mr. GROSVENOR TALBOT, as representing the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, of which he is the President, delivered a rousing and cheering speech. In a meeting marked by too much of the pessimistic mood, his was the one bright, optimistic speech. He had, he said, seen the world growing better. He had seen the part in the process played by our churches. He refused, therefore, to despond, and he looked forward with hope.

Mr. D. HEALEY, Mayor of Heywood, as representing the North-East Lancashire Mission, gave a racy speech, telling how, in the early days of his own church, he used to take his coat off and take his turn with others in sweeping the school and dusting the chapel. Now they could afford to keep a chapel-keeper, but he still found plenty of work to do, if of a somewhat different kind.

Mr. A. SLATER spoke for the East Cheshire Association, claiming to be the one happy man present, as his Association seemed to be the only one with a good cash balance in hand.

The Rev. A. C. Fox expressed his indignation at the shameful attack made upon Unitarians by some unknown person in the advertisement columns of the Manchester Guardian. The advertisement purported to contrast Christianity and Unitarianity. What the latter was he did not know, but Unitarianism was true to the spirit of Christianity, and especially to its genius of freedom.

The Rev. H. DAWTREY spoke hopefully of his experiences since settling in Manchester, and the meeting closed with hymn and prayer.

BLACKFRIARS MISSION AND STAMFORD STREET CHAPEL:

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE annual meeting was held in Stamford-street Chapel on Tuesday evening, Sir E. Durning Lawrence, Bart., in the chair. After an opening hymn the Committee's report was read by Mr. A. A. Tayler, and the Treasurer's statement by Mr. W. S. Tayler. The Rev. W. L. Tucker also read his report, and the reports of various societies followed.

The Committee's report, which spoke with satisfaction of the year's steady work on the accustomed lines, concluded with the following announcement:—

"Your Committee regret to report that the Rev. W. Lyddon Tucker, finding the strain of his double duties as Minister and Missionary too severe, has tendered his resignation. Mr. and Mrs. Tucker, during the three years they have been among us have won the esteem and affection of all with whom they have come in contact, and will take with them the hearty thanks and good wishes of all their Stamford-street friends. It is satisfactory to know that Mr. Tucker's successor will find all our institutions working smoothly and well, and doing good service, as will be seen from the detailed reports which follow."

The Treasurer's statement, with a total of £427 9s. 5½d., showed the balance of £6 3s. 6d., with which the year began, converted into an adverse balance of £12 6s. 6d.

The minister's report bore witness to the large amount of vigorous and successful work carried out during the year, and recorded the retirement of Mr. S. S. Tayler from the office of Sunday-school secretary after thirty-two years of service, and the address presented to him on that occasion. His three years' experience of the Mission, Mr. Tucker said, left him more convinced than ever of the prime importance of the directly religious work in the Sunday-school and public worship.

One of the strongest of the many connected societies was the Provident Bank, for which £907 17s. 7d. had been collected during the year, an amount only once before exceeded. Particulars were also given of the country cottage at Mitcham, the Flower Show and Industrial Exhibition, Children's Happy Evenings, Monday Popular Concerts, the Band of Hope and Mercy, the Adult Temperance Society, the Mothers' Meeting, various clubs, and, of course, the Sunday-school, with 216 scholars on the books, and thirty-one over sixteen years of age.

The CHAIRMAN, in moving the adoption of the report and accounts, spoke of the enlarging and uplifting influence of association with such work in its many forms as centred in that Mission, and its high religious significance. He paid a tribute to the excellence of the temperance work carried on there, and said it was a great pleasure to come down to Stamford-street and recognise the good work that was being carried on in that place, which was dear to so many of them. He trusted that the appeal of the Treasurer would receive ample response.

The Rev. W. G. TARRANT seconded the motion, and referred with sympathy and appreciation to Mr. Tucker's work at the Mission: In bidding him farewell, after his three years of service, they could assure Mr. Tucker that he carried away with him the affection of his fellow-workers.

On the motion of the Rev. T. E. M. EDWARDS, seconded by Mr. W. H. BALLANTYNE, the committee and officers were then appointed, Mr. A. A. Tayler being re-appointed hon. secretary, and Mr. W. S. Tayler treasurer.

On the motion of Mr. PERCY PRESTON, seconded by the Rev. W. COPELAND BOWIE, the following resolution was then unanimously passed:—

"That this meeting hears with much regret of the Rev. W. L. Tucker's resignation of the office of minister and missionary, tenders to him its thanks for his earnest and successful work on behalf of the Mission, and wishes him and Mrs. Tucker all possible success and happiness in the future."

The Rev. W. L. TUCKER acknowledged the resolution with expressions of gratitude for the kindness he had received, and spoke with much feeling of the help he had received from his wife in the work of the Mission.

Lady DURNING LAWRENCE proposed a resolution of thanks to all the workers at the Mission, and noted with pleasure the presence among them of many who had passed through the school.

This was seconded by the Rev. F. W. STANLEY, and a vote of thanks to the chairman, proposed by Mr. C. F. PEARSON and seconded by Mr. W. H. ABRAHAM, followed by another hymn and the Benediction, brought the meeting to a close.

I CALL that mind free which, through confidence in God and in the power of virtue, has cast off all fear but that of wrong-doing, which no menace or peril can enthrall, which is calm in the midst of tumults, and possesses itself though all else be lost.—Channing.

MANSFORD STREET CHURCH AND MISSION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE annual meeting was held at Mansford-street on Wednesday evening, when there was a fair attendance of friends and supporters of the Mission. Tea and coffee were served in one of the lower rooms of the Blythe-street Hall, and the meeting was subsequently held in the church, Dr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C., presiding.

Mr. W. STANTON PRESTON read the committee's report, which bore witness to the untiring energy and self-devotion of the Rev. Gordon Cooper, and the very satisfactory nature of the work carried on at the Mission. The need of a larger subscription list was strongly urged, and it was noted that the Working Men's Club, which was a cause of considerable additional expense, but also of advantage to the Mission, had agreed to contribute £25 a year to the funds. To meet the cost of extensive repairs and the deficit of the Blythe-street Hall building account £163 3s. of India stock had been sold, and special donations, chiefly from old subscribers, amounting to £83 5s. 6d., had been received, and to that extent had diminished the expected deficit on the year's working. Mrs. Classon Drummond had succeeded Mr. Lee as treasurer of the Provident Fund, and gratitude was expressed to him for his fourteen years' service. Mr. Classon Drummond had been obliged by pressure of business to resign his position as co-secretary with Mr. Preston, and Mr. Ronald Jones had consented, temporarily, to take his place.

Miss LOUISA JONES presented the accounts, and drew attention to serious additions to the expenses, including £36 19s. 4d. for the borough rate for the hall and schools. Subscriptions up to the time of the November appeal amounted to £271 6s. 6d. The expenditure for the present year she estimated at £490, and reckoning all available sources of income there would remain about £60 to be made up, for which they must obtain fresh subscriptions.

The Rev. GORDON COOPER read his report, which chronicled steady progress in the work, and dwelt upon the great value of the schools and clubs which were in full activity, and other useful operations connected with the Mission. In the provident work, £550 had been collected from 798 depositors, £68 more than in the previous year. Much good had also been done by the Country Holiday Fund. Mr. Cooper expressed his great pleasure in the visits of students from Manchester College, Oxford, for each week-end during term, and mentioned that Mr. R. K. Davis had spent three weeks at the Mission at Christmas.

Mr. CLARK read the Chapel Committee's report, which told of a great variety of activity in the church, including the work of the Window Gardening Society and the "Model Guild."

The CHAIRMAN, in moving the adoption of the report and accounts, dwelt upon the matters of chief interest in the work, and congratulated Mr. Cooper and the members on its admirable nature. It was well that they should come together, as they had done that night, from all parts of London, to show their interest in that work, and appreciation of it. Londoners had been too prone in the past to parochialism, and needed to realise more the greatness of their city and its mighty problems. Towards the solving of those problems such quiet, steady work as was done at such a Mission as theirs was certainly making in the right direction.

The Rev. W. COPELAND BOWIE seconded the resolution, and bore testimony to the value of that work, far beyond that of the sensational schemes which were periodically brought forward to overcome the evils of their city life.

The resolution was unanimously passed.

The Rev. F. K. FREESTON moved a resolution strongly appealing, in view of the very satisfactory nature of the work and influence of the Mission, for a large amount of additional subscriptions. He repeated the treasurer's appeal for an additional £60 of income, and, referring to the great difficulty of finding new sources of income, suggested that perhaps if it were understood that small amounts would be welcome, their young people, members of the Guilds, and others would take the matter up, and help to strengthen the good work.

The resolution was seconded by the Rev. V. D. DAVIS, and adopted.

On the motion of the Rev. W. G. TARRANT, seconded by the Rev. W. WOODING, the committee and officers were elected; and Mr. STANTON PRESTON, in acknowledging the vote, recalled what he and Mr. David Martineau had done, as secretary and treasurer of the London District Unitarian Society, twenty years ago, to secure the establishment of that Mission, as successor to the original Spicer-street Mission. The work, he said, had been a success from the first, and was better now than ever.

A vote of thanks to the Chairman, moved by Mr. R. P. JONES, and seconded by Mr. E. B. SQUIRE, brought the meeting to a close.

SPIRITUAL freedom is the attribute of a mind in which reason and conscience have begun to act, and which is free through its own energy, through fidelity to the truth, through resistance of temptation. I cannot therefore better give my views of spiritual freedom than by saying that it is moral energy or force of holy purpose put forth against the senses, against the passions, against the world, and thus liberating the intellect, conscience, and will, so that they may act with strength and unfold themselves for ever. The essence of spiritual freedom is power. A man liberated from sensual lusts by a palsy would not therefore be inwardly free. He only is free who, through self-conflict and moral resolution, sustained by trust in God, subdues the passions which have debased him, and, escaping the thralldom of low objects, binds himself to pure and lofty ones. That mind alone is free which, looking to God as the Inspirer and Rewarder of virtue, adopts His law, written on the heart and in His word, as its supreme rule, and which, in obedience to this, governs itself, reveres itself, exerts faithfully its best powers, and unfolds itself by well-doing in whatever sphere God's providence assigns.—Channing.

AMERICAN "RELIGIOUS EDUCATION ASSOCIATION."

In the Christian Register of February 21, Dr. S. A. Eliot, President of the American Unitarian Association, gives the following interesting account of a meeting of the above-named association:—

I am just returned from the impressive gathering of the Religious Education Association at Rochester. This is one of the most significant of our national organisations at work for the highest welfare of America, and it contains great possibilities of effective service. The Rochester meeting brought together College presidents like Faunce of Brown, King of Oberlin, Schurman of Cornell, Rhees of Rochester, Luther of Trinity, Swain of Swarthmore, McLean of Iowa; Theological School presidents and deans like McKenzie of Hartford, Stewart of Auburn, Strong of Rochester, Hodges of Cambridge, and Southworth of Meadville; experts in religious organisation like Sanders of the Congregational Sunday School Society, Brown of the Presbyterian Board, Hodge of the Teachers' College, Messer of the Young Men's Christian Association; teachers like Taylor, Burton, and Henderson of Chicago, Coe of North-Western, Brown of Union, DeGarmo of Cornell, Street of Syracuse. These are men of diverse traditions and connections, but united in the purpose to "inspire the religious forces of the country with the educational ideal and the educational forces of the country with the religious ideal."

If these men cherish any important differences in their convictions, they are well tempered with charity. They may not agree about some historical facts, but they agree in the use of the historical method. All alike are trying to bring in the kingdom of God; all have a passion for humanity; all are appealing to moral and spiritual motives and ideals; all want to make our churches and schools and colleges fit instruments for the formation of character, the development of civic righteousness, and the upbuilding of the ethical efficiency and spiritual vitality of Americans. The opening address of the president admirably stated this unity of spirit: "It is not essential that all of us should interpret truth and duty in precisely the same way, but it is essential that we should all carry the open mind. The great difference among men is not the difference between rich and poor, between the learned and the ignorant. It is the difference between men of the open mind and men of the closed mind, and men for whom all truth and duty are fixed and fossilised, and the men who believe that God's to-morrow is greater than his yesterday, and that more light is to break out of His word. All men of all creeds who believe in the open mind, this convention is for you."

I was proud of the exhibit of our Sunday-school publications sent by Mr. Horton, and carefully arranged and tended by Mr. Gannett. Scores of interested people examined these books and manuals, and some Sunday-school workers, to whom such material was absolutely novel, spent hours in absorbed reading or with notebook and pencil. Many said to me, "If it were not for the imprint, how gladly we should use these books and how thoroughly acceptable they would be."

I would not imply that all the world is becoming liberal. The vast majority of Americans is still either absolutely indifferent to all religious influences, or else bound to cruel superstitions and delusive fallacies. But the leaders are emancipated alike from apathy and bigotry. It is astonishing to see how such a company of reputedly orthodox theologians and ministers will not only gladly listen to the most heterodox utterances and apparently heartily assent to them, but will vie with each other to express the most radical conclusions about the higher criticism of the Bible or the incompetency of the old methods of church and Sunday-school administration, or the complete change of front that is needed in foreign mission work, or the need of the application of religious teaching in social service. Of all the addresses which I heard, I think I may safely say that my own was the most conservative.

SAMUEL A. ELIOT.

NORTH WALES RE-VISITED:

AFTER THE PASSING OF A GENERATION.

THE old bitterness between dissent and establishment continues. The heart of the Welsh people is alien to the Church of England, though most of the upper middle class belong to it and the whole of the classes above do; and the Church amply repays the aversion.

The Establishment seems to have slightly gained in its proportional number of adherents. One explanation is curious: The Welsh language is rapidly losing ground. In the little village near which I was brought up (five miles from the nearest butcher's shop) the school children now talk English to each other; formerly they could not understand it.

The young people, in the towns at least, understand English much as though they were English. They also speak Welsh, but only such as is required for the most ordinary daily use, and that is mixed with English. The parents taking these to a Welsh chapel, when children, take them to a service in a language which they do not really understand. When these children become their own masters, many of them, glad to escape the weariness of these services, cease to attend anywhere.

The higher classes being now, as formerly, less Welsh speaking than the lower, the church services are oftener English, and these can be intelligently joined in by these young people, so they become church attendants.

Two things I am struck with in the chapel services. One, the great predominance of Jesus Christ throughout the service: Every hymn may be addressed to him, both lessons taken out of the New Testament; the prayers also addressed to Christ, and the sermon an exhortation to work for him.

The other is the change in the music. Instead of the old swinging tunes, the hymns are now usually sung to musical arrangements, which are often not really tunes. The change is, of course, not peculiar to Wales.

An advantage of this change was brought home to me: I attended a service where we had the old swinging tunes: A child or two near me sang discordantly so loud that during the second hymn I made my escape, and going elsewhere, found myself near a voice which it was such a joy to hear as it is the thrushes' dawn song in spring. Here the music to the hymns could hardly be sung by anyone who was not more or less of a trained musician, nor did it tempt others to try. Consequently, only those few sang who could sing well.

The attendance at places of worship has fallen off in proportion to the inhabitants, much in some towns, little or possibly not at all in some villages.

The adult Sunday-schools are still an important feature: The children usually take the schoolroom; the adults—and there may be two or three hundred of them—the chapel.

There has been a good deal of rebuilding of chapels, the old plain meeting-house giving place to a more expensive and ecclesiastical-looking building. It is one of the many signs of the increased wealth of the people.

The Bible was universally known formerly. A quotation or illustration from it would be made in the harvest field and understood. Now it is comparatively an unknown book.

ASSISTED CHURCHES AND MISSION CHURCHES.

SIR,—It was with great surprise not to say deep pain, that I found the Rev. John Fox had taken one portion of my article on the above subject as a personal reflection or "attack" upon himself or his work. So far was I from intending any such thing, that I did not even mention his name in the quotation I made from his letter to the INQUIRER of months ago, and I only made the quotation itself as "a curious illustration of how entirely one-sided we have become in such vain expectations" as those into which we have fallen in regard to the "technically assisted" churches. I had, assuredly, no thought whatever that Mr. Fox needed to defend either himself or his work, and, after all he has said on that question, the one sentence I quoted from him remains intact for my original purpose, which contained in itself no personal implication at all.

In the other remarks which Mr. Fox has made upon my article, he has fallen into other mistakes equally baseless. When, for instance, he says that he has looked "in vain" through my article for any alternative policy "to the one hitherto pursued," he makes it clear to me that he has not looked quite carefully. If he will re-read the latter portion of the second paragraph of my article, he will find a discussion on certain hypothetical alternative policies, which I deliberately set aside as impossible, or, at least, improbable. If, again, he will re-read the third and last part of the article, he will find a clear and explicit statement of what I take to be the remedy for every evil I have specifically mentioned. When, further, Mr. Fox tries to show how unreasonable it would be to expect our endowed churches to become independent of their endowments, he does but confirm, rather than refute, my own argument; for, if it would be unreasonable, as he himself shows, to expect all our endowed churches to become financially strong enough to do without their endowments, it surely is, as I contended, just as unreasonable, to say the least of it, to expect "assisted churches to become, as a matter of course, independent of their grants in aid, or to expect all such churches as are directly helped by wealthy sister-churches, to become independent of such help. Meanwhile, it seems to me quite natural and logical to think that, where and when otherwise well-to-do churches have the greater part of their own expenditure provided for by endowments, they should be all the more willing and glad to help their poorer neighbours without the least thought of consequent lordship over them.

In anticipation of his own mistaken comments upon my article, Mr. Fox suggests that the full reply to it is "rather a matter for the authorities of the local mission," than for himself. It is a singular suggestion, and I can only understand it at all on the presumption that having first fallen into the error of supposing that part of my article was a reflection upon himself or his work, Mr. Fox then fell into the equally great error of supposing that all that I had written, when not wholly personal, was purely local in its bearings. My article, from first to last, had reference not to a locality here or there, but to the whole body of our churches. All I have written is an unprejudiced and impersonal discussion, as far as limits in the INQUIRER allowed, of part of that great question of church rule and church order as a whole which has been before us so long, which is just now engaging the earnest attention both of the National Conference Committee and the Committee of the Ministerial Fellowship, not to mention the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, with whom, like the poor, it is always present.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Bridgend.—After service last Sunday evening, a resolution was passed congratulating Mr. G. B. Murray, B.A., an officer of the excise, on his promotion to a first-class station in Manchester. Mr. Murray has been accustomed to walk from his home at Brynmenyn, a distance of four miles, to the service at Bridgend on most Sundays. He did excellent service on the committee and in other directions, and leaves a vacancy hard to be filled. A resolution was also passed expressing regret at the departure of Mr. W. J. Haines, late manager of the local branch of Eastman's Co., Ltd., for Winnipeg, and wishing him and his family happiness and prosperity in North-West Canada. Mr. Haines was also a faithful member of the congregation and of the committee.

Colne.—Mr. J. W. Hird, secretary of the Unitarian Church, has been elected to fill a vacancy on the Town Council. Councillor Hird was a member of the Colne School Board during the six years of its existence, and at the first election he was returned at the head of the poll. He is a lay preacher and a Sunday-school teacher. Last year he was President of the North-East Lancashire Sunday School Union.

Killicaidj.—On Sunday last the services were conducted by Mr. R. N. Cross, M.A., of Manchester College, Oxford, who is, to continue the Sunday services during the Easter vacation.

London: Forest Gate.—Mr. Brant gave a lecture of strong local interest at the last meeting of the present session of the Literary and Social Union. It was entitled, "Woden Worship at Old Wanstead." Councillor Saunders Jacobs, who was in the chair, and the Rev. H. W. Perris spoke in warm terms of the paper, and a cordial vote of thanks was passed to the lecturer and chairman.

London, Islington.—On Tuesday evening, in connection with Unity Church Literary Society, Dr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C., delivered a most interesting lecture on "Shakespeare's Mother," on behalf of the Preston Memorial Building Fund. Touches of wit sparkled throughout the lecture, which was listened to with the closest interest, and warmly applauded by the audience. The Memorial Buildings are now occupied, and constantly used by the many social and educational activities connected with the church. Mothers' meetings have been started, and the ladies' working party assemblies weekly to make garments for distribution by the Benevolent Society, after personal investigation. As some expenses for furnishing the new rooms will have to be met, and as the reserve and the church treasurer's funds have become reduced, it has been decided to hold a sale of work in the school-room, probably in October, in order to replenish the coffers. During the last few weeks, the Rev. E. Savell Hicks has been delivering a course of Sunday evening sermons on "The Birth of Christianity," which attracted much interest in the district, and were published in the local press. He has now commenced a short series on "Sir Oliver Lodge's Catechism," which is proving equally attractive. The annual meeting of the London Domestic Mission will be held this year, in Unity Church Schoolroom, on Tuesday, May 14, when it is hoped there will be a large attendance. Friends who were unable to be present at the opening ceremony might avail themselves of this opportunity to view the new buildings, erected to the memory of the late Mr. Joseph T. Preston.

London: Limehouse.—The annual meeting of the Unitarian Christian Church, Durning Hall, was held on March 14, reports of the twenty-second year of work being presented. Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence, who was accompanied by Lady Durning-Lawrence, took the chair. There were 160 present, either members of the congregation or associated with the Durning Hall institutions. Several of the workers came originally as children to the Sunday-school, and many members of the congregation have belonged to it since the foundation of the Mission. There are 69 names on the roll of membership. After refreshments had been served, some good music was provided by the singing class and choir and the Stepney Borough Band, which, joined to the Elsa-street Band, has its headquarters at Durning Hall. The heads of the various societies read their reports of the work for the year. These show that progress is being made, and that the Mission continues to be the centre of much good work and enterprise. The gymnasium, a new institution, has an average attendance of 50 boys, who go through series of drill and other exercises. Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence commented on the able way in which the reports were presented, and Lady Durning-Lawrence encouraged the workers to continue their efforts. The Rev. J. S. Toye and his devoted band of helpers are to be warmly congratulated on their good work.

London: Peckham.—The annual meeting of the Sunday-school and Band of Hope was held on March 13, the Rev. G. Critchley presiding. One hundred scholars and thirty adults were present at the tea, the number of parents increasing during the evening. The children contributed a short programme of music, &c. The chairman distributed the prizes to the successful Sunday-school children, the members of the Band of Hope receiving theirs from Mr. Bredall, who founded it over twenty years ago.

Maidstone.—During the past winter, under the ministry of the Rev. A. Farquharson, the chapel has every Sunday been filled, generally crowded, and on occasions friends have been unable to find room. New members have been enrolled, and there has been a large increase in the regular income.

Manchester: Urmston.—The congregation has lost one of its first members and most steadfast workers through the death, on the 14th inst., of Mr. Frederick Matley, at the age of fifty-nine. He was secretary of the congregation, having held that office, except for an interval of two years, since 1897, and represented the congregation on the governing body of the District Association. Unobtrusively and faithfully he did his work, and those who knew him well will long hold in affectionate remembrance the tall, quiet man whose judgment of his fellows was always kindly, and whose speech was always straightforward, simple, and sincere.

Newcastle-under-Lyme.—On Sunday evening last the Rev. G. Pegler conducted the re-opening services in the Old Meeting House, the oldest Nonconformist chapel in North Staffordshire, which has just been thoroughly renovated. The subject of his sermon was "Wisdom hath built herself a house." There was a large congregation.

Park Lane, near Wigan.—On Wednesday, March 13, a most successful sale of work was held in the Shaw Memorial Schools, opened by Mr. J. Percy Taylor, of Bolton, Mr. R. H. Edmondson, J.P., of Windermere, presiding. The object was to raise £50 for repairs to church and school heating apparatus and tea room. The result was the handsome sum of £100. The Rev. J. B. Higham, the minister, was unfortunately prevented by indisposition from being present.

Sheffield: Upper Chapel and Attercliffe.—On Sunday morning last at Upper Chapel, in place of the usual service, the induction service to mark the entrance of Mr. J. Walter Cock, of Oxford, into the ministry as assistant, was celebrated. The charge was given by the Rev. Dr. J. Estlin Carpenter, Principal of Manchester College, Oxford, the welcome into the ministry by the senior minister, the Rev. C. J. Street, and a suitable response was made by Mr. Cock. There was a large congregation, which was also the case in the evening at the Attercliffe Unitarian School Church, where the service was conducted by the Rev. J. W. Cock, and the sermon preached by the Rev. Dr. Carpenter.

Yorkshire Unitarian Club.—The president, Mr. Wm. Skelton, took the chair at a meeting held at Hunslet, Leeds, last Saturday, when the Rev. C. Hargrove gave a lecture on "Unitarianism, Its Failure and Success." In the course of his lecture Mr. Hargrove advocated a liturgy as an aid to worship, and spoke with warm appreciation of the Van Mission. In the discussion which followed, most of the speakers approved of a liturgy in our services. The membership of the club is now sixty. There will be an excursion to Ingleton for members and friends on Saturday, June 22 next. The Revs. A. Amey, John Ellis, and John Fox (late minister at Hunslet), were elected as hon. members. Application for membership should be addressed to the hon. secretary, Mr. A. Simpson, 17, Parkfield-mount, Beeston, Leeds.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

EASTER comes to us this year a fortnight earlier than last year, but with as fine a promise of clear, sunny days. Two years ago, Good Friday fell on April 21, and brought with it the Martineau Centenary. Friends will remember that this year, on Saturday April 20, the foundation stone of the Martineau Memorial at Norwich is to be laid by Miss Gertrude Martineau.

PROFESSOR RUDOLF EUCKEN, of Jena, has very cordially accepted the invitation of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association to deliver the Essex Hall Lecture, but his engagements do not permit of his coming to England this year. He will therefore lecture in 1908. It will be seen from the report of the Council meeting that as to the present year no announcement could then be made, but we imagine that the Committee will now be wise to abandon the lecture, and to use the Tuesday evening in Whit-week, say, for the Public Meeting, and leave Wednesday free for some other purpose.

MONDAY, March 25, was the hundredth anniversary of the abolition of the slave trade by the British Parliament, the Bill promoted by Wilberforce and his friends having on that day received the Royal assent. The complete abolition of slavery in British Dominions was only completed some thirty years later. And still there is need for watchfulness that it shall not be tolerated under any specious form. In the matter of the Congo infamy, the responsibility of this country remains, to demand and to secure measures of effective reform.

THE Right Hon. James Bryce, the British Ambassador, was entertained last week by the Pilgrims in New York. The welcome was offered by Mr. Choate, and in his reply Mr. Bryce, speaking of international amity, said: "The more international friendship rises to the sense of human brotherhood, the more it feels how much better is peace than strife, and love than hatred, the wider will it extend the range of its beneficent influence. All great States are now at peace, and seem likely to continue so. Not one has anything to gain from a disturbance. There is not one of the great peoples but desires to keep the peace."

THE work of the first Transvaal Parliament, which was opened last week in Pretoria, is certain to be signalised by keen conflicts of opinion. The Progressive, or mineowners' party, is in a decided minority, but it is well organised and determined evidently to be a fighting minority. But, however this may be, the very ceremony of inaugurating a popular assembly in a country which is now a British Colony, and which so recently was a nation in arms against us, is a fact for which we may be proud as well as thankful. That has happened which few expected, and thus quickly Great Britain has made good its promise, and the Boers have magnanimously accepted the changed situation. It is a triumph of sincerity and a happy augury of the future.

NOT that all is to be easy work. On the contrary, there are many difficult and dangerous entanglements to be cleared. There is the Chinese question, which, however, we hope is only to be a temporary mischief. But even when the last of the indentured yellow labourers has returned to his native land there will remain the much larger problem of the attitude of the whites to the indigenous races. The African record in this matter is not one for boasting, and although the Boers seem to have been more successful in their dealings with the blacks than the English, there has always been much unnecessary harshness and an assumption of superiority beyond warrant or reason. In this business of the policy towards black labour the people of this country have only a modified voice and veto. But we would dare to hope that the dawning of the new day for the white may bring some fresh growth of wisdom and humanity in the treatment of the black people.

WHILE the Lancashire Congregational Union has been celebrating its centenary, many of the churches are, of course, much older than that, although the growth within the last hundred years has been great. In 1807, we learn from The British Congregationalist, there were 36 churches, with 14,000 sittings and 3,600 church members; there are now 343 churches, 170,000 sittings, and 45,000 members. But while in the beginning of the 18th century the churches were independent and isolated, they are now welded together in the consciousness of a corporate unity. In this respect they symbolise a change which is to be traced in all phases of the national life. The Rev. R. J. Campbell's sermon on "The Ministry of Reconciliation," in the Free Trade Hall, it will be remembered, was preached in connection with that centenary.

THE Laymen's Club has done a good thing in the gift of a Challenge Shield for annual gymnastic competition among teams from the London churches and missions. The first competition took place on Thursday evening, March 21, at Essex Hall, Mr. Harold Wade, President of the Club, presiding, and the judge being Mr. R. Castellotte, formerly of University College School. Four teams entered for the competition, from Essex Church, Limehouse, Mansford-street, and Stamford-street, and all showed capital promise, and did some admirable work. The exercises were on parallel bars and vaulting-horse, the set exercises being followed in each case with two voluntary ones, and then drill with dumbbells and Indian clubs, and simple physical drill. One had the opportunity of seeing how great a help it is when music accompanies the drill. The highest marks in any single section were gained by Mansford-street, but in the competition as a whole Essex Church was easily first, and at the close the Challenge Shield, which is a handsome piece of work in bronze and silver (by the Birmingham Guild of Handicraft), was handed to the leader of the team, to be held for the present year. Mansford-street was second, then Limehouse and Stamford-street. Both the President and Mr. Castellotte congratulated all the teams on their performance.

ERRATUM.—In last week's leader on "The New Theology," at the bottom of Col. 3, read: "When we use the term infinite, it does have an actual meaning for us, as that which is for ever and immeasurably beyond all our finite powers. God is not only immanent, but transcends the whole order of this universe, and our experience as spiritual beings simply is that we find ourselves with God in this world, compassed by His presence, held in His care."

THE RENEWAL OF LIFE.

AN EASTER MESSAGE.

"BEHOLD, I make all things new." This is one of the imperishable words of God written in all the bibles of the world. The seers, thinkers, and prophets of every race saw, and then they told to others what it was they had seen—that the work of God was a work of perpetual renewal. "Behold, I make all things new" was not a fiction shaped by them, it was a fact discovered; it was not a thing made or invented, it was a revelation given. To understand that revelation we want something more than the scholarship which can go back to the original text; we want the depth and sensitiveness of soul which can go back to the original experience out of which the text was born. Having such a soul, we look out to-day on the fields and hedgerows, and the word which came to Eastern sages comes to us: "Behold, I make all things new." The winter is over and gone, the night of snow and frost is far spent, and the resurrection dawn of nature spreads about us wherever we go. The trees feel the sap of spring stirring in their giant limbs, the grass takes on a brighter hue, the days rise on tip-toe full of expectation, and the miracle of Easter is upon us.

What a miracle it is! We do not need to go back through long weary years and vex our souls over ancient controversies, or force them to believe the thoughts of others. We need only stand where we are, and keep eye, hand, heart, and soul awake to see the resurrection. We see it now, and what we see is not what men have once imagined; but what God is now creating. The life which maketh all things new is the life of these days of early spring. There is, indeed, a resurrection speaking to us of the impossibility of death. There is winter, there is rest, there is sleep, but there is, and can be, no death. The opening buds of beech and hawthorn rebuke our faithlessness. The winter was not a grave, but a resting-place; the snow was not a shroud, but the mantle of the living God, and forth from skies of promise bursts the resurrection angel: "Behold, I make all things new."

There are men living among us, who sigh over the decay of ancient faiths, and weep because they are believed no longer. "If only," they say, "if only God would perform a miracle and disprove science once and forever, and shatter disbelief beyond all hope of recovery, all would be well." They see no miracle to-day, and so they cling with a fierce tenacity to the written miracles of by-gone centuries. It is, indeed, a pitiful spectacle. They want other men to believe in God, and the first thing they themselves do is to deny God's method and order. "Behold," says the Eternal, "I make all things new"; "but," they answer, "that is just the trouble, we don't want all things new, we want the old things, and the old thoughts, and the old ways." They have so strained their eyes to see the miracle that never was that they are blind to the miracle that now and forever is. Yet, how can they miss it? We look out this day on a world which has existed for millions of years, and there is not an old thing in it. The buds are new buds, the leaves are new leaves, the emerald garment that covereth the earth is a new garment, last year's birds' songs are not served up to us again—they are new songs; this spring day is utterly and completely new; it never was in the world before. The sod beneath our feet, the leaves that glisten to our right and left, the lark showering its notes over our head proclaim the gospel of Him that ever liveth.

The marvel is that we can see it all with an eye so accustomed as to be quite unmoved. We are actually beholding the creation of the world. The creation is not yonder yesterday, it is here to-day. Nothing happened of which the first chapters of Genesis speak which is not taking place now before our very eyes. In the bosom of the meadow, in the heart of the bird, in the freshness of the breeze, there is the thrill and palpitation of life that is new. The poets are not mad when their feeling and imagination take wing and soar and sing; it is we who are insensible. We say it is spring-time, and that is all; but they hear the morning stars singing together and the first-born of the sons of God shouting for joy. To our busyness and faithlessness, our blindness and pre-occupation, these deeper souls make their appeal: "Listen, listen, O children of earth, for it is God Himself who speaks: 'Behold, I make all things new.'"

The renewal of life is God's answer to our pessimism and despair. Elijah has done his work and now he must go on "to other heights in other lives"; but Elisha, stricken to the soul, follows as best he may, knowing full well the time is nigh. How gladly would he delay it, if he could; but that cannot be. There comes a point beyond which even Elisha cannot go. He can only look from afar and see the departing presence, while from his heart there breaks the intolerable cry, "O my father, my father, the chariots of Israel and the horsemen thereof!" The church or the nation loses its leader, his place is empty; and there is none to fill it. "Where," ask men in despair, "where can we find such another?" And they answer their own question: "It is impossible." They speak more truly than they know. Of such, indeed, there is no other. Special men are for special purposes: when the purpose is served, the men pass on. Their place never can be filled just in the same way as they filled it, and the glorious truth is, it was never meant to be. The order of God is not stale, stereotyped, conservative; other and quite different men shall arise with other ways, and other methods. "Behold, I make all things new."

The renewal of life is man's greatest and most imperative need. Our bodies are perpetually renewed, and no man can keep his body alive on the food of last week or last year. Much of our inner pain and sickness and suffering is because we try to do that with our higher life. We try to keep our souls alive on the thoughts of other men of other times, and the trial always ends in failure. Such thoughts were good and nourishing for those men in those times, but only living thoughts can feed and satisfy a living soul. The soul cannot live by proxy. Easter's deepest message is the renewal of our own inner life. If the stump in the hedge puts forth new buds and new shoots, shall the soul of man put forth no new energy, no new endeavour, no new aspiration? The soul cries out for God, the living God, the present God. Life, life, more life; newer, fresher, fuller life—this is our deepest need. Our souls can only live, as the stump in the hedge can only live, when faithful and obedient to the renewing life of God.

The renewal of life is of special significance to the church. Here, in the North, we are beginning at this season to hold the anniversaries of our Sunday-schools. They are the anniversaries of the children who come into the home, the school, the church, the world, renewing and revitalising as they come. There is little danger of our over-emphasising the place and the importance of the children in our church-life. It is true, they do not vote at our public meetings, nor do they add to the financial strength of our institutions. But they are the ever freshening current of all public life, the very life-blood of every living society. We can put into our yearly reports what we try to do for them; but can we ever tabulate in figures all that they actually do for us? In them we not merely live our own life over again, they give to us a totally new life, a life which, without them, we should never know. They give to us, as Wordsworth says, "forward looking thoughts"; they lift our eyes from the narrowness and the nearness of our own individual life to the larger, wider horizon of the future and the race. "Sing to me," said a great Scotch preacher as he lay dying, "sing to me a bairnie's hymn." It was a natural wish at such a moment. There is no death for the man who is born again and yet again, because at heart he is ever a child with a year or two of his life behind him, but with all of his life before. An ancient writer speaks of a city without a church, and that is possible, but a church without the child is simply unthinkable. However old the walls may be, let but the child be within them, and the church itself is very young. He enters its portals as his natural inheritance, and at his coming all things are new!

"The old order changeth," sang Tennyson, "giving place to new, and God fulfils Himself in many ways." Childhood is a new life, so is youth, so is manhood and woman; but there we stop, as though of a sudden the order of God was arrested or reversed. Why have we not the courage and the daring to say "And old age is also a new life," for is it not? Its ripened wisdom, its deepened experience, its sanity and its calm, these the youth never had, and never could have. "Come," says Browning, "grow old along with me, the best is yet to be." The seed is good and right, and fitting in its time, but so also is the ripened fruit. When men and women are in the atheistic mood, they speak of old age as "going down the hill." Now, that is impossible. The hills of God have all their summits pointing the one way, and that way is not downward, but upward. They who reach the top do not go down again, because they have been down there already, and God does not repeat Himself: "Behold, I make all things new." Rather, they go up higher, and what we call the shadow is the shadow of the Eternal as He stoops to kiss His child. The child after life's fitful fever, sleeps well, and there on the heights, he is awakened by the kiss of God, and to his astonished eyes "Behold, all things are new." MATTHEW R. SCOTT.

LENT, SPRING-TIME, & EASTER.

ALL through the later weeks of Lent the earth-folk and the air-folk have been telling of spring; while the good church-folk were fasting and doing penance, the out-of-door creatures have been making merry and making love. It is so every year; in the midst of Lent—the time of repenting, we are on the threshold of spring—the time of rejoicing. Every day the church bell has been tolling for prayers, and every day more birds have begun to build, more buds to break, more seeds to stir in the ground, while fields and woodlands glow with warmer tints of purple and brown and green.

Curious, and of deep significance, this contrast between the ceremonies of the Church and the "goings-on" of Nature—the one calling to penitence and confession, the other kindling with joy, and plunging into Easter festivities as if winter's fasting and freezing were penance enough. The difference seems to define itself somewhat sharply thus: The Church turns her thoughts to the past, recalling the sins of her children and the sufferings of her Lord; Nature is alive to the present, her face is toward the days to be and the work of creation still unaccomplished.

Yet the difference may be more apparent than real. For us, at any rate, whom no bondage of ecclesiastical custom holds, Lent may have been full of religious significance, albeit a time of promise and renewal, rather than of penance and confession. We cannot resist the contagion of Nature's wild joy, as she wakes from her winter's sleep and begins to weave again her wedding garments, and to sing the old love-songs with a new sweetness of phrasing and romance. We must needs take heart of hope with her, and, without waiting for Easter day, at once resolve to be better and happier than we have ever been before.

And, after all, this is what Lent really means to the serious and devout mind. It may have its anguish of regret for wrong that has been, its litanies of confession, its tears of repentant grief, but it means that we believe in being wiser and nobler than we ever were, that we wish and expect to be, that we demand this of ourselves and of one another. We know that regrets cannot alter that which was, that no tears can wash out the old follies and the old misdoings. But we believe that the irrevocable past need not doom or dominate the coming days, or prevent the good which is waiting to be achieved. Nay, it is just this good—this finer wisdom and nobleness, discerned as possible now—which shames the old bad past and makes us turn from it and leave it to bury its dead as best it may. It is that lovelier new life which now we mean to live, that makes the old look ugly and base, and worthy only of burial and the oblivion of the grave. In these Lenten days just gone, a child at school, hearing that it was usual, in the weeks before Easter, to give up something (to fast a little), and take pains to be better, resolved "not to buy so many sweets, and to write home more regularly." That, doubtless, was a piece of wise and wholesome penitence, not without promise of real reform. I suppose most people who abstain from meat on Fridays through the six weeks of Lent, and go to church every day, saying the old familiar prayers, are really turning away from the old follies, even while confessing them or fasting because of them! They have some vital fellowship with Nature thus, who is turning her back on the cold barrenness of winter and facing the delight and exuberance of spring.

And we who, perhaps, don't go to confession, nor fast religiously, are not therefore less disgusted with ourselves for being, thus far, such poor specimens of humanity. We are only taking the more cheerful view of things, and promising ourselves better success in the good life than any we have yet achieved. We are as serious as the most devout Catholic in our hatred of the spirit of evil which crucified the Christ of old and crucifies him afresh in our own bad hearts. Only we believe that he has risen again, and ever rises again, from the grave to which the world consigns him. We lay the emphasis there, and give to hope its right of appeal against the demand of the past to hold and enslave us by our own sins. And in this we are not only following the example of Nature, we are recovering that cheerful faith of Jesus, who said, "There is joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth (that changes his mind for the better), more than over ninety-and-nine just (self-righteous) persons who need no repentance."

It was springtime in the moral world when those brave words were spoken. The young prophet of Nazareth, with love triumphant in his heart, was opening the gates of new life to men. He was calling them away from the "winter of their discontent" into the sweet resurrection-time—the Easter days of renewal and rejoicing. "The poor have glad tidings preached to them," he said. The outcast and forlorn were bidden to the feast of life. Sinners were invited to the Father's house to join in the music and dancing there.

I saw the red stars on the hazel boughs the other day, and heard, from a moss-grown stump, the melody of the wren; and all the hope and promise, both of natural beauty and divine grace, were symbolised there, so that no longer to hope for myself and all my brothers seemed just a wilful waste of time.

Of course, there is no more reason for courage and hope in spring than in any other season. The world, which is our home, is not more truly alive then than during the rest of the year. On a clear cold winter's night the air will sometimes tingle with intense life; the stars pulsate with cosmic emotion, and beneath the frost, which is really very thin and all on the surface of things, the earth keeps warm her myriads of sleeping children—the seeds of flowers, the roots of trees, the eggs of beautiful insect life. The great energies of spirit, all the vital forces of God, are present and effective in the universe at all seasons and under all the moods of Nature and of human life. But here, in England, now, and for us, there is regeneration, and the visible outgoings of creative power. As the sun enters Aries, and spring really begins, a wave of new life seems to sweep over the land. It answers to the time when Love, which is so like the warm, great sun in the heavens, stirs in the human heart, and a surge of holy passion carries one out of oneself. We claim the right of sympathy with all that lives, and the soul radiates feeling on all sides, warming the whole world with the glow of its central fire.

For love, after all, is real life. The sun burns with love as his beams shoot forth through the wide circle of the heavens. Venus, the planet of love, the morning star of March and April, shines in the East at every dawn. The Christ, of every age, proclaims anew the gospel of love, and by its power triumphs over death and the grave. The great prophets of the soul have ever come with love's glad tidings in their heart, and love's music of hope on their lips. They denounce our evil-doing and spare us not, but they drown its terrors in the stream of their lovingkindness and tender grace. St. Francis puts off his gay apparel and clothes himself in a coarse robe, only to fall in love with every creature and proclaim love's joy to lords in their castles, to lepers in their dens, to birds and beasts in the wild woods. Love burns in the heart of Dante, as he carries you up from hell and purgatory, through all the regions of heaven, till you gaze with him on the "Light intellectual full of love."

Spring, then, like Easter, comes to remind us that life and love and joy are perennial and indestructible—to bid us chase away the glooms of fear and the squalor of selfishness—to thaw the frost of our callous, cold despair. All things are born again, as the great emotions stir in seed and flower and bird and beast, and the soul of man is thrilled with the wonder and passion of immortal dreams. The great Mother who gave him life, and nourishes him from her own breast, makes him feel anew the pulse of her mighty heart, till his own beats high with hope, and he turns to his fellow with a smile that has no bitterness and no disdain. Persephone comes back from the shades of the under-world, and Demeter meets the pale queen, her daughter, and brings again the colour to her cheek, as they wander hand-in-hand over the earth, and flowers spring up at the tread of their feet, and the children of men rejoice together.

"This is the time when bit by bit
The days begin to lengthen sweet,
And every minute gained is joy,
And love stirs in the heart of a boy.

This is the time the sun, of late
Content to lie abed till eight,
Lifts up betimes his sleepy head—
And love stirs in the heart of a maid.

This is the time we dock the night
Of a whole hour of candle-light;
When song of linnet and thrush is heard—
And love stirs in the heart of a bird.

This is the time when sword-blades green,
With gold and purple damascene,
Pierce the brown crocus-bed a-row—
And love stirs in a heart I know."*

And when, at close of Lent, Easter dawns, on the first day of the week, we know what it means. It is not a fiction of the mind, or a myth of the ancient days. It is the miracle of life's immortal energy.

*Katherine Tynan Hinkson.

It reminds us that, as the frost cannot kill the seeds or wither the green grass, so neither can the powers of hate and cruelty destroy the spirit of love in our human world. For Love is God, and cannot die. And the cry will go forth again, from age to age, and the sons of men shall hear it: "Awake, thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee life." For the Christ of history, and the Christ in our own hearts, is the imperishable power of love in the universe of God. Love is ever the lord of life, and whoso believeth in him and serveth him shall never die.

VITA NUOVA.

"THE tides of Blossom have begun to flow," as Fiona Macleod says in an unforgettable passage; "and with them," we may add, "the Easter-joy has come." The two things are associated with each other, for ever since the time when the Pagan festival in honour of the Goddess of Light and Spring was first instituted, on through the ages in which it became closely linked with a more mystical form of worship, the awakening of the woodlands has approximated to some divine impulse in the heart of man which has taken its place in the orthodox calendar of his religious emotions. "At Rome," says Professor Frazer in the Golden Bough, "the sacred fire in the temple of Vesta was kindled anew on the first of March, which used to be the beginning of the Roman year. Bonfires, lit from the flames thus originated by the priest on Easter eve, are still burned in many parts of Europe, notably in Germany." Later on, the heathen anniversary was incorporated among the "holy days" of the Christian Church; and now it is forgotten by many of those who associate Easter entirely with the doctrine of the physical resurrection of their Master, that the authority for the passion of rejoicing with which, at this time, the departure of winter is signalled, is not enshrined in any articles of belief whatsoever. It is found, rather, in the primitive instinct of man, which is the root from which his spiritual ideas have sprung; and its application is as universal as the operations of Nature herself. It thrilled the ancient Celt, when, awed by the mystery of sun and fire, he tremblingly named his god, Beltane, no less than it inspires the modern Catholic, who veils his natural belief in the indestructibility of life under the dogma of Christ's ascension from the dead. The ancient Greeks obeyed it when they wove their legends of Pan and Apollo, of Demeter and Proserpine; just as the Buddhist who to-day catches the rose-flush on the distant Himalayas responds to it, dreaming of that holy light which filled the world when Maya's son was born. And the most unlettered city toiler, who feels a sudden catch at the heart as he breathes the fragrance of violets heaped on a flower-stall in some crowded street—he, too, is kindled with the authentic spirit, the vita nuova, which we openly worship at Easter.

The doctrines of Divine Incarnation and Resurrection are eternally true, but in a sense which, even now, men are only dimly beginning to understand. And yet, year by year, in countries remote from each other, a wonderful uprising of life from the dead can be witnessed—the fern unfolding in decaying leaf-drifts, the bud disclosing its heart on the gnarled bough, the foam of snow-white bloom breaking along tangled hedgerows, the young grass waving its myriad blades of green in meadows that not long ago were rigid with frost. From the delicately-veined petals of the wood-sorrel, to the wand-like poplars with their golden leafage (which would seem, but for its freshness and transparency, to belong more to autumn than to spring), all the countless forms of life appear to be developing before men's eyes in order to stamp upon our thought the gospel of immortality. The cuckoo's clear, sharp call punctuates this glad evangel, and the blackbird's fluting notes give it rhythm and melody; while even the tiny gnats, weaving their dance with indescribably swift motions in the sunlit air, contribute their testimony to the faith that is in us. The fact that these things are not new in our experience, that thousands of artists have sought to paint the loveliness of April, that singers, ever since there were poets at all, have tried to enshrine it in hymns to Nature, makes no difference to the gladness with which we greet the first primrose and welcome the first swallow. The world, if we have eyes to see it, becomes more beautiful to us with every return of spring; and chiefly, one must think, because our hearts are always desiring fresh tokens of the life that cannot fail, and the beauty that doth not perish. The praise we give to health and vigour, cheerfulness and courage, is part of the same longing; for, in spite of the unearthly glamour which love and pity have thrown around sorrow and pain,

"'Tis life whereof our nerves are scant,
Oh, life, not death, for which we pant,
More life, and fuller, that we want."

More opportunities for endeavour, more freshness and frankness in our relations with men, more of the inner heat and radiant vitality which seem to be exhaled even from the little celandine, as she raises her starry crown to the sun.

There is something in the purity of the blossom on the thorn, in the satin-like texture of the petal of a buttercup, that abashes, and yet at the same time strengthens, the soul which is unenthralled by the triumphs of "material progress." So perfect are they, that no handiwork of man can ever rival them; and yet there is an impulse in our hearts allied to the passion of beauty that flows through these exquisite manifestations of life. It is said that even Robespierre was fond of wild flowers, and there is undoubtedly some moral hope for the meanest of God's creatures who is always touched by the sight of woodland blossoms, however fleetingly. The disillusioned remind us in vain that roses fade, and that leaves must wither; for ere that sorrowful ending, something, we feel, is born of both that does not and cannot pass away. And this "something" is not only the germ of life, the seed of fire, which the soil or the branch prudently withdraws from them to harvest for their successors next spring. It is, rather, an emotion, a thrill, that passes into the blood and brain, and helps to infuse our dormant energies with creative vitality. But for this, our hearts would fail us in the welter of selfish ambition that fills the world with pain, and we might be "even as those who have no hope," because they have looked only on the faces of sin and death. This is the secret of Easter-joy; and if it is objected by any that "instinctive nature-worship" is not enough to ensure man's spiritual evolution, one frankly admits that religion means much more than that. But, as Tolstoy says, "From whatever side I approach God, it will always be the same. The origin of my thoughts, my reason, is God. The origin of my love is also He. The origin of matter is He too."

LAURA G. ACKROYD.

LIFE, MORE ABUNDANT.

JOHN xix. 41.

IN the place where he was crucified there was a garden. Right within sight of the tragic hill Nature assumed her loveliest garb. As Christ bravely faced his doom, the fragrance of the flowers greeted him, and their beauty presented a fair sight, on which his slowly closing eyes could rest, and find escape from the flushed unfriendly faces of those who had cruelly compassed his end. And in this garden fair there was a sepulchre. The abode of death was surrounded by budding, blossoming life. A sombre tomb in a sun kissed garden. It is possible, however, to be so impressed by the presence of the former as to overlook the latter. Our eyes may be so tear dimmed by a sight of the sad symbol of death, as to be blind to the abounding life that encircles it. The radiant beauty may be overshadowed by the suggestion of decay. Easter comes to rescue us from this, by reminding us, not of the sepulchre only, but also of the garden. It says to us, in songs of hope, and words of glad inspiration, not "there is a sepulchre in the garden," as though that were the chief and one engrossing object, but "there is a garden round the tomb." The garden is vaster than the grave. And in it there is only one object that speaks of death, but many radiant evidences of life. The significance of this conjunction of life so fair and death so sombre, is that both are the result of laws that emanate from the same divine source. It is by the operation of the Creator's laws that the earth arrays herself in her flower-bedecked garment of living green. And death, whose presence darkens every sunrise, and saddens every sunset, is likewise a law established by the Creator. Death is not an abnormal thing. It is not a fortuitous calamity that befalls life. Nor is it a penalty due to the sin of a primitive ancestry. It is a universal law. It is as natural as birth. It is so in the garden. Death is no strange thing there, but the preparation for constant renewal, persistently eclipsed, forgotten, in the more abundant life that evermore springs out of it. "Except a grain of wheat fall into the earth and die, it abideth by itself alone; but if it die it beareth much fruit." Does not the law, whose issues are so gracious in the garden disclose to us the meaning and ministry of the law that dominates the grave? Is not one the divine prophecy of the other? Law makes for life "more life and fuller." It is a minister of good. There is not a single natural law in all the Universe, so far as we know, whose normal working is not beneficent. All order, beauty and progress in the universe, are the outcome of law. All good is law obeyed. All evil is law unknown or ignored. To perceive and pursue the trend of law is to find and follow the path, the light of which increaseth more and more, and conducts to

"The shining table lands,

Where God is both moon and sun."

Do not the grand results of the laws which have transformed a ball of fire into a world of consummate beauty, and evolved man with all his noble achievements and glorious possibilities from the beast, interpret for us the benign purpose of the law of death? Law cannot be less a minister of gracious progress here. What is so normal and universal as death must be good, cannot be evil.

"All's law, yet all's love."

As to the grain of wheat, so to the soul of man, it ministers to an ampler life. It will raise, not reverse life, emancipate and not annihilate.

Death's truer name

Is onward, no discordance in the roll,

And march in that eternal harmony

Whereto the Worlds beat time."

It has a place assigned to it, in the consummation of the "one increasing purpose that through the ages runs," by him who conceived that purpose. It can, therefore, be "but a stage in that long ascent of life that shall ascend through the ages of the ages." Life, therefore, is our glorious destiny; life, greatening and refining, evermore towards the divine ideal. And how immense the possibilities of all in whom the divine dwells. Vast are the issues; the "immanence of God" carries, boundless the hope it awakens, inspiring the assurance it gives. For He who has begun the good work by putting His spirit in man will perfect it.

"There shall never be one lost good—

On earth the broken arcs; in the heaven, a perfect round."

It is this joy-giving thought that Easter bids us consider. It calls us to behold the flowers the radiant prophets of death's gracious ministry surrounding the sepulchre. Death, the opener of the door to "more life and fuller" not the destroyer of life's aspirations, achievements and loves, that is the evangel of Easter. This is the form death has assumed to multitudes of noble souls. As they stood on the borderland "sudden the worst turned to the best." The clouds dispersed before the on-coming light. They saw the flowers that eclipsed the tomb. They realised that seeming loss was certain gain. They perceived that departure led to discovery. That as the issues of the laws that have enriched the life that now is, were not disclosed by heaven, but were discovered by man, so the glorious issues of the law of death are not revealed, but await the discoverer, and with the joyous expectancy of those who see hidden truths and treasures dawning upon them, they have passed hence. May something of the meaning and beneficence of this great law, suffuse our hearts this Eastertide, giving to our hopes new brightness, our spirits greater gladness, and to the eye of our faith that discernment that will enable us to see that the sepulchre is not in a desert drear, but in a garden fair and fragrant.

EASTER MEDITATIONS.

WE rejoice at the arrival of Easter, and we have enough at that time to remind us of a reason for gladness in religious sentiment; yet for many of us, Christians though we be, it is a case of being reminded of it, rather than of feeling for ourselves, the religious gladness proper to the season. The Christian sentiment is sufficiently universal to make us all glad that for some at least there is the definitely Christian ground for rejoicing; and all rejoice with those who do rejoice on that account; and all would feel their own loss if these were deprived of it. Yet it is the old pagan gladness at return of spring that occupies our hearts, more than the glad commemoration of the larger hope through Christ. The day may be earlier or later in different years to the extent of more than a month, and spring may actually come in advance of it, yet we commonly speak as if we recognised in Easter the gay beginning of the year's procession. The description of our gladness as "pagan," does not connote its unreligiousness; simply the limitation of our religious feeling. Delight in the restoration of Nature's vital energy might be merely instinctive; arising from consciousness, awakened by the sight of it, of restoration of the human soul. But Easter gladness even of the pagan kind, was more than that; it was religiously reflective. The return of spring was attributed to the action of a goddess, Eastre; so that the divine source of the season's happiness was duly recognised. Cheered by evidence of life renewed throughout external nature, exhilarated by the sympathetic sense of power to abide themselves, men thanked and praised the unseen Providence. But there the pagan hope and gladness stayed; whilst they should have a deeper and a broader happiness, who verily believe in Christ, seeing he came that they might have life more abundantly.

There is no gainsaying that the borders of Christendom have sometimes been extended by un-Christlike means, resulting in un-Christian consequences; but where, and whensoever, the Christian faith has made a rightful way, and gained sincere adherents, it has been by reason of its promise of the more abundant life; the way it has instantly opened to those who received it, for an expansion and enrichment of existence. The sense of life being filled to the full, and of the deepening of its significance to the uttermost, results in the hope of its eternity. That is a hope, which, strange to say, maketh some ashamed; it is almost needless to add, however, that with such it is but a narrow hope, or a hope not firmly held. In reality, it is but the inevitable conclusion from the conception of the importance in Divine judgment, as distinguished from the mere enjoyment according to human appreciation, of the course of the present life. It is the hope especially associated with Easter in the Christian mind, because it is by that festival that we commemorate the revelation to the apostles of the resurrection of their Lord. For veritable disciples of that Lord, there is the true reason for Easter joy, grounded in their faith. Nevertheless, their joyousness cannot but be touched with sadness, that the world is still so much, merely pagan, and not Christian. "We hoped that it was he that should redeem Israel," said two of the disciples mournfully on the first Easter day; they were contemplating the littleness of the visible effect of his life. "We hoped that it was he that should redeem the world," despondent disciples might say in like manner to-day, regarding the shallowness of the Christian influence upon the ranks of Christendom at large. Yet, if we thought it our possibility and duty to rouse ourselves from the lethargy of Christendom, how would we bring about the triumph of our Christ? How did Saint Patrick, the most fruitful of Christian missionaries, proceed? It was at the very season of Easter that he began his mission among the heathen of Tara. We are told that it was in ignorance rather than in defiance of the royal interdict of Laoghaire that he lit the paschal fire on the hill of Slane; but when we read, how he met the opposition of the royal pagan and his druids with imprecatory prayer and with citation of the imprecatory psalms, as magic incantations, we discern how unreal is the description of the secret of his success, and how far it was beyond the capacity of the chronicler to recount the true mysterious manner of Divine working through the human agent. The fruits of his labour may have appeared copiously and speedily, but save that they were due, in a general way, to the goodness of the man and the graciousness of God, who could have told the precise reasons why that fruit was borne where it was, and in such abundance; and who could have foretold it would be borne at all? It may be that even now the Kingdom of God is about to be realised on earth more completely than it ever has been hitherto, and we may at least rest assured, that, however insignificant our own past may be, its consummation will be advanced in proportion to the sincerity and constancy of our own prayers to that end, and the degree of our own fidelity in adhering to the ideal of conduct presented to our minds by Christ. The child who has often admired and marvelled at the massive clouds that cling to the crest of a mountain, is allured by the prospect of ascending for the first time to the height at which he has seen them, where he expects, when he has attained it, he will find himself in contact with a dense bank of cloud, itself appearing like a mobile mountain. Accordingly he begins the ascent; higher and higher he climbs; at length he thinks he must be within easy reach of the summit; though for a long while yet, another terrace comes into sight as soon as he has scaled the last; and now, of a sudden, the whole view, even of the near foreground is entirely hidden by something resembling steam, but of a milder temperature, hurrying past him at a great pace in the swift, driving breeze. He asks what it is, and is surprised to learn that it is the fine particles of the substance of the cloud itself. Now that he is in the midst of it, his admiration has gone; though he needs only to descend again and gaze at it from below to recognise its wonted majesty. In like manner if we could discern it from a distance with a seraph's eye, the prospect of Christendom, as it is at present, would appear more fair, than seen from within it as we see it now.

Hence at this Eastertide, let us partake of natural, or of pagan gladness in sweet returning spring; but let us deepen it with Christian faith. God's fingers have the wondrous skill to bring bright verdure out of dingy twigs, and brilliant flowerets from the dismal soil. He likewise has the power from dismal souls to bring forth golden deeds, and out of those long lost or seeming dead in sin, to bring forth life and good. EUSTACE THOMPSON.

CHRIST AND THE GREAT HOPE.

ACCORDING to a Christology which is now tending to pass away, our common human hope of immortality is based upon the bodily resurrection of Jesus. Let that be disproved, and lo! hope lies withered at its root. But the truth is quite otherwise. Our belief in the resurrection of Jesus, whether we regard it as physical or psychical, has its primal foundations in our common, almost universal, hope in our own immortality. The first glimmer of the hope comes not from without, but from within. It shines primarily, not from another's experiences, another's actions, but from the instinctive feeling out after life in one's own nature. It is often found in the heart of the veriest savage in whom thought and reflection have but just awakened. It was present in those disciple-chroniclers of the master's resurrection while yet they watched by their fishing nets or sat at the receipt of custom, in ignorance of his existence. The natural instinct of the heart of man is for life. And while in this lies man's grand testimony to the inherent goodness of the life that now is—a goodness often obscured—it is also no weak link in the chain of evidence for the reality of a life to come.

But though the immortal hope has its strong foundation within, it may be weakened or strengthened by circumstances without. Of the things that strengthen and confirm none are greater than the death of the good, whose days have been filled with usefulness, who have passed beyond the veil in the very heyday of their service for humanity, and when—their minds stored with great thoughts, glowing with noble ideas—they have been most ripe for moral and spiritual conquests. As one of our hymnists sings,

"I cannot think of them as dead

Who walk with me no more."

And if they have truly walked with us, their lives in harmony with all that makes life sweet and desirable, then their utter destruction is an unthinkable thing. Both reason and affection now join forces to strengthen our natural desire for life into a sure and certain hope. "I know transplanted human worth will bloom to profit elsewhere."

And, in a supreme measure, Jesus in his death—the final sacrifice of a sacrificing life—gives that confirmation to our hope. In a real, deep sense, in him is our hope of immortality. During his active ministry, he gave the world confidence in its instinctive desire for life eternal by his teaching. More than most men, he trusted this deeper longing of the heart; trusted it as God's revealing of the things prepared for his children, and while he lived his own life as under the light of eternity, he taught his brethren, with no uncertain voice, the truth of immortality, leaving them with the message "In my Father's house are many mansions, if it were not so I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you." But more than his teaching it is the death of Jesus—following on a life so purposeful and noble—that strengthens the hope that is in us. Dying with a faith so deep, a heart so full of goodness, a mind so pregnant with unspoken thoughts of truth and beauty, he impels belief in the life to come as the only possible key to the mystery. Never before had his disciples been so convinced of the future life as when they could no longer see the master they loved and who loved them. Love wrought with their natural leaning toward the immortal hope, and out of the union arose that conviction of the risen Lord, the intensity of which—rather than the character—is seen in the material accounts of the resurrection handed down to us. Small wonder that the disciples spoke of the stone being rolled away from the tomb. It had rolled away from their own hearts. Small wonder, too, that they spoke of the empty sepulchre. The body that lay there was not their master, whose living spirit had passed out into the world of light and service. And if they spoke of meeting him in the garden, was it not the expression of that new-found conviction of their hearts that he was the living master, whose presence might be met with in every duty, in every path of their feet?

Such is the relationship of Jesus to our hope in the life immortal. With its base deep in our own nature, so that no changing theories of the method of resurrection can shake it, our hope is strengthened as we look upon the cross, where youth and promise, and unrealised possibilities of good, and spiritual vitality are crucified. Before this scene we are less able to think of the grave as the end of all, more ready to trust the longings after life in our own hearts. Though the tragedy of the Cross and all the sin of the world, may oppress us, and cloud the immortal hope, the Christ that hangs upon the Cross, and the innocence which persists in the world, despite the sin, is the "shape of beauty" which "moves away the pall from our dark spirits." Good Friday, with its gloomy memories, is naturally followed by Easter thoughts of resurrection into life. The note of the tragic day is that "In the midst of life we are in death." But that note changes at this time to one of joyful hope "In the midst of death we are in life," and the vision of the Crucified is replaced with that of the Risen Lord.

W. G. PRICE.

THE RISEN LIFE.

"We hoped that it was he which should redeem Israel" may be taken as the natural expression of dejection and disappointment among the disciples of Jesus, when he was removed from them—dead and buried—and they, as sheep without a shepherd, were scattered. But soon the consciousness arose among them that Jesus was not dead, whatever had been done with his mortal body, that he was still alive, and their leader.

The more powerful and beneficent we find any personality, the less can we realise any idea of its extinction. Not only is such a conception contrary to all our modern ideas of conservation of energy and persistence of force, but to us, and to the people of nineteen centuries ago, who had not these ideas as we have them, a supremely good, and loving and beautiful character promised life more abundant and life unending.

Jesus could not be dead; Jesus was not dead; whatever outward changes and failures must be recognised.

And then they felt the love and power of his continued presence with them, and went on their way doing the work and saying the words that the Holy Spirit taught them, in the confidence that their loved master was with them.

However valuable arguments for immortality may be, founded on science and logical inference—and they are valuable—to satisfy the God-given reason of man and show us the unity of man with himself and man with God, yet the confidence in personal immortality rests on our experience of personality.

A little child may lead us into the unseen reality, into the kingdom that is spiritually discerned. I look into the face of an old man, heavenly wise through his life-long effort to do good in charity with all men, and I feel that he is fading away from the body, but living for ever. I see the vigorous and chivalric warrior of peaceful reform in the meridian strength of his unselfish devotion and feel that here is a power in the universe not to be quenched by the germs of a disease or the wearing out of his body. I hear of the heroic deeds of sea-faring men or other workers in the hour of sudden and terrible danger, and feel that these men are greater than the accidents that may drown or starve them, and shall live on.

All strong human affection has in it the promise of its own continuance, purification, and fuller realisation, and therewith of immortality. The intense love of Jesus in his followers of old time and now, assures them that they will live with him; and above all, and in all, the feeling of God's presence with us is immortality, eternal life, now and here, and for ever.

The leader and teacher who showed men and women the way to the Father, and awakened in them the consciousness of his presence while as a man he lived with them, cannot be less than he was then in the power of the spirit. Whatever other worlds there may be, he loved and served the people of this world, and came to establish here a kingdom of God. That work is not finished, though the earthly life-time came to a close. Is he not still among us, continuing the salvation of the world? It is the living Christ in whom we believe if our Christian belief has power. Not merely a good life lived and ended by an execution followed by a burial. He is not there. He is risen. But he is not risen above the love and sympathy with which he sorrowed and yearned over the foolishness and oppression and blindness of men, pitied their suffering and shared it, loved the whole of humanity, the worst and least and wisest, and the ordinary mortals, none common-place to him, each and all. There is no rising above such love and sympathy unless by banishing the need for any part of them.

The divine soul, the man of human sorrows and immortal joys, is still needed, and with the great crowd of witnesses who have fought the good fight, can hardly be indifferent spectator of our efforts. It may be that the saints are at rest, resting in the assurance of the love of God, and the beneficence of the providence by which, in a measure, men work out their own salvation, and so develop real virtue and character not mere empty innocence that has done nothing. Activity of the kind we know may not be theirs. But, in the life of the spirit, watchful affection and the raising of godly ideals are the greatest help. God's unseen angels may be the men and women and children who served him on earth. Discernment of them and comradeship with them for us may be impossible, unless we so enter into the life of the spirit that the world is seen as the shadow of reality, and is subdued and held only for its significance to eternal life. But though unseen and unrecognised by us, the influence of Jesus and the communion of saints is not, therefore, non-existent in the great world movements and the regenerated lives of individuals.

Jesus lives. This means that the divinity in men is real and lasting, that no good effort fails, that no kind thoughts and beautiful imaginations are in vain, that love is not lost, that "we always may be what we might have been," and that far off unrealised ideals of human brotherhood and goodwill are stronger than all the opposition of covetousness, ignorance, and pride. Herein, is "the power of his resurrection."

AN EASTER CAROL.

FAR on the hills of Galilee

I saw a wondrous thing—

The burning red anemone,

The jewel-flower of spring;

Upon the hills of Galilee

My heart began to sing.

I smiled to see the lilies grow

So beautiful and free,

Afar shone Hermon, crown'd with snow,

Afar the azure sea;

I smiled to see the lilies grow,

The lilies smiled with me.

I walk'd the fields where Jesus trod,

Where Jesus used to pray,

The beauty of the living God

Lay on the land that day;

I walk'd the fields where Jesus trod—

He seem'd not far away.

So lovely were the flowers of spring

They could not smile in vain,

They brought me love, the loveliest thing,

O'er shining death and pain;

So lovely were the flowers of spring

I sang for joy again.

And now before the roses blow

To crown the perfect year,

A happy pilgrim forth I go

The songs of heaven to hear,

For e'en before the roses blow

I know that they are near.

BLUE CAPS.

ONE afternoon late in March, near the time of sunset, two tiny birds perched on the garden wall. They were weary with the long, long journey from their winter home, but oh, how glad to have arrived at the old garden, and to see all looking as peaceful and pleasant as when they left it.

"Zit, zit, tzitee, Chica, chica, chee!"

they sang as soon as they had got their breath. It was their way of talking, you know, and letting the world know they were there. Their pretty, bright blue caps gleamed in the sunshine.

As they preened and arranged their feathers, a rook flew near, with a stick in his beak for the house repairing. He had sufficient presence of mind to give them no greeting, but as soon as the stick was laid in its place, he spread the news that the chicas were come back, and led the "Cawrus"—"Caw caw, caw!" A fine noise there was in the elm-tree tops.

"Chica, chee,
Thank ye!
Glad are we Home to be."

chirruped the blue caps, who by this time were finding supper among the black currant bushes, and feeling livelier every minute. "Now let us go and see our old house." And they flew up to the crevice in the tree trunk, which had been their front door, year after year, for ever so long. "All right," sang Chicapa, "here we are again." "It wants a lot of mending," sighed Chicama, as she crept into the ante-chamber, and saw how its walls had fallen in. Those smooth walls had been so perfect last summer. "Oh, we'll soon get it right; it is no worse than it has often been before, Chicama. We have flown far and are tired; you will feel quite cheerful after a night's rest." So the travellers cuddled together in their little round room and were soon fast asleep.

The sun was high when they awoke, popped out of doors, and flew to the stone basin in the middle of the grass plot for a bath. Robin Redbreast, gay and jaunty, was singing in his cheery fashion from the top of the old hawthorn tree, and he told Chicapa and Chicama how the winter had passed in the old garden. How cold it had been when the snow came, and the icicles hung from the eaves in long glittering spears; how he and his family must have died if the people who lived in the house had not given them food on a table, lifted high above the white ground, but now—

"Forget, forget, the sad days past,
Springtime, sweet, is drawing nearer,
An end to sorrow comes at last,
After showers the sky is clearer."

and he shook out his feathers, and lifted up his voice and faced the sunshine.

"You have not seen anything yet of our friends the Chees, I suppose?" asked Chicapa. "Poor things!" sighed Chicama. The Chees were another pair of tomtits about whom there is a sad story to tell. They had built their nest in a crack in the wall of the shed. Cheema had laid eight wee eggs, and the eight wee eggs had turned into eight wee birdlings. Food was scarce that May, and Cheema and Cheepa had to go far to get enough for their hungry brood. Alas! returning from one of their journeys, what did they see? The old white cat stealing away, the nest half pulled out of the crack, four miserable baby birdies entangled in the ruins, and the other four gone! The cat only could have told what had become of them. Cheema and Cheepa did what they could. They dragged the nest back to its place, extricated their little ones, and restored order in some degree; but it was a sad summer for them all, and no wonder kind Chicama said "Poor things!" as she thought of them. "I wonder whether they will come back, Chicapa." It was a strange thing, but they did come back that very day. The Chicas were laying their blue heads together, and considering their plans for the summer, when suddenly through the orchard boughs flashed two other blue heads—Cheepa and Cheema themselves. Where had they come from? Where had they been? What could they do for them? Much more, I ween, did these little birds say, in their own patent way.

Where should they build this time? That was the important question. Carefully did they survey the ground, and weigh advantages and disadvantages; and first they thought of a snug hole in the roof tiles, and then Cheema fancied the hollow at the top of the pump, or a corner under the eaves close by the untenanted house of a swallow. But at last they agreed on a quite safe situation, though neither they nor the Chicas had ever heard of the like of it being chosen before for a house. This was it:—On the top of the garden wall, nearly hidden by ivy they found it; a ready-made, beautiful house. A narrow passage, only just wide enough for entrance, led to a long chamber, dimly visible in the golden brown light that came through its walls. A few threads of hair and bits of moss had been blown in by some lucky wind, "quite a good beginning for our nest, and almost enough"—and the little wanderers took possession that very night. It was well they did, for with the darkness came the rain. It splashed in among the ivy leaves, but there, safe, without a wet feather, in their bottle house, lay the wise little pair of tomtits.

* * * * *

And presently, after a few weeks of the sweet spring weather—sunshine and shower and blowing airs—above the blue forget-me-nots, and under the blue skies, happy blue-cap birdlings flitted and flashed like winged blossoms, and added their share of gladness to the glad old world.

A NOTE OF EXPLANATION.

SIR,—Will you allow me, though rather late in the day, to correct a misapprehension on the part of your correspondent, Ellen C. McKee, who mistakes me for my sister, Louisa Drewry?

Allow me also to thank your correspondent for setting me right as to the work being done towards regaining the municipal and educational vote for women, which I imagined to be of much more recent date than she indicates.

AN EASTER PARABLE.

OUR Easter number is enriched by words of faith and gladness in the great festival of the renewal of life and the abiding things of the spirit. To what our friends have written we propose here to add a further word, gathered from that story of Liverpool life, "Sir Galahad of the Slums," by the Rev. J. L. HAICH, of which we wrote last week. Both from the experience of the young minister who gave himself to the service of the poor in the most neglected quarter of the great city and from the life of the dock-labourer, who is the "Sir Galahad" of the story, we may gather lessons which go to the heart of the Christian Gospel and its great word of triumph over death.

We read, at the beginning of the story, of how the young minister, while still a student at Oxford, was led to that special dedication of his life to the service of the poor. He had found there a friend, who, as he relates, "compelled me to turn with him to the beginning of Christianity, and made me see the SON OF MAN—the peasant-poet, as he called him—walking about the streets and hills of Nazareth, talking to the children and the youths and maidens, and going about doing good, because in that he found the very ecstasy of his being. And so he led me to understand that it is the love of life, as we have it is CHRIST, which is the secret of all true reformation. . . . This good man made me alter my life. I now believe in CHRIST, and CHRIST only, as the means of our salvation. The secret of CHRIST is the strength of scholarship. And so I gave myself up to his service, and have taken the preaching of his Gospel among the poor as my life-task."

Then, as we follow the experience of his ministry, we see the growing insight and the stronger hold upon a definite purpose of helpful service:—"As the lives of the people to whom he gave himself with increasing consecration and devotion, opened out day by day before VERNON CARRUTHERS, he came to the conclusion that the secret of success in making the highest influence effective was that which compelled a man to thrust himself forward with all his force of character, made strong with the righteous intention of CHRIST, into the turbid stream of the people's existence. To catch these stagnant souls as in a mighty flood of health and purity, and sweep them on beneath the glorious gladness of the Gospel of salvation—that was the wonder and the miracle of life. The prerogative of the Sons of Light was the commanding 'Thou shalt.' The autocracy of the Spirit made life an ecstasy."

A parable of the confluence of the Rhone and the Arve below Geneva serves to emphasise that truth of the resistless power of the Spirit of God, which must conquer in the end, and then we are told of letters which CARRUTHERS wrote at that time to his friend, Professor CARTER, at Oxford, "which indicated the growth of the young pastor's mind in charity, grace, and sympathy. The warmth of intimate contact and appreciation was taking the place of cold external criticism. VERNON was seen by the Professor seated by the poor man's fireside, laughing and playing with his children, talking with the elder sons in open-hearted comradeship, listening to the father as he took his evening meal and spoke about the river, docks, ships, cotton, oil, fruit, horses and waggons, men and masters. VERNON made some wonderful homelike pictures, in which the Professor was brought into imaginary contact with the habits and customs, the fashions, the work and interests and pleasures of the people. He saw the men, the dockers, carters, warehousemen, boiler-makers, salt-sellers, and rag-men. He saw the women, the wives, shop-girls, cigar-makers, fish-girls, chip-girls, the basket-women with the heavy burden of skirts upon their hips and the great load of firewood on their heads; and he felt that his favourite student had entered into a new and strange world in which he found the human heart as ready to respond to the "categorical imperative" of righteousness as it was in the world of culture, cleanliness, and peace."

One urgent need of the people he saw to be cleanliness, not only of personal habit, but cleanliness in the food, provided alike for body and mind. The cheap literature which was most popular was grossly vulgar. There was no wholesome atmosphere. "Manliness was held in scorn, and innocence was trampled in the mire."

"Spiritually, as he had pointed out before, a grand, joyful renaissance of power and purity was needed. Religion required the simple living touch of the CHRIST to make it move and prove acceptable. People could not be saved in the mass, the force must run on from individual to individual. When a man met a worthy friend, he met a spiritual saviour. The secret seemed to be for the strong, happy, determined ones to come into the lives of the weaker and more unfortunate, with the charm and authority of an embodied conscience. 'The word was made flesh and dwelt amongst us,' attractive and warm as the sun, severe and sharp as frost, impetuous as a mighty wind. In these and similar strains VERNON frequently wrote to his Oxford friend, who wondered and philosophised, and asked for more."

And then, much later in the story, through the eyes of love, CARRUTHERS sees further into the meaning of his work:—

"She refreshed him even when she told him that he was needlessly weary and discouraged in his work—she could feel it in his letters. And then, through her sweet eyes of faith, he would again see the glorious end of his labours shining like a bright light far down the avenue of common efforts, ways, and means. The reward in promise never reached its high fulfilment in this world. The mysterious charm of love was his through her swift skill in speech; her subtlety of thought revealed more clearly her transparency of heart. Her love was suffused and alive with woman's wisdom and quick sympathy—deep, true, and all-embracing.

"Through her the spirit of Oxford entered more and more into his life; the spirit of fearless research, calm investigation, and high culture, the desire to acknowledge the best and readjust the worst, the feeling that every aspect of life has its own peculiar value, and that every man possesses the noblesse oblige of honour and truth, which, in its very essence, its justice and mercy, is the call of the CHRIST. This manifests itself in that self-discipline and delight which make the joy of the day, so that the laws of God are shown in the ways of the world, compelling pride to free itself by the exercise of that generous piety which finds its home wherever it abounds. The earth is not for the few, but for the family. RUSKIN at his best and PATER at the heart of him both mean the same; their message is fitness made fine by service, and service made wise through love. The call of the sinner, the demand of the miserable, is for the saint and the Saviour, for the strongest, wisest, and holiest Son of God; and civilisation will always be selfish, brutal, and chaotic until that cry is answered. 'To seek and save that which is lost,' lost in body, mind, and heart, that is the cry to which Oxford must respond."

And their ideal they found in JIM STEPHENS, the dock-labourer, with "the touch of absolute simplicity, strength, purity, which commands the hearts of men." He was not a religious man in any conventional sense, and had no church connection; but he was the truest man, the most honourable, the most unselfish that CARRUTHERS met with in the whole range of his work, and when he died—swept into the dock on the morning of a fearful storm—there was only one text which the young minister could take as the most fitting for his memorial sermon—"Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." And before that we read of the last scene in the man's home and at the funeral:—

"How noble he looked! How serene and certain in his quietness! The majesty of life was there with the solemnity of death. A knight of labour was lying in state. All was well! Hundreds of workmen from the docks came to see him during the Saturday afternoon and evening, while VERNON and poor Mother FLANNAGAN were in charge. The men passed in and out speechless. Many of them placed their hands on the dead man's forehead and broke into irrepressible sobs, and then left suddenly, ashamed and yet not ashamed that others witnessed their unaccustomed grief. Hour after hour this continued, and no one was denied his last look at the man who had been so strong and so true.

"In the chapel he read the solemn words slowly, and with many pauses between the sentences, during which his heart cried for strength and self-command. The silence and expectancy almost overpowered him. He felt that every man was waiting for the word of eternal life and hope. He must utter it with certainty, with the calm, triumphant ring of personal conviction. In prayer he found the assurance of his faith. God was the God of the living; all souls were His for ever. The heart of man poured itself forth in gratitude to the FATHER for the great blessing bestowed upon mankind in the lives of the true, the brave, and tender, in all ages, and in our present day. Strength and peace came to VERNON, and at the graveside, amid the hush of the multitude, he felt he had touched the hope of immortality in every heart around him."

At night the mission-room was crowded, when he spoke again of his friend, describing his simplicity and nobleness—"a common working man," but one to be remembered with JESUS of Nazareth, one whose character was an inspiration.

"You know him, and I know him, a prince among men, who lived his life in dark and lowly places, unrecognised, unknown. We are of his family, and so I dare to speak of him in honour, praise, and reverence.

"His strength was as the strength of ten, Because his heart was pure."

Take those words as the sum total of all I have to tell."

A CHRISTIAN should never plead spirituality for being a sloven. If he be but a shoe-cleaner, he should be the best in the parish.

THE ROCK OF CASHEL.

WHEN Christ said, "There shall not be left one stone upon another, that shall not be cast down," his words were not intended to carry with them any reproach against those who had built the Temple and adorned it with goodly stones and offerings. It was but a little while since Christ had spoken of it as the house of prayer, and had driven from its courts those who were profaning the sacred precincts by a dishonest traffic. He had commended the widow who cast into the treasury all the living that she had; and we may be sure he would have no hard thoughts of those who sought to make the house of God beautiful with wealth of ornament and perfection of workmanship. It was in sadness, not in condemnation, that he looked at the stately courts and beautiful gates as he passed through the wide outer precincts; the thought in his mind was not the human folly in rearing so stately an edifice, so sure to perish, but he thought of the certain fate that waits on all human effort to confine the spirit of worship to one spot, however sacred that spot may be. "The hour cometh, and even now is, when neither in this mountain, nor yet in Jerusalem, shall ye worship the Father." Even of this great building, though its walls were of massive stone, and its foundations dug deep in the rock, there should not be left one stone upon another.

These words of Christ were haunting me once in Ireland, as I looked at a group of ruins whose walls had once held worshipping throngs. It was on the Rock of Cashel, that great mass of limestone rising from the fair green plain of Tipperary. All that green and fertile country is dotted with the ruins of what were once houses of prayer, but there is nothing, even in Ireland, the Isle of Saints, to compare with the ruins which crown the Rock of Cashel. But that day, my thoughts were not on the beauty of the scene, when I looked over the Golden Vale, as they call this valley, nor on the ages of storm and discord to which these grey walls bore silent witness. It was rather the lines in the Adonais, where the poet tells us how the one Spirit's plastic stress sweeps through the world, compelling each succeeding age to shape the dull dense dross into forms of beauty, expressing as best they may, that Divine beauty of which all earthly beauty is but the foreshadowing.

No historian can tell for how many centuries men have worshipped on the Rock of Cashel. The oldest monument on it is a rough mass of stone on which strange carvings can still be traced. It was a Druid altar. Here, as in ancient Israel, men resorted for worship to the "high places," perhaps with the childish thought that these few hundred feet of rock would bring him nearer to that sky whose blue depths hid the glory of the Divine abode. Childish thoughts were natural in that far-off childhood of the world, and we need hardly wonder at the instinct which prompted humanity to build its altar on the mountain or on the lofty rock, making Nature itself supply the pedestal for the altar, the first step in the stairway which should reach to the gates of Heaven. All over the Western world are to be found these altars, on mountain side or on wild moor, raised no one knows when or how, but all bearing witness to the truth of that saying, "He hath made every nation of men that they should seek after God, if haply they might find Him." Somehow, the men of this forgotten age raised this mass of stone on the Rock, carved on it strange symbols of circles and squares whose meaning we cannot guess, and then passed away, leaving only this stone as a testimony that they, too, believed in a God who had made the world and all things that dwell therein. A new worship came to the vale of Tipperary which was destined to transform the wild tribes who had knelt round the Druid stone on the Rock, though, in truth, it was many ages before the new message of peace and goodwill began to work its way into the hearts of the people. Christianity supplanted the old pagan worship, and characteristically raised its first monument on the very stone which had served the Druid priest as an altar. We rise on stepping stones of our dead selves to higher things, Tennyson said; perhaps it is also true that the religions of the world form a great stairway, one rising on another each forming a foundation for something higher than itself, so that at last, humanity shall climb, though with lame hands and bleeding feet, up the great world's altar stairs, which lead through darkness up to God. So the first Christian teachers who came to the Rock of Cashel planted the crucifix on what had been the pagan altar, and a little later carved roughly a statue of their loved teacher Patrick on the other, side of the crucifix. The figures of the Crucified One and of the shepherd lad who had brought the good tidings to a heathen land looked down on the first Christian worshippers for many a year, until the growing strength of the new faith made men think it possible to raise a house of prayer to the God whom Christ had revealed and whom Patrick had preached. So the first tiny church was built, a quaint edifice with high pitched stone roof and adorned with all manner of curious carvings, telling of an age when time and labour as well as money were lavished on the house of God. Very perfect is the little chapel still, and if King Cormac of Munster, who built it 1,100 years ago, could see it now, he would rejoice that he had builded better than he knew. But though the quaint and richly carved arches of the door, and the many curious and beautiful carvings that adorn the walls, may interest the antiquarian, the little church is dwarfed by the proud building against which it stands. For three hundred years after the King who built the first little chapel, another King of Munster, bearing the same name, and belonging to the same race, built a beautiful and stately cathedral, which is still the crowning glory of the Rock. It stands roofless now; the only organ note is sounded by the wind, as it blows through ruined window and lofty aisle, the throng of reverent worshippers is represented by wondering or careless tourists. No sufferer comes now to gaze through the little window pierced in the solid wall, so that any whom sickness kept outside the building might yet gaze upon the mystic ceremony of the Mass. "Behold, your house is left unto you desolate," that might be the text writ large upon the bare walls of the Cathedral of Cashel.

And yet is there only sadness in this group of ruins, which in their time were revered as holy places? Should we not rather think of another saying, "Build thee more lofty mansions, O my soul!" Each age builds its temple to the God whom it ignorantly worships; the temple may be as that of Jerusalem, beautiful with all manner of precious stones and rich adornments, or it may be like those on the Acropolis wonders of the world for beauty of design and perfection of workmanship; or it may be like the little chapel on the Rock of Cashel, beautiful only through the love and labour lavished on it, but in any case, it represents a human striving after the Divine, a human effort to honour the Highest of which it can conceive. The altar raised by one generation may not serve the need of another, for the forms of worship change from age to age. Christ could not be worshipped at the altar where the Druid priest had sacrificed to his gods; but though the new wine must ever be poured into new wine skins, this change should have no sadness in it. True it is that the temple raised by man's hand may be destroyed, but there is a living spirit of worship in the human heart which will surely build another and a loftier house of prayer.

One of our modern poets in an Indian legend tells how the single human soul passes through many incarnations, in one life being in the body of a savage, in another in that of a street beggar, in another in that of a prince, and so on. In each life the soul makes an image of the unknown God whom some instinct bids him worship, and raises an altar in His honour. At last the soul, being delivered from the round of changing incarnations, passes into the state of final blessedness, and attains to full knowledge of the Divine. Then the Lord whom he has ever worshipped in all his different lives shows to him all the images he has made. Some are strange and hideous, some as fair as human skill could make them, but all seem now grotesque monsters to the soul which has seen the Beatific Vision of the Lord in His beauty. The soul is ashamed to see under what strange disguises he had represented the Lord of Life, but the Lord bids him feel no shame. Had he not raised these altars, he would never have attained to his present state of blessedness, for it was the spirit of worship which kept the soul alive, and guided it through life after life, until at last perfection was reached.

There is a meaning in this legend for ourselves. I feel no sadness in the thought that the altar which served the need of an earlier generation does not help us to-day, and is left to fall into ruin. Religion is not made for the altar, but the altar is raised as an expression of the religion; and as the human spirit grows in knowledge and in wisdom, it must raise altars of nobler and nobler proportions, until to the rough hewn stone succeeds the lofty cathedral. And even the cathedral will surely fall into ruin, as we slowly outgrow that need for elaborate form and ceremony and ritual, which once drew thousands to these precincts. God is a spirit, and those who worship Him must do so in spirit and in truth, and with the growth of this spiritual worship must needs come the decay of the idea which regarded Mass and ritual as the only way of approach to the Divine. But woe be unto us, if with increasing knowledge comes no increase of reverence, and if we content ourselves with amused wonder at the quaint altars of earlier ages, while we build none of our own. Let us take heed, lest on us come the curse,

When the soul, mounting higher,
To God comes no nigher;
When the soul, growing clearer,
Sees God no nearer,
But the arch-fiend Pride
Mounts at her side,
Changing the pure emotion
Of her high devotion
To a skin-deep sense
Of her own eloquence;
Strong to deceive, strong to ensnare.

This was the fate which had overtaken the Scribes and Pharisees in the days of Christ. They could not conceive of no revelation higher than that which had been granted to them, of no knowledge greater than that to which they held the key. They could have no clearer vision of God, or nearer approach to Him, because they were too proud of the position which they held, and the height of righteousness which they thought was theirs. It is the fate which will overtake ourselves unless we feed the altar-fires of worship in our own souls. Browning speaks of the "stoop of the soul which in bending upraises it," and unless we can stoop in reverence before a great ideal we can never rise to any high thought or noble action. Perhaps this may be part of the meaning hidden in those wonderful words of Christ "he who would find his soul must lose it." Perhaps he meant that unless we can lose all thought of ourselves in reverence and worship we shall never reach the highest possibilities of our own nature. If we simply gaze with calm self-satisfaction at the ruined temples of former ages, thanking God that we are not as those benighted souls who bent before carven crucifix or sacred wafer, then we might ask ourselves whether indeed we have done as well as they. That mistake by which the translators of the Authorised Version made St. Paul tell the Athenians they were "too superstitious," may be responsible for some of this self-satisfaction. The true rendering is that of the margin of the Revised Version, "I see that in all things ye are very religious." It is not superstition to raise an altar to that God whom we can never fully know, but in whom we live and move and have our being. We know that in time the altar may be cast down, so that not one stone be left upon another, but what does that matter if it has truly been a stone of sacrifice, a step in the ladder reaching from earth to heaven? It is not sadness, nor self-satisfaction, that should be uppermost in our mind as we leave the ruins of what were once shrines of prayer, but a great hope, a calm trust. We trust in the God who made all generations of men to seek after Him, it haply they might find Him. The Druid priest sacrificed to Him on that rough stone; the great Apostle of Catholicism perhaps stood on that very stone to preach the glad tidings to the people crowding round on the green level grass. Each worshipped God in their own way. The lesson for us is to take heed that we worship, too, though in differing manner, and with other forms, but with as sincere a heart. The God who inspired them in their dumb blind seeking after Him is in our hearts, too, and if we have a wider knowledge and a higher faith than theirs, the greater is our responsibility. Much has been given to us in these latter days; let us take heed that we give at least as much in our measure as did the faithful souls of a by-gone time and a forgotten past.

DORA MELLONE.

UNITARIAN HOME MISSIONARY COLLEGE.

A MEETING was held last week by invitation of Mrs. F. W. Kitson in her drawing-room at Burley Hill, Leeds. There was a good attendance, including the Revs. J. Fox, J. Ellis, W. R. Shanks, and the speakers named below. The chair was taken by the President, Mr. Grosvenor Talbot. The deputation from the College consisted of the Principal (Rev. A. Gordon), the Chairman (Col. Pilcher), and the Rev. C. Peach. The Chairman explained that the object of the meeting was to enlarge the active interest of the friends of the Home Missionary College in its affairs, and particularly in its recent developments at Summerville. The members of the deputation also spoke of various aspects of the work of the College, and appealed for help in the completion of the Jubilee Memorial Fund, which is still £3,000 short of the £20,000 asked for.

The Rev. P. H. WICKSTEED gave a short address, in the course of which he said that he had been acquainted with the College in various ways for some time. Its two last Principals were also friends of his of long standing, and he often thought what a good place the College must be, for it had got the best work out of two of the most brilliant scholars and able men he had ever known—Dr. Odgers and Mr. Gordon. An institution must have some vitality of its own when it could get the highest quality of work out of men. There was also something touching about the extraordinary devotion of the old students of the College to their Alma Mater. It was very seldom indeed that appeals for money came backed by such absolute proofs of sincerity as was supplied by the old students of the College.

The Rev. C. HARGROVE said that Leeds people should support the College, for it had done much for Leeds. At that moment there were three ministers in Leeds, and two of them were from the Home Missionary College. Their county missionary was also from the same College, as was the Rev. John Fox, who had worked for twenty years in Leeds. It was hard to see how they could have done without the College, as the other College could not supply all their needs. Some people had urged amalgamation of the two Colleges, but that was impossible, and at present both must be supported, as both were being carried on with credit to the denomination.

The Rev. H. McLACHLAN pointed out the great possibilities before the College with the new Faculty at the University, and urged that the committee should not be hampered for want of funds. The meeting then closed with thanks to Mrs. Kitson, who invited the company present to partake of tea.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

COUNCIL MEETING.

A MEETING of the Council was held at Essex Hall on Tuesday afternoon, the President, Mr. Grosvenor Talbot, in the chair. The other members present were:

Mr. C. F. Pearson (ex-president), Mrs. Aspland, Mrs. Bartram, Miss Brock, Miss Burkitt, Miss Clephan, Miss Pritchard, Mrs. Rutt, Miss E. Sharp, Miss Tayler, Mrs. Wooding, Rev. F. Allen, Mr. R. Bartram, Mr. W. W. Bruce, Mr. E. Capleton, Mr. H. G. Chancellor, Mr. H. Chatfield Clarke, Rev. J. Harwood, Mr. I. S. Lister, Rev. Walter Lloyd, Mr. David Martineau, Rev. H. W. Perris, Mr. J. G. Pinnock, Mr. S. W. Preston, Mr. Ion Pritchard, Rev. H. Rawlings, Rev. C. Roper, Rev. F. W. Stanley, Mr. Hugh Stannus, Rev. W. G. Tarrant, Rev. W. Wooding, and the Secretary (Rev. W. Copeland Bowie).

Letters of regret for absence were submitted from Miss Hall, Miss Preston, Mr. E. H. Coysh, Mr. H. Epps, Rev. J. A. Kelly, and others.

The minutes of the meeting held October 30, 1906, were read and confirmed, and the secretary then read the report of the committee, as follows:—

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE.

Since the meeting of the Council in October the executive committee have held five meetings, and there have been twenty-seven meetings of the various sub-committees. On many occasions the detailed business occupies sub-committees several hours, and at an ordinary monthly meeting the executive committee have usually more than a hundred separate questions placed before them for decision. The number of congregations, ministers, and private individuals that look to the Association for advice and help grows steadily. The office and book-room correspondence reached a total of 5,931 letters received, and 9,529 letters and parcels sent out for the five months (October 25 to March 25) which have elapsed since the Council last met.

FINANCE.

The income for the year 1906, including a balance of £46 from the previous year, amounted to £8,319. It was made up as follows:—Subscriptions, £4,478; collections, £574; investments, £1,275; book-room, £1,772; donations, &c., £76; transferred from investment account, £98. The expenditure for the year 1906 was £8,309. It was made up as follows:—Home Missionary work, including grants of books and tracts, £4,156; Foreign missionary work, £1,038; book department, £1,949; salaries and wages, office and book-room staff, £827; anniversary and deputations, £117; maintenance, and expenses of postages, stationery, &c., £222. A balance of £10 was carried over to 1907, being £36 less than the balance of the previous year. It will be seen that it was necessary also to transfer £98 from the investment account.

The losses by death, and of subscriptions promised for a specified time, amounted in 1906 to £282. Although the present year is not three months old, the treasurer has already to face additional losses by death of subscriptions amounting to £370, and from subscriptions promised for a few years, £265. The losses thus reach the large total of £917. Towards meeting these losses, new and increased subscriptions of £157 have been paid or promised. It will be necessary to raise, somehow, during 1907, £760, if the anonymous subscription of £1,000 is to be retained.

Collections on behalf of the funds of the Association were made by 234 congregations—an increase of eight on the previous year; the total sum collected, probably owing to other societies appealing to the same people at the same time, was less by £45. It is important that the members of our churches should have an opportunity once a year of learning something of the varied missionary work which the Association is doing at home and abroad. It is, however, to the subscription list that the treasurer and committee look for their chief means of financial support, and it is gratifying to report that several new appointments have been made of local treasurers, already with good results. It is hoped that before long the Association will have an active representative in every one of our congregations, so that the number of subscribing members may be greatly enlarged. The generosity of a few well-known Unitarian families is unbounded, but the committee would rejoice to see the names of many others in the list of subscribers to the Association, and in response to the appeals which our churches and district societies are compelled to make from time to time.

A legacy of £500 from the late Mr. William Colfox, of Bridport, has been received, and intimation of one of a like amount from the late Mr. Edwin Clephan, of Leicester.

PUBLICATIONS.

It will be observed that in connection with its publication department the Association expended nearly £2,000 during 1906. Fifty-two numbers of the New Series of Unitarian tracts have been issued, and already several of them have had to be reprinted. Bound up in volumes, under separate titles, the tracts have attracted attention and produced a very favourable impression upon people previously unacquainted with the principles and religious teachings of Unitarians. To the series of Sixpenny Reprints have been added, since the last meeting of the Council: "Endeavours After the Christian Life," by Dr. Martineau; "The Perfect Life," by Dr. Channing; "Materialism and Atheism Examined," by Dr. Freeman Clarke, with an introduction by Dr. S. H. Mellone. There will also be published shortly the second volume of the "Endeavours" and a series of lectures by William Johnson Fox, formerly M.P. for Oldham, and minister of South Place Chapel, on "Religious Ideas." In a few days Professor Paul Wernle's "Early Sources of the Life of Jesus," translated by Rev. E. W. Lummis, will be published; to be followed by the late Professor Wrede's important book dealing with the life and teachings of Paul. The committee trust that they may rely upon the sympathy and co-operation of ministers and secretaries of congregations in making these books widely known, so that the sales may cover the cost of production. The remaining sheets of the Rev. C. B. Upton's able exposition of the Philosophy of Dr. Martineau have been purchased, and this excellent volume may now be had at a cheap price. The purchase of the sheets of Theodore Parker's "Experiences as a Christian Minister" has enabled the committee to make a grant of this admirable little volume to a large number of ministers. There is also in course of publication a series of two-page and four-page Unitarian leaflets for gratuitous circulation among inquirers desirous of an introduction to Unitarianism. Six of these "Leaflets" have been issued; others will be prepared, with the assistance of Rev. T. P. Spedding, for use in connection with Van Mission work. The Essex Hall Year Book and the Unitarian Pocket Almanac have been issued as heretofore. As fewer complaints and criticisms, and more letters of commendation, have been received than usual, the committee are satisfied that they are performing an important and useful service to congregations, ministers, and societies in publishing these annuals.

From October, 1906, to March, 1907, grants of 3,321 books and 68,214 tracts to the value of £417 have been made to ministers, congregations, postal missions, and individual inquirers. Among the applicants for grants of books by Unitarian writers there were sixty-two ministers of so-called orthodox churches. There has been an epidemic of theological controversy, more particularly in England, during the last few months, with the result that the book-room and office staff have had their labours considerably increased. It would be a revelation to some Unitarians if they knew how grateful many people are for the inspiration and guidance received from the literature they obtain from Essex Hall. "I feel that you have given me a new conception of religion, free from dogmatic bias and artificial creeds," writes an artisan living in the North of England. An orthodox minister writes: "One cannot but acknowledge the crying need to-day for such practical teaching as is found in the book sent. Until recently I altogether failed to understand your position, but literature received has helped me much in this respect."

For many years a library containing a large collection of theological books was maintained by the Association for the benefit of members. In recent years little use was made of it, and the committee, desiring that some larger and wider use should, if possible, be made of the books, offered to hand them over to the trustees of Dr. Williams's Library, with the exception of books of reference, and a selection of historical and theological works of special interest to Unitarians. The offer was gratefully accepted, and readers not only in London, but all over the country, will be able to obtain the loan of books by complying with the simple conditions imposed upon those who desire to make use of Dr. Williams's Library, Gordon Square, London.

HOME MISSION WORK.

Grants for the year 1907, amounting in all to £2,490, have been voted, with certain conditions as to the settlement of ministers and local contributions, to the following congregations:—Aberdare, Ansdell, Ashton, Banbury, Barnard Castle, Bedford, Birmingham (Small Heath), Blackburn, Boston, Bournemouth, Bradford (West Bowling), Bridgend, Bridgwater, Burnley, Bury (Chesham), Canterbury, Cardiff, Carlisle, Clydach Vale, Congleton, Crewe, Crewkerne, Darlington, Deal, Framlingham, Gateshead, Hastings, Huddersfield, Ilkeston, Leicester (Narborough-road), Llwynrhydwon, London (Acton, Forest Gate, Ilford, Kentish Town, Lewisham, Mansford-street, Peckham, Plumstead, Walthamstow, Wimbledon), Loughborough, Lydgate, Manchester (Bradford, Broughton, Chorlton, Oldham-road, Pendleton, Urmston), Middlesbrough, Mottram, Nelson, Newbury, Newton Abbot, Nottage, Nottingham (Christ Church), Panteg, Penrhiw, Plymouth, Pontypridd, Poole, Reading, Ringwood, Southampton, South Shields, Stockton, St. Helens, Sunderland, Sychbant, Torquay, Walsall, Whitechurch, Wick, Wolverhampton, Yarmouth. Grants in aid of the salaries of District Ministers have been made to the following:—Liverpool District Missionary Association, London and South-Eastern Counties Provincial Assembly, Western Union, and Yorkshire Unitarian Union.

There have been a great many applications for assistance in the building of new chapels and rooms, and for alterations and repairs to old chapels. Since the last meeting of the Council grants amounting to £450 have been made to twelve congregations—two in Ireland, four in Wales, and six in England. For special services on Sundays, and expenses of week-evening lectures, grants have been made to fourteen congregations amounting to upwards of £150. Special preachers, whose fees and travelling expenses have been paid by the Association, have visited twenty-five congregations. Rev. John Page Hopps has recently lectured to large and most appreciative audiences on week-evenings at five places in South Wales. Rev. W. G. Tarrant delivered week-evening Biblical and theological lectures at Bridport, Exeter, Taunton, and Trowbridge. Rev. Rudolf Davis, District Minister of the Western Union, who organised the lectures, reports that Mr. Tarrant's visits gave great pleasure to the people, and his valuable lectures were highly appreciated.

The Sunday-morning services at Cambridge have been continued during the University terms; the hall in Downing-street, where the services are now held, is well adapted for the purpose. The attendances of students and others remains about the same. Many of those who assisted in starting the services have left Cambridge, but their places have happily been taken by newcomers.

The new missionary movements at Ansdell, Blackburn, Ilford, Newport (Mon.), and Wimbledon are making good progress. There is hope that ministers will shortly be settled at two or three of these places; at others, in common with not a few congregations in different parts of the country, the services will continue to be conducted by visiting ministers and laymen. There are several churches in want of ministers, and it appears to be very difficult for them to discover the men they want, although there are a few Unitarian ministers in the ranks of the unemployed.

THE UNITARIAN VAN.

The great opportunity for missionary work among the people, opened out by the experiment made last summer by the Unitarian Van, deeply impressed the Committee. The members of the Council, at the meeting held in October, urged that the question was one requiring careful consideration. It is with sincere pleasure that the Committee now report that the Rev. T. P. Spedding has been appointed Missionary Agent of the Association, with the organisation and special oversight of the Van Mission. The van and the balance of cash amounting to £327, have been transferred by the Missionary Conference to the treasurer of the Association; the financial responsibility, which will be considerable, now rests entirely upon the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. Three new vans are in course of construction, and will be ready early in May. It is intended that one van shall be employed in districts within easy reach of London, another in the South-west of Scotland, while two other will traverse the North Midlands, Lancashire, and Yorkshire. This new enterprise will make large demands not only for financial support, but for missionary zeal. It will be no light task to find a sufficient number of men of apostolic fervour able and willing to go into the highways and byways to proclaim the message of a reasonable, reverent, uplifting religious faith. The opportunity will be a test of the power of the Unitarian denomination, its ministers, and its laity, to undertake missionary work on popular lines among the people, especially among those who seldom or never frequent churches and chapels. The District Ministers in the localities which will be visited by the vans have undertaken to co-operate with Mr. Spedding in finding preachers and workers.

FOREIGN MISSION WORK.

Grants for the year 1907 amounting to £760 have been made as follows:—Brussels £10, Budapest and its affiliated churches £50, Christiania £50, Khasi Hills Unitarian Mission stations £75, New Zealand £175. For postal mission work at various centres in India £60; for similar work in Canada, Bulgaria, Denmark, Norway, Japan, £65; grants to students studying at Manchester College, Oxford, from India, Japan, Hungary, and New Zealand, £275.

Liberal religious thought on the Continent, especially in Germany, is making great progress, and is no longer confined to university professors and learned experts. In France the reorganisation of the churches, consequent on the accomplished separation, is steadily proceeding. The National Synod of the Liberal Churches is to assemble on April 10. The separation, happily, has not proved to be such a crushing blow to the French Protestant Churches as was at first feared by many. Two years ago it was commonly thought that some 200 churches would have to be given up, or at least would lose their separate existence. As a matter of fact, it has only been found needful so far to join 17 churches to neighbouring parishes, so great have been the efforts made by the Protestant population to maintain their churches now that they are no longer subsidised by the State.

The religious services and work in Denmark, Norway, Hungary, and New Zealand, aided by the Association, show signs of helpful progress. Rev. H. Haugerud, of Christiania, writes: "I was never more busy than at the present time in this field, which is so large and full of promise, although a difficult one to work in for a Unitarian pioneer. The encouragement you give me is valuable indeed; the feeling that I am in league with a host of fearless, progressive spirits in your land and other lands gives me strength in the struggle for truth." Rev. W. Tudor Jones, of Wellington, writes:—"Tell your Council meeting in March that the good work is succeeding here, and I have abundant reasons for believing that Mr. Jellie's work has been and is of great importance at Auckland. The congregations have kept up well throughout the summer, and the Unitarian gospel is being spread all over these islands." The Rev. R. H. Lambley has decided, after nine years of faithful service, to resign his charge of the Unitarian Church at Melbourne, and to return to England this summer.

The Committee were pleased to show their appreciation of the faithful services of the Rev. Ramsden Balmforth, of Cape Town, by making a contribution towards the expenses of Rev. J. T. Davis, who very kindly occupied the pulpit of the Unitarian Church at Cape Town during Mr. Balmforth's enforced absence through illness. The services rendered by Mr. Davis were highly appreciated by the congregation.

The work in India has been carried on with energy and faithfulness. Mr. G. W. Brown, an active member of the Executive Committee, in a visit to India recently, had opportunities of meeting Mr. Chakrabarti, of the Khasi Hills, Mr. Sarkar of Calcutta, Mr. Shinde of Bombay, and other Brahmo Samaj leaders and workers. Mr. Brown was satisfied that the Association had done and was doing valuable service on behalf of a liberal and progressive religious faith in India. The Committee would earnestly urge Unitarians in England to pay no heed to appeals made for missionary work at the Khasi Hills or Madras, without first carefully assuring themselves that the appeals are really worthy of support. Mr. V. R. Shinde reports: "I am glad our Postal Mission shows a very great increase in its work. The total number of books and pamphlets sold and distributed in 1906 was 5,719, as against 1,739 in the previous year. The increase is partly due to the distribution of 1,708 Indian tracts which we were enabled to issue by the aid of the Association, and to the circulation of 580 tracts received from America, but it is mainly due to the fact that the work is now well organised, and carried on with zeal and love by the assistance of Mr. S. Abdul Kadir."

WORK IN SCOTLAND.

Grants towards the salaries of the ministers for the year 1907 at Aberdeen, Dundee, and Glasgow (Ross-street), have been made as in previous years. The progress towards self-support is slow, but the contributions of the three congregations named, it is believed, compare favourably with those of similar congregations in England. The week-evening theological lectures by the Rev. E. T. Russell at Coatbridge and Govan, have been well attended, especially at the latter place. The lectures and special services at Aberdeen, Dundee, and Kirkcaldy by the Revs. Henry Gow, H. D. Roberts, and C. J. Street, were held in November last, and although the attendances were smaller than the Committee anticipated, interest was aroused and quickened by the excellent services rendered by the three visiting ministers. A series of Sunday lectures expository of the principles and faith of Unitarians is now in course of delivery at Edinburgh, towards the expenses of which the McQuaker Trustees were pleased to contribute.

The Rev. Charles Sneddon terminated his brief ministry at Kirkcaldy, December 31, 1906. The congregation are at present carrying on the services among themselves, with the occasional aid of preachers from a distance. The congregation at Kilmarnock decided to discontinue the services there in January of this year. The McQuaker Trustees had made arrangements through Rev. E. T. Russell, secretary of the Scottish Unitarian Association, to provide pulpit supplies pending the decision of the Scottish Association as to the disposal or otherwise of the property in Clerk's-lane. The McQuaker Trustees have liberally supported the religious services at Kilmarnock, but they have always refrained from accepting any responsibility in respect to the ownership of the property. There has been a continuous decline in local interest and self-support for several years, and it is with regret that the Committee report the discontinuance of the services.

A large number of Unitarian books and tracts have been circulated in Scotland through the agency of the Postal Mission, which is under the supervision of Rev. Alex. Webster, and direct from Essex Hall. Nearly 200 copies of the Rev. C. B. Upton's treatise on the philosophy of Dr. Martineau have been presented by the McQuaker Trustees to public, university, and other libraries in Scotland.

The Rev. T. P. Spedding is making arrangements, in co-operation with the Revs. James Forrest and E. T. Russell, for one of the new Missionary Vans to be placed at the service of the Scottish Unitarian Association. It is proposed that, among other places, Ayr, Mr. McQuaker's native county, should be visited and meetings held at various centres. It is proposed that the Unitarian Van will be at work in Scotland from the beginning of June until the end of September.

OBITUARY.

The Committee deeply regret to report the death of Mr. Edwin Clephan of Leicester, a former president of the Association, and for several years past an active and devoted member of the Executive Committee. The Council have also lost by death, since its last meeting, Mr. Henry Blessley of Landport, and Mr. H. Doughty-Browne of London. Of members of the Association, death has removed Mr. J. Howard Brooks of Alderley, Rev. T. W. Chignell of Exeter, Mr. J. L. Evans of Hastings, Mrs. Frederick Nettlefold of Streatham, Mr. Hodgson Pratt, the devoted friend of peace and other philanthropic movements, Rev. William Robinson, formerly minister of Crewkerne, and Mrs. Vance Smith, widow of Rev. Dr. Vance Smith. To the relatives and friends of the deceased, the Committee would tender their respectful sympathy.

QUESTIONS ON THE REPORT.

In reply to Mr. STANNUS the SECRETARY stated that the decrease in subscriptions of a special character was in accordance with the conditions of the original promises.

The Rev. H. RAWLINGS having asked what was the state of affairs in the Khaki Hills Mission, the Rev. J. HARWOOD said it would be remembered that the mission began some fourteen or fifteen years ago, and that at first, under the general supervision of Mr. Kissor Singh, the several branches had progressed satisfactorily. In later years, he regretted to say, the Committee had lost confidence in that gentleman. He (the speaker) had found things beginning to go wrong, when he had visited India; they had gone worse since. In the difficult circumstances that had arisen, the Committee had found a trustworthy agent in Mr. Chakrabarti, the missionary of the Brahmo Samaj, who distributed their grant and reported to them. Mr. G. W. Brown, an active member of the Committee, who lately visited India, had been impressed with the trustworthiness of Mr. Chakrabarti, and they were quite satisfied with his devotion, discretion, and integrity. Mr. Harwood earnestly warned the benevolent against appeals made by persons who could not be trusted.

The SECRETARY, in reply to further inquiries, said that at Wellington, New Zealand, the congregation was still looking for a suitable site, and in regard to the demand for Unitarian literature, it appeared to arise spontaneously among the ministers and others of different denominations, who constantly applied for grants.

The PRESIDENT, in a few words, expressed the deep sense of loss sustained in the death of Mr. Edwin Clephan, and the other friends named in the report.

The Rev. J. HARWOOD begged to be allowed to add a word with regard to Mr. Clephan, whom he had known well for thirty years, and always as a true friend. Mr. Clephan's life, he said, was a striking refutation of the notion that a warm attachment to their religious faith meant a narrowing of other sympathies. On the contrary, he had been a staunch supporter of political and philanthropic efforts, and a generous patron of art. Instead of being dwarfed or crippled, his life had been a singularly full one; and they must hope that the younger Unitarians would arise to take the place of these fathers of the faith.

The PRESIDENT then moved the adoption of the report. It showed amply, he maintained, that the Association was far from being decadent or moribund. Its work was immense, as the large correspondence and diffusion of literature showed; and they must remember that one book had more than one reader. He hoped the ministers of orthodox bodies who got their books would read, digest, and preach them. He wished it could be arranged for some of the active members of the Committee to visit the large towns of the north and acquaint the people there with the great work done by the Association. Their work was sure to increase, especially through the renewed interest evoked by the utterances of the Rev. R. J. Campbell. They did not ask him to join them, though all who felt with them were welcome when they did come. But he wished well to all those who sought to do good in their own way, and to serve what they felt to be the highest truth. The Van Mission, he hoped, would stir up other churches to renewed activity upon similar lines, so that the people of the land might really be reached and brought into Christian ways of living. He commended the cause in Scotland to warm sympathy and support; and with respect to their foreign work he felt it was broad-minded and inclusive, not insisting on names, but sympathising with freethought and earnest religious men on the Continent and elsewhere. Progress was evident all round; their report was a healthy one, and he only wished that the Association might continue to extend its work on behalf of a religious faith which he was confident was by no means a dying-out or decadent religion.

The Rev. C. ROPER, who seconded the report, said (in reply to an observation by Miss E. SHARPE) that open-air preaching had been formerly attempted in one of the London parks. For his own part he had the utmost confidence in the Van movement. There was no fear of lack of men when such veterans as J. Page Hopps, J. C. Street, and H. Enfield Dowson volunteered! He looked forward to the formation of reading circles next winter, and special work by the missionary when results seemed to warrant it. Their object was not to provoke controversy, but to bring to the people religious teaching from the Unitarian point of view.

The report was adopted unanimously.

The SECRETARY announced several nominated changes in the roll of the Committee and Council, and stated that Mr. Howard Chatfield Clarke would be nominated to succeed Mr. Oswald Nettlefold as hon. treasurer. The Whit Week arrangements were not yet complete; Professor Rudolf Eucken, of Jena, would give the Essex Hall lecture next year—as to this year, no announcement could be made as yet. The Rev. A. Webster would be the preacher, and the Revs. W. G. Tarrant and J. H. Weatherall would read papers at the conference on the "New Theology." The Boston Congress, September next, promised to be a very important event. A large attendance is expected from all parts of the United States and Canada, and twelve foreign countries had already appointed delegates. The Association would be officially represented by leading laymen and by the Revs. V. D. Davis, W. G. Tarrant, C. J. Street, and the secretary. Upwards of forty Unitarian ministers from Great Britain and Ireland have already intimated their intention of attending, and it is expected that at least fifty of the laity from this country will also be present.

Following this statement some observations were made by members on the various topics. Mr. E. CAPLETON asked if it were possible at the Whit Week meeting to make a declaration of what Unitarians stand for, so as to prevent misrepresentations now rampant. The PRESIDENT was doubtful as to the practicability of the suggestion. The Rev. W. CHYNOWETH POPE strongly commended, first, the Van Mission, and, secondly, the Boston Conference; he specially urged British visitors to go via Canada. The Rev. W. G. TARRANT said arrangements were being made for a visit to the chief Canadian Unitarian churches by representatives of the Association, and it was hoped that a strong muster of British friends would attend one or other of the meetings and services proposed. It was evident, he said, that our friends in the States were making very great preparations for the Congress, and he strongly urged all who could to seize the opportunity to be present. Mr. STANNUS suggested that the Van Mission should be the subject of consideration at Essex Hall, under Mr. Spedding's guidance, before the campaign opened, and that young lay speakers might thus be prepared for the work.

This concluded the proceedings.

MINISTERS' PENSION AND INSURANCE FUND.

THE half-yearly meeting of the Board of Managers was held in London last week. The officers were re-elected as follows: Chairman, Rev. Dr. J. Estlin Carpenter; treasurer, Mr. Howard Chatfield Clarke; secretary, Rev. C. J. Street. Eighteen congregations were reported as having promised annual subscriptions to the fund, amounting to £22 18s. 6d. The annual report and statement of accounts were presented, adopted, and ordered to be printed for circulation. The accounts showed the value of the fund to be £25,185 16s. 4d., but the subscription list had steadily fallen from £317 15s. in 1903 to £271 9s. in 1906. The total expenditure for the year, almost all of which was paid in reduction of ministers' premiums on insurance policies, amounted to £926 13s. 5d. The report referred to the regrettable death of one of the younger beneficiary members, Rev. R. C. Moore, to whose representative, the insurance company had paid £306 1s. 4d., though only four premiums had been received. The number of beneficiary members was 85 at the end of the year (three other ministers' applications have also been approved). The report appeals for new subscribers to supplement the income from the capital fund, so as to meet the constantly increasing claims upon its resources. The managers, being empowered to do so by a recent bye-law, and fortified by Mr. Philip H. Holt's generous donation of £2,000, which enabled them to deal with such cases, express their readiness to consider sympathetically any case of a minister otherwise unprovided for, and contemplating retirement, whose age had prevented him from taking advantage of the insurance scheme. They had already dealt with two such cases. But they repeat the warning that, until some fund is placed at their disposal specifically for this purpose, they are unable to promise help to any minister after he has actually retired, although they are regretfully aware that this tells hardly against some aged ministers.

God did anoint thee with His odorous oil

OBITUARY.

THE REV. J. MISKIMMIN.

THE Rev. John Miskimmin, who passed away on March 13 at the Manse, Greyabbey, co. Down, in his sixty-eighth year, was an early student of the Unitarian Home Missionary Board, and had been minister at Glenarm for thirty years. Previously, from 1869 to 1876, he was at Banbridge. In 1896-7 he was President of the Non-Subscribing Association and was held in high respect in the ministry and in the county. His son, the Rev. J. A. Miskimmin, is minister at Glenarm.

The funeral was on Saturday, March 16. There was service first in the Manse, conducted by the Rev. J. J. Magill, and in the Meeting House, conducted by the Revs. R. J. Orr and A. Ashworth, the Rev. R. M. King being at the organ, and then at the place of burial, Ballylinney, Ballyclare, co. Antrim, where the Rev. James Kennedy officiated. That was Mr. Miskimmin's native district.

MR. R. W. MANNING.

MR. RICHARD WHITE MANNING, who passed away on Friday, March 22, at the age of eighty, though a native of Bristol, had spent most of his working life in Liverpool. He was a nephew of William Patterson, the builder of the Great Western, the Royal Charter, and other notable ships. In Liverpool, where he settled in 1844, he became well-known as a political worker, and was associated with the establishment of the Reform Club, of which, from 1897 he acted for some years as secretary. In 1873 he had accepted the post of Registration Agent for Liverpool South Wards, and in 1878 gave evidence before the Select Committee of the House of Commons on the Election of Guardians, Burial Boards, &c. He was a capable organiser, always ready to take an unobtrusive place, and any good cause (says the Liverpool Daily Post), social or philanthropic, could rely on his devoted assistance.

"He was an omnivorous reader. He searched the Scriptures diligently, and on some of the books of the Old Testament he spoke with the authority of a learned student. Ancient and modern philosophies and religious systems also had a fascination to him, and he perused with avidity histories and works of travel. In this way he stored up a large amount of interesting knowledge, and this, coupled with his many reminiscences, made him a very acceptable lecturer. He lectured in many towns for the relief of the families of the soldiers and sailors killed, wounded, and disabled during the Egyptian War. In manner he was mild and quiet, and had the instincts of a gentleman."

Mr. Manning was an enthusiastic Unitarian. He had, indeed, in his room a framed certificate, bearing the signature of the late Bishop Ryle, authorising him to act as a Scripture-reader in the diocese of Liverpool, but he was attracted to Renshaw-street Chapel by the late Charles Beard, and latterly, while his health permitted, had been a faithful attendant at Ullet-road Church.

The funeral service on Monday at Smithdown-road Cemetery was conducted by the Rev. J. Collins Odgers,

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Belfast: First Church.—The beautiful new organ, the gift of the Misses Riddell of Beechmount, built by Messrs. Lewis & Co., of London, to the specification of Mr. Alfred Hollins, F.R.C.O., the blind organist of St. George's U.F. Church, Edinburgh, was opened on Sunday, when Mr. Hollins presided at the organ, and the Rev. H. J. Rossington was the preacher morning and evening. On Monday evening Mr. Hollins also gave a recital on the organ.

Bristol: Lewins Mead.—Following a good custom inaugurated some years since, an interesting service of Recognition was held in the chapel last Sunday afternoon, on the occasion of the association of five of the elder scholars from the Sunday-schools, with the congregation. The children both of the girls' and of the boys' Sunday-school attended with their teachers; and three of the senior girls, with two seniors from the boys, came to signify their desire publicly to identify themselves with Lewins Mead. The service was conducted by the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, the hymns being heartily rendered by the assembled children. The young people were addressed by their minister on the subject of "Home, its affections, its delights, and the beautiful responsibilities entailed upon every one of its members." They were reminded that men needed a religious home also; that by their own free and sincere choice they had solemnly adopted as such the old house of prayer in which they were gathered, and that as they would guard the good name and fame of the home that had lovingly sheltered them in their childhood, so they should walk worthy of the venerable congregation with which they had associated themselves. On behalf of the congregation, Mr. W. Channing Watkins, himself an old superintendent in the boys' school, gave the young friends joining Lewins Mead a hearty welcome. He urged them one and all to live out their own individual life by the aid of those same teachings and principles, which, from his earliest years he had imbibed under the healthy religious influence of Lewins Mead worship and experience. Mr. Watkins, then, on behalf of the Committee presented the five new young members of the congregation with a copy of the Hymn Book at present used in the Sunday Services. The proceedings closed with the Benediction, and were marked throughout with warmth and earnestness.

Bristol: Lewin's Mead Domestic Mission.—The annual meeting was held on Monday evening, March 25, at the Mission, Lower Montague-street. Mrs. Broadrick, at the close of her report stated that she did not feel able to undertake another winter's work at the Mission, and therefore wished to resign her charge at the end of June. A further report of the meeting will appear next week.

Capel-y-Groes.—On the 22nd instant, there passed away very suddenly Mr. Thomas Jenkins, of Blaenwaunganol, Cardiganshire, in the 52nd year of his age. He was a brother of the Revs. E. E. Jenkins, of Walsley, and J. E. Jenkins, of Padidham, and belonged to a family that for generations has been a tower of strength to our churches in Cardiganshire, especially to the Capel-y-Groes Church, of which he was a faithful member.

Chatham.—A successful sale of work was held at the Queen's Hall, on March 20. The opening ceremony was performed by the Mayoress of Rochester, who is niece of Mrs. Humphry Wood and Miss Tribe, who erected Hamond Hill Church, and are its most generous supporters. In the course of the afternoon the Sunday-school girls performed a floral operetta, having been efficiently trained by Mrs. Tyssul Davis. The sale was well attended by those of our own fold as well as of other Christian denominations. A number of industrious ladies and gentlemen have laboured to bring about the desired result, and the weather was perfect.

Halifax.—The nett balance from the recent Northgate-end Chapel Bazaar is £162 10s. 10d., which will go to helping to meet the extra expenditure to be incurred in improving the organ, electric-light installation, and re-decorating the chapel.

East London Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The eleventh annual meeting was held at Walthamstow on Saturday, March 23, twenty-five being present. The chair was taken by the President, Mr. Alfred Thompson. In the absence of the Secretary through sickness, the annual report was read by the Rev. Gordon Cooper, and was adopted. Meetings have been held during the session at Mansford-street, Forest Gate, Stratford, Stepney, and Walthamstow, the annual excursion took place on June 23 last year to Higham's Park, and the annual aggregate service at Hackney, Sept. 23. After some discussion a recommendation from the committee that, having regard to the difficulty apparently experienced by the schools in attending the meetings, it would be advisable to reduce the number of meetings in the next Session, was carried. It was decided to hold only a Conference and an Aggregate Service, and to endeavour to make these thoroughly hearty and successful. The Rev. Gordon Cooper was elected President, and Mr. E. Capleton, Vice-President. The Treasurer, Mrs. Wood, and the Secretary, Mr. G. H. Verstage, were both re-elected. A hearty vote of thanks was passed to the retiring officers. Refreshments were then served, and a concert given by local talent enjoyed, the kindness of the Walthamstow friends being much appreciated.

Liverpool: Ullet-road.—At a meeting of the Rathbone Club on March 21 in the Church Hall, Miss Eleanor Rathbone gave an address on Women's Suffrage, strongly urging the admission of women to the franchise upon the same conditions as men. Women, she urged, ought to have a voice in legislation, regulating the hours and conditions of female labour. The jealousy which existed against women's work only increased the need for women to have direct representation. Then again taxation and representation should go together. The exclusion of women from the franchise had a bad effect upon national life. Many members joined in the discussion which followed the paper. Finally Miss Rathbone proposed, and Rev. J. Collins Odgers seconded, a resolution in favour of the Bill now before Parliament. This was carried unanimously, and the secretary was directed to forward a copy of the resolution to Mr. Austen Taylor, M.P. (East Toxteth). Mr. John Edwards presided. There were fifty-two members present. The last lecture of the session (by Dr. S. H. Mellone) is postponed until next session.

London: Hampstead.—Two very successful performances of "Gentlemen Boarders," and another amusing play, were given in the Rosslyn Hill School-room last Saturday, by a company of friends, members of the congregation and others, in aid of the Boston Conference Fund. Music by an excellent amateur orchestra during the intervals, greatly enhanced the enjoyment. There were large audiences, which nearly filled the room at both performances. About £35 was the net result for the Fund.

Manchester: Pendleton.—The annual meeting of the congregation was held on Saturday, March 23, Mr. J. Wigley, Chairman of the Church Committee, presiding. The report showed that the past year had been one of steady progress, and recorded a continued increase in the attendances at the services. It also bore high testimony to the earnest and successful work of the Rev. N. Anderton in the church and all the connected activities. The financial position was improved. A very cordial vote of thanks was passed to Mrs. Anderton and the Ladies' Sewing Society for valuable services rendered during the past year, and also to the choir and organist. During the evening a handsome timepiece was presented to Mr. and Mrs. G. Macdonald, who have been actively connected with the church for the past twelve years, and have recently removed to Sheffield, as a mark of sincere appreciation of their services.

Saffron Walden.—On Sunday, March 24, the Rev. J. A. Brinkworth, completed the 32nd year of his ministry at the General Baptist Chapel. Appropriate sermons were preached; and Mr. Brinkworth was warmly congratulated upon his labours during all these years for the church and in the town. He has remained "Elder" of this Church longer than any previous pastor since it was founded in 1711.

You must, for wisdom, for sanity, have some access to the mind and heart of the common humanity. The exclusive excludes himself.—Emerson.

THE Ruskin Exhibition, open at the Fine Art Gallery (148, New Bond-street), during March and April, furnishes a welcome opportunity, not only of seeing a large number of his water-colours and drawings, but of inspecting the splendid library edition of his works, which is in course of publication in 38 volumes. The exhibition, which includes also some sketch-books and manuscripts shown in cases, begins with a map of France, made by the boy of ten, and numbers altogether 227 items, many of them very beautiful drawings. Of the library edition of "The Life, Letters, and Complete Works of John Ruskin" (George Allen, subscription price, £42), twenty-seven volumes have now been issued. Vols. 28 and 29, to be issued this month, and in April, complete "Fors Clavigera." Vol. 38 is to contain Ruskiniana, and a complete index to all the works. In the exhibition there are fifteen bound volumes of plates which appear in the works. The set, when completed, will contain a number of plates, and about 100 of Ruskin's drawings, which have not before been published. There will be, altogether, about 2,000 illustrations.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE promise of beautiful Easter weather, which we welcomed last week, was amply fulfilled, and the whole country enjoyed perfect days until after the Monday holiday. Such an Easter might have dropped out of sunny June.

A LETTER from Mrs. Mottram this week tells of the arrangements for the Martineau Memorial stone-laying at Norwich on Saturday week, April 20.

MANY of our readers, we feel sure, will welcome the translation of M. Sabatier's valuable Hibbert Journal article on the Religious Crisis in France and Italy, which we are glad to be allowed to publish in these columns. The first part of the article appears this week. The remainder will follow next week.

A PUBLIC meeting is to be held at Essex Hall on Saturday next, April 13, to consider the question, "Shall the Drink Trade Govern England?" The Earl of Carlisle, President of the National Unitarian Temperance Association, is to take the chair at 7.30, and the announced speakers are Mr. Will Crooks, M.P., Mr. Fred Maddison, M.P., the Rev. L. Jenkins Jones (Ex-Mayor of Woolwich), and Mr. H. G. Chancellor.

WE must claim the pleasure of congratulating Mr. Richard Durning Holt on his return to Parliament as member for the Hexham Division of Northumberland. Mr. Holt inherits from his father and grandfather a noble tradition of good citizenship in Liverpool, and other members of his family have been great benefactors of their native city. He has himself given proof of high capacity as a man of business and public spirit, and we rejoice in the honour he has now achieved, and the career of wider usefulness thus opened to him.

EASTER brings its crop of conferences. The postmen and men of other occupations have met to consider the interests of their calling. The I.L.P. had had its festival. But among the political or professional groups which meet in conference at Easter none is more indissolubly connected with the welfare of the nation than the National Union of Teachers, which assembled this year at Oxford. Mr. Pickles, of Burnley, in his presidential address, referred to the attitude of the Board of Education to secondary and higher elementary education, and severely criticised the policy of the Board as trying to maintain class distinction in secondary education. The contention of the teachers is that all children from elementary schools who can profit thereby should receive a higher education. The policy of the Board is said to be to throw obstacles in the way of this very desirable end, and to restrict the benefits as much as possible to the children of the middle classes. Significantly enough, the same complaint was made on the same day from the platform of the I.L.P. at Derby. This discussion brings us to the real education problem which has been so long obscured by the so-called religious difficulty—how to get the best teaching and the highest education for the children of the people. As soon as this ambition seriously begins to operate, the teaching staff will be doubled. That is a first step, and without it nothing really great can be achieved. What is sought for is to render the common schools so good that they will be good enough for the children of all classes. When that is achieved we shall be creating for the boys and girls of the country a mighty tradition of life lived side by side in the school, and the influence of that memory will be incalculably great in creating a sense of common citizenship in the great concerns of manhood and womanhood.

THE Peace Committee of the Society of Friends has issued in pamphlet form a vigorous paper by the Rev. H. S. Perris, on "Rifles and Education: A Record and Appeal," which appeared originally in two numbers of the Friend. Mr. Perris shows how persistently the effort is being made to introduce rifle shooting and military drill into public schools, and how in important schools the cadet corps has already been made compulsory. The effort is extending to preparatory schools, and is aimed also at elementary schools. Mr. Perris pleads earnestly that a false ideal is thus encouraged, and concludes with suggestions as to "Peace" education, which will make a far more valuable contribution to national character and true patriotism. Copies of the pamphlet may be had at Essex Hall.

THE first article in the new number of the Hibbert Journal is by the Rev. R. J. Campbell, on "The New Theology Movement." As to the "League" of which there was some talk in the papers at the beginning of this excitement, we are told that this little society "will no doubt continue in a quiet way, providing a means for fraternal intercourse among its founders and their friends," but Mr. Campbell wants something on wider lines, to bring together the men who in various religious communions are in sympathy with the movement. He cannot, however, undertake to organise such a society. "What is wanted more than anything else, is some means whereby liberal-minded Catholics, Anglicans, Evangelical Free Churchmen, Unitarians, men of science like Sir Oliver Lodge, ethical teachers like Dr. Stanton Cort, and pioneers of social reform like Professor Henry Jones and Mr. Keir Hardie can get together on a common platform, and understand more fully their common aims."

THE Rev. Joseph Wood has published an admirable address he gave in the Old Meeting Church, Birmingham, on Sunday, March 24, on "The New Theology and the Old Religion," a title which he takes from the Bishop of Birmingham's Lenten addresses, to protest against their implication and controvert Dr. Gore's onslaught on the New Theology. With as good reason, Mr. Wood says, a churchman in the time of Copernicus might have lectured on "The New Astronomy and the Old Stars," or in the time of Linnæus, a naturalist might have lectured on "The New Botany and the Old Flowers," to assert the old against the new theory. There are many theologies, but one religion. Forgetfulness of this fact, Mr. Wood affirms, vitiated nearly the whole of the Bishop's argument.

THE Bishop in his addresses seemed to forget, said Mr. Wood, that we live in an entirely different world from that of the Nicene Fathers, and assumed an untenable theory of revelation. "Lastly," said the preacher, "I feel bound to raise my most earnest protest once again against the Bishop's oft-repeated, monstrous and horrible assertion that Jesus was either God or not a good man. It is monstrous and horrible because it is an attempt to rob men of Christ and his leadership, of their reverence and love for him, of their loyalty to him, unless they believe a certain dogma about his person. It is an attempt to frighten the ignorant and unwary into orthodoxy by an assertion that on no other terms can they have a Christ to trust and love and follow. As a serious argument the Bishop's dilemma, like most other dilemmas, is scarcely worth discussing, since it obviously "begs" all the questions that are in dispute, and is based on assumptions which no one not already committed to the dogma would admit. That, however, may stand over. What I want to know is, whether the Bishop thinks he is doing any service to religion by forcing that choice upon men? whether it is a good thing for any human soul to say, "I cannot believe Jesus is God, therefore I have no choice but to think of him as a bad man, and therefore Christianity is a lie, a cheat, and an offence against both intellect and conscience?" Is it serving religion if you tell men they cannot be disciples of Christ unless they accept your particular theological expression? Can you imagine Jesus saying to a troubled soul, "Unless you believe that I am God you must treat me as one of the wicked." It is an impossible imagination! There are and have been thousands of loyal, loving, devoted disciples of Christ who could not speak of him as God. Men, the equals of any of the saints and scholars, and dignitaries of the Church, whether for learning, or philosophical power, or beauty of character, or Christ-like sacrifice of self, have not hesitated to call him Lord and Master, who could not assent to the doctrine of his Deity.

* * * *

It is not possible to impale men like Isaac Newton, Channing, Martineau, Longfellow, Whittier, O. W. Holmes, women like Mary Carpenter, Miss Cobbe, and Florence Nightingale, on the horns of the Bishop's dilemma. They have found a better way for weary, sorrowing souls than that—the way of the Master himself when he gave as the one bond of union and the one test of discipleship, his new commandment of love, "By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples." "Now abideth"—what? The theological systems articulated in the fourth century? Not so. "Now abideth Faith, Hope, Charity: and the greatest of these is Charity."

AT CÆSAREA PHILIPPI.—The Jordan, with its unique features—its isolated course, sinking deeper and deeper into the earth's crust till it lost itself at last in the Dead Sea, hundreds of feet below the level of the oceans, cut off from all power of communication with the great world beyond—was strangely typical of the unique people through whose land it flowed. Judaism, like the river, began on the height, but sank lower and lower into the crust of custom and tradition till it was finally lost in the dead trammels of the law. Strange and suggestive, too, is the thought that it was in the hill country, about the sources of this same stream, that the full consciousness of his divine mission came to one who showed the Jews that the pure springs of their religion had flowed into wrong channels, and who led men to that living water whereof who drinketh shall never thirst.

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

THE first number of the Albany Review, which is the old Independent in new and cheerful dress, edited by Mr. Charles Roden Buxton, has two articles on Land Reform, the first urging it strongly as "The Need of the Moment," the other, by Edward Carpenter, describing the conditions which determine "The Land Question in a Country Parish." Mr. Thomas Hardy marks his goodwill to the new departure by contributing some verses: "Wagtail and Baby: an Incident of Civilisation":—

"A baby watched a ford whereto
A wagtail came for drinking;
A blaring bull went wading through;
The wagtail showed no shrinking."
Nor did he, when a horse and dog came by;
But then, alack for our humanity:—
"A perfect gentleman then neared:
The wagtail in a winking,
Rose terrified, and disappeared
The baby fell a-thinking."

Mr. G. W. E. Russell writes on "Ritualism and Disestablishment" in view of the Royal Commission Report on Ecclesiastical Discipline; and there is a valuable article by Mr. G. F. McCleary, Medical Officer of Health, Hampstead, on "The Work of the Health Visitor." The pioneer work of the Manchester and Salford Ladies' Health Society is described, and also the good work organised by the Huddersfield Corporation for the better care of infants. Very vivid and painful is the "Personal Narrative of a Russian Mother" (1897-1905), by Mme. Savinkov, the first part of which appears in this number.

In the Contemporary we are very glad to see a valuable article by Dr. S. H. Mellone, on "The Present Crisis in Christian Morals," in which he shows very clearly what is the true principle for the application of Christ's teaching to present conditions of life as opposed to such literalism as Tolstoy's. Christ's own ideal of self-preparation for the Kingdom requires, in the modern world, a new application. "The truth is, that Jesus presented to the world ideal principles which must be re-interpreted from age to age; and in the New Testament books we see several stages of this re-interpretation actually taking place, as required by the changing conditions of the world. . . . This is our final answer to the question regarding the applicability of the Christian ideal to present-day life." Dr. Fairbairn contributes an interesting chapter from a forthcoming book, "Experience in Theology: a Chapter of Autobiography," telling of his early experiences as a student both in Scotland and Germany; and Professor A. S. Peake writes on "The Problem of the Old Testament," vindicating the conclusion of the higher criticism, with special reference to Dr. Orr's recent book on the subject. This is Professor Peake's conclusion:—

"Our conservative friends are to be congratulated that they have a scholar and a theologian of Dr. Orr's standing on their side. I believe, however, that his adhesion, while it will no doubt encourage a large number of waverers, to say nothing of those who are immovably entrenched in traditionalism, will make no difference whatever to the confidence with which critics affirm the validity of their main contentions. And I would remind those who may be tempted to overrate the importance of Dr. Orr's dissent that the critical view is accepted by the vast majority of those scholars whose main business in life it is to study and teach the Old Testament, and that their conviction is only deepened by more intimate acquaintances with the text. How urgent the evidence is, may be judged from the critical career of Dr. A. B. Davidson. Constitutionally cautious and reluctant to move from old positions, he yet advanced from the conservatism which marked his first book on Job to an acceptance of the Grafian theory, driven in spite of himself by the sheer weight of the facts. He was a scholar of rare independence, he had no fear of man before his eyes, no desire to be in the critical fashion. He knew his Old Testament as few have known it, and no one prized it more highly. It is more significant that Dr. Davidson surrendered to the Grafians than that Dr. Orr, whose main work has been in other fields, should hold a rectified traditional view."

In the Nineteenth Century and After, Miss Caroline Stephen makes a brief rejoinder on the subject of "Women and Politics," and is vigorously reinforced in her view by the Hon. Mrs. Chapman. "Some London Children at Play," by Rose M. Bradley, should not be overlooked; and Canon Vaughan contributes a pleasant article on "The Literary Associations of Hampshire." Mr. Prothero notices the late Professor Maitland's "Life and Letters of Leslie Stephen." Like his friend, Henry Sidgwick, when the time was come, he waited calmly for the end. And Mr. Prothero quotes from the biography:

"As his bodily strength ebbed apace his faults vanished. The dross was consumed, the gold shone; there was no impatience or restiveness; the clear, strong intellect, and the affectionate heart were tranquil, and the humour, the good humour, played round men and books, and life and death."

The World's Work opens with seven full-page portraits of members of the coming Colonial Conference, General Louis Botha holding the first place. One of the fully illustrated articles is on "The Regeneration of Refuse." In a section on women's work Elizabeth S. Chesser, M.B., writes on "Life Behind the Counter," and another notable article is on "Better Grain and More of It: How John Garton Bred New Food Plants," continued from last month.

PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY OF NON-SUBSCRIBING MINISTERS AND CONGREGATIONS OF LONDON AND THE SOUTH-EASTERN COUNTIES.—The Rev. Edward Walker Sealy, M.A. (Oxon.), who desires to enter the ministry, has satisfied the Advisory Committee of this Assembly as to his character and personal fitness.—(Signed) W. BLAKE ODGERS, Chairman; JAMES HARWOOD, Secretary. NOTE.—All matters other than character and personal fitness are left for the sole consideration of each individual congregation.—London, April 3, 1907.

THE PHILOSOPHICAL BASIS OF "THE NEW THEOLOGY."

THE words "the New Theology" in the above title indicate simply Mr. Campbell's new book. As to the party called the New Theologians, they appear to have at present no common philosophical basis, to be, in fact, not one party, but two parties, separated from each other philosophically by a quite impassable chasm. Whether Mr. Campbell, now that he has given an explicit statement of his theological position, will still remain the recognised head of the whole movement appears to be somewhat doubtful.

Among the prominent leaders of the movement are a few men of quite exceptional power; men who, though they may not be equal to Mr. Campbell in oratorical ability and personal magnetism, are certainly not his inferiors in clear philosophical insight. One of the ablest of these is the Rev. Herbert Brook, M.A., who, at a conference on the New Theology held in the Congregational Church, Accrington, recently, said:—"Dr. John Clifford has clearly shown that if you adopt the position of the Oxford Idealists, certain things follow. The real personality of man disappears, free-will becomes a fiction, and no man is personally liable for his sin. It is the tragedy of the Neo-Hegelian philosophy that, if you once start travelling on its fascinating high road, you will never logically stop until with great violence you have crashed into and destroyed most of the real things—human freedom, the distinction between right and wrong, personal immortality—on which the Bible literature is built. . . . The point is not whether the whole of the preachers of the New Theology accept the identification of God and man, but whether, for my purposes, Mr. Campbell accepts it. I hope against hope that he does not, but I confess that I am continually dreading the discovery that he does. If he does accept it, there can be no doubt that he is a 'lost leader,' not merely of theologians, but of thousands of doubt-filled, sin-burdened men and women who are looking to him for light."

In the book before me, Mr. Brook's gloomy anticipations appear to find full realisation; for, early in the volume Mr. Campbell says:—"What I have to say leads back through Hegelianism to the old Greek thinkers, and beyond them again to the wise men who lived and taught in the East, ages before Jesus was born." In reference to the criticisms which have been passed on his philosophy of religion in the INQUIRER and elsewhere, he writes:—"Some of my critics have contended that my view of the relationship of man to God hails not from Palestine, but from Oxford, and is an outcome of the philosophy of T. H. Green. But I think it can be shown that its pedigree is considerably longer than that. Whether it hails from Palestine or not, it is explicitly stated in the fourth Gospel: 'He that hath seen me hath seen the Father; and how sayest thou then, Show us the Father? Believest thou not that I am in the Father and the Father in me? The words that I speak unto you, I speak not of myself, but the Father that dwelleth in me, He doeth the works. Believe me that I am in the Father, and the Father in me.' Those who object to my statement of the fundamental identity of God and man, will have to explain away such passages as this, and there are plenty of them."

Now I venture to maintain that the above passages, and others like them, afford no justification for the doctrine of "the fundamental identity" of God and man. Mr. Campbell is no doubt quite right when he says that the composer of the fourth Gospel was "an exceedingly able writer"; and I quite admit that in these passages this writer probably puts into the mouth of Jesus language which is coloured by Alexandrian speculations concerning the relation of the Logos to God; but with all his eminent ability, I see no reason for crediting this anonymous religious genius with having at all anticipated Hegel and Oxford idealism. However close be the union between God and Christ in the Johannine conception, there is not the slightest indication that it was a union which merged the will of God and the will of Christ in a fundamental identity. The Johannine Christ is represented as praying that his disciples might become one, even as he and his Father were one; but if he had been philosophically in agreement with monistic idealism, it would never have occurred to him to utter such a prayer, for he would have been fully aware that the identity between God and them already existed in virtue of their original metaphysical constitution, which no will of theirs could either make or unmake. Hence it appears to me clear that the oneness with God, of which the fourth Gospel speaks, is not conceived by the writer as a fundamental or metaphysical identity, but as a very intimate moral and spiritual unity, a unity which is dependent on will and character, and not on philosophical necessity.

To what extent there is truth in the homoeous relation to God, which later theologians ascribed to Christ, and which Mr. Campbell would fain extend to all mankind, it is not, I think, difficult to see. We all have experiences in which we seem to participate in God's own life. The intuitions which enable us to think of self-existence, of eternity and infinity; the ideals which take us out of and beyond our finite selves, and make us co-workers with God, seem, while we experience them, to be our own, and yet we are aware that their source is not in us, but in the indwelling God. Hence we are led to truly think that our spirits are fashioned out of God's own substance, that, as great philosophers have taught, we are portions of God's own being, which He has partially differentiated from Himself so that we may be His genuine offspring; offspring in whom He may progressively reveal His infinite perfections, and who may enjoy the highest bliss of real and increasing personal communion with Him. But that this supreme end of creation should be realised it is absolutely indispensable that the Eternal should delegate to each of those portions that He has differentiated from Himself a certain measure of true individuality, of free initiative. Were our spirits really identical with God Himself, the Divine purpose of evolution would be entirely frustrated;

God would see everywhere nothing but monotonous reflections of Himself; for, as has been well said, "the free-will view of human nature is the only view which makes the world a real place; which makes the whole labour of history more than a shadow fight or aimless phantasmagoria."

In a few sentences in the book Mr. Campbell deals in an ambiguous and self-contradictory way with the question of free-will. He admits in one passage that though he cannot logically find a place for the freedom of the will, "we are, nevertheless, so constituted that we cannot avoid taking some measure of free-will for granted." Having made this confession, he at once proceeds to render it morally valueless by asserting that "whatever our moral freedom may be, it must consist with the all-directing universal will."

Many persons appear to think that the free-will controversy is a merely academic question which has little or no bearing on the practical ethics of everyday life. A careful reading of Mr. Campbell's book will, I believe, disabuse them of this error. When they follow the author into his treatment of sin, they will be startled to find to what results his monistic idealism necessarily leads him. I have heard that some of his admirers hoped and expected that he would omit from his book the doctrine of that remarkable passage in one of his sermons, in which he describes the vilest sinners as blundering seekers after God. Mr. Campbell, however, not only repeats the passage in question, but with the view of justifying it, reprints a large portion of the sermon in which it occurs. Sin, he says, is selfishness, and he certainly depicts selfishness in a vivid way, which would help to deter his hearers from indulging in it. But having done this, he proceeds to explain that in all forms of vice the perpetrators are aiming to secure what they mistakenly conceive to be a larger and more abundant life. They are seeking what they regard as a real good, and therefore are engaged in a "blundering quest for God." Having learned by experience that they have taken a wrong road to the good they seek to obtain, they will, in the future, alter their line of action. So far as I can see, the only judgment which Mr. Campbell's philosophy authorises them to pass on the sins they have committed is, that these so-called sins are simply necessary stages in the beneficent process whereby the individual soul gradually learns its true relation to the Whole of which it is a part.

It does not take long to discover the quarter where Mr. Campbell lighted on a doctrine which seems so well calculated to act as an unwholesome anodyne on the conscience-stricken sinner. In the third book of Green's Prolegomena to Ethics, we read that "every moral agent, the voluptuary no less than the saint, is seeking self-satisfaction, or more explicitly, presents to himself some possible state or achievement of his own as for the time his greatest good."

Now I have not the slightest hesitation in expressing my conviction that this statement is entirely at variance with psychological fact. Green himself was compelled to make it by the exigencies of his fundamental principle, for in that fundamental principle he has so inseparably blended together God and man in all human volitions that he cannot say that the sinner in a time of temptation often takes a course which promises him the intensest immediate pleasure, but which, at the same time, he cannot help feeling is leading him not towards, but away from his greatest good. And yet this, I believe, is the true statement of the case. The voluptuary, I contend, is perfectly aware that he is not engaged in a quest for God, and that what he is engaged in is a quest for direct self-gratification.

We can conceive cases to which the expression "a blundering quest of God," may be appropriately applied. The philanthropist who is seeking to give effect to the promptings of Divine love, but is provided with too limited a store of sociological wisdom, may be said to blunder at times in his quest for God. He is seeking to realise the ideal, though he does not always know the best way to reach the goal. But to put in the same category with this the case of the libertine, who is deliberately scheming to find coarse pleasure for himself by corrupting innocence, is to confuse together things which are wide as the poles asunder; and the fact that Mr. Campbell's doctrine of the identity of man and God leads to this morally repulsive result, appears to me to show conclusively that some of the passages in the present volume are themselves notable illustrations of a well-meaning but blundering quest for God.

The root of the whole matter is to be sought in the too exclusive intellectualism of the philosophers from whom Mr. Campbell traces his theological pedigree. He seeks ultimate guidance only from the intellect and the heart, and ignores the illumination which flashes forth from the experiences of the moral consciousness and the will. It is the especial function of the Hebrew literature to correct this excessive worship of the reason by revealing the complementary truths involved in man's ethical and spiritual experiences. Hence it comes about that it is to the supreme religious teacher, in whom Hebrew prophecy reaches its culmination, that the most advanced portions of the religious world naturally look as to "the light, the truth, and the way."

From the point of view of the conscience and the will, sin is seen to be something incomparably deeper than an intellectual blunder. It is a perversion of the will, a corruption of the character. Nor is there any fundamental truth in the Emersonian dogma, which Mr. Campbell endorses, that sin is no positive reality, but only negative and privative. As each sinful act is an instance of direct resistance to the will of the immanent God, so in its effect upon the character does it create a positive element in society, which is always warring against the realisation of the kingdom of God. As Dr. Warschauer well says, "in sin man is not expressing, but deliberately suppressing the divine within him. Sin is not good in the making, or a mere falling short. It is not the absence of good, but the presence of evil; it is rebellion against the will of God, and its confession always instinctively takes the form: 'Against Thee, Thee only, have I sinned.'"

I conclude, then, that brilliantly written as is Mr. Campbell's book, and noble as is the enthusiasm for humanity which animates it, Dr. Clifford is right in saying that its estimate of sin betrays a serious defeat in its philosophical basis. It is not, I believe, to Mr. Campbell's intellectual progenitors that the religious world will most confidently look for light and guidance, but rather to those master-minds who have most faithfully interpreted God's self-revelation in the Conscience as well as in the Intellect and the Heart—to such men as Dante, Kant, and Lotze, and the preachers and teachers whom these great thinkers have inspired.

THE MYSTERY OF NEWMAN.*

THE impression made by the first half of this book is not an agreeable one. The author rightly anticipates this, and bespeaks patience. "The portrait which I have lovingly traced in the fourth part corrects and completes these first sketches," he says. It would be unfair and very unprofitable to lay the book down before the "corrective" pages are reached; whatever their ultimate value, they certainly evoke feelings less unpleasant to entertain. And yet, when all is done, the reader is sensible of difficulty almost amounting to distress. What may be the feelings of a devout Roman Catholic we can partly judge from the apologetic tone of the introduction, in which Father Tyrrell does his best, a clever best, to reconcile reverent admiration with great plainness of speech. He says:—

"With M. Bremond's psychological biography the study of Newman, both as a man and as a teacher, seems to have entered into its critical and synthetic phase. The main interest which guides his pen is an artistic interest. . . . His interest is neither that of a Newmanite nor an anti-Newmanite, but it is none the less keen for being in some loose sense disinterested and objective. Like every interest, it entails some bias of its own; but it is free from party bias. . . . M. Bremond's work is neither infallible nor final; it must be judged as the first essay in a new line. Not only will each contending faction forget what it concedes to it in its annoyance at what it concedes to its opponent, but his fellow psychologists and artists may grip the subject very differently, whether for better or for worse. Perhaps ten years hence even his own apprehension and expression of the same theme might be somewhat different."

In these lines the reader perceives the evidently mingled feelings created by the book in the mind of a man of exceptionally high intelligence and an expert in Catholic controversy. The average non-Catholic may be pardoned if he must confess at the close that, in spite of all the biographer's loving zeal, the prevailing thought is one of pity and regret.

* "The Mystery of Newman," by Henri Bremond. Translated by H. C. Corrance; with an Introduction by Rev. George Tyrrell. (Williams & Norgate, 10s. 6d. net.)

To illustrate the foregoing remarks we may take a few examples from the opening sections. Here the author has, for purposes of criticism, very closely followed Dr. Abbott, whose trenchant works on the subject are well known. Now, Dr. Abbott may have been unfairly emphatic, and to that extent in error, but no important correction of his statements of fact or quotations from Newman's writings appears to be forthcoming. Admitting the charges, they are no less, which Dr. Abbott brings against Newman as a writer and thinker, the author accepts so fully what we may call "the negative," that the effect of his arguments for "the positive" cannot but be very seriously impaired. Newman's "extraordinary ease" in identifying himself "with the thought and mind of someone else," is pointed out. "I know no one who possessed in a greater degree than he the gift of these metamorphoses." Thus, in his case, we are dealing with a Protean, who at one stage of thought is formed on one striking model, and shortly is transformed into the likeness of another. "At any time of his life it is always easy to tell what saint he wishes to be like." "He borrows largely," we are told, but it is with the assurance, if it were needed, that "he chooses instinctively in each of his models that which the normal development of his own nature imperiously demands." In addition to this disposition, which in another might lead to mere plagiarism or to a quasi-histrionic display, Newman exhibits, we are told, "a wise 'economy,'" which "shades and tempers every part of his work." M. Bremond thinks Canon Kingsley's question, "What, then, does Dr. Newman mean?" was "not so foolish" after all. What was foolish, he says, was to confuse "economy" with "lying." "In truth," he continues, "almost always, and even in the works which followed his conversion" (Sc. to Romanism) "it is as well to consider whether Newman is not keeping something back, whether the play of adverbs or of adjectives does not cover some reserve or contain some innuendo, whether there is nothing to be read between the lines, whether the printed text, retouched, repolished twenty times, is anything else than a passage of discovery or a temporary expedient. In this delicate art of saying a thing without appearing to say it he is a past master." Farther on in the same paragraph (page 6) the author says, "Let it be understood, then, that I am very far from reproaching Newman with his powers in 'economy.'" Now, the author has been introduced to us as an artist, and it must be as an artist that he judges this matter. Inartistic people, call them rude and blunt if he will, have a way of regarding this so-called "economy" as tending toward the culpably deceitful, and though the training of the theological controversialist may lead him to think differently of the matter, he usually finds the plain man's verdict very hard to change. Professor Huxley, we remember, declared that after dabbling in arguments with exponents of this type, he felt his own mind weakened by contact so that he was "unclean till the evening" in consequence of their verbal tricks, evasions, and reserves.

Well, this sort of admission "against" does serious harm to the case "for." Nevertheless, the author valiantly addresses himself to the task, and evidently enjoys the study. Browning must be a congenial poet to him. He leads us to consider by turns Newman's "emotional," "intellectual," and "inner life," interposing between the last two a very interesting and suggestive chapter on Newman as "The Writer and the Preacher." By way of appendix we have a short statement of "The Religious Philosophy of Newman." The thesis which the book is intended to prove is that Newman's was before all things and continually an "autocentric" mind. The author quotes with emphasis Newman's often iterated saying, "There are for me but two beings who count, God and myself." He who constantly and coolly avows so much may well prove a mystery to his neighbours and contemporaries. He is "solitary by choice." "He returns incessantly to the idea that every individual soul is a closed world, and that the most intimate friendship does not succeed in penetrating the solid wall behind which each of us, in spite of himself, is hiding." Aloofness, the dwelling apart of starry souls, is not unknown to us. He whom M. Bremond calls "that admirable Martineau," had (his biographers tell us) his share in this mood of isolation. But Newman's biographer has to confess that, in his case, aloofness from the world bore with it too often the aspect of inexplicable coldness to those who had either shared or seemed to share his friendship. In his intellectual life, also, Newman appears strangely circumscribed. In a glowing passage (page 79) M. Bremond sketches the amazing vitality of English thought in Newman's lifetime. The great scientists, the great poets and novelists, the great theologians, the great critics, were preparing the "veritable revolution" which, says the author, has been accomplished ten years after the death of the Cardinal. "He seems to take no interest in all this movement of thought." Nor, despite evidence of intimate study of periods and phases, such as that of Arianism, can he be credited with a profound knowledge of antiquity. Throughout it is a really personal note that predominates, the result of the egotism (though not ignoble) which shaped the utterance quoted above.

Into the delineation of Newman's religious life, given with sympathetic touch by M. Bremond, this notice need not follow him. If one could have read it all without the preceding matter, more edification would surely have resulted. Even as it is, there are pages that bear deep meditation, for they touch on the secrets of the soul. Occasionally, there is a trick of rhetoric in the biographer that rather tends to destroy the meditative mood than to foster it; but on the whole he loyally strives to redeem for reverence the picture which had perforce to include such unwelcome features. Many of us have, long since, made our own study of Newman; more, probably, have been content to hear the results of other people's study. To those who are already fairly versed in the facts and the writings, this book will be a useful provocative to new thought on the subject.

BURKITT'S JOWETT LECTURES.*

THIS volume alone affords ample justification for the bold step which has been taken by the University of Cambridge in appointing a layman to the Norrisian chair of divinity. Professor Burkitt's qualifications as a scholar of exceptional brilliance were well known, but he reveals himself here as endowed with spiritual insight into the religious significance of the Gospels, and with a power of making his meaning clear in language which is free from conventionality or the restraint of received opinions. The Gospels are to him first of all intensely interesting human documents, and therefore he is able to make them exceptionally interesting to other people. We shall be grateful for a great deal more lay theology of the same quality.

The aim of these lectures is to trace the growth of a literature of biography and interpretation round the person of Jesus Christ, and to explain the motives which guided the literary process. But we are warned at the beginning to take a very modest estimate of the possible results of our attempts at analysis or reconstruction.

The Gospel according to St. Mark is not the only source used by Matthew and Luke, but it is the only source which has survived. We see, clearly enough, that we could not have reconstructed the Gospel according to St. Mark out of the other two Synoptic Gospels, although between them nearly all Mark has been incorporated by Matthew and Luke. How futile, therefore, it is to attempt to reconstruct those other literary sources which seem to have been used by Matthew and Luke, but have not been independently preserved."

In regard to the defects of the Gospels from the strictly biographical point of view, Professor Burkitt is equally explicit:—

"Even apart from the results of the 'higher criticism,' we do not possess enough information to enable us to write a biography of our Lord after the modern pattern. But this is not all loss. The real question is not whether we have as much as we should like, but whether we have as much as we need. The craving for elaboration is really a kind of covetousness; and a man's life, as our Lord himself tells us, does not consist in the abundance and superfluity of things connected with him."

The Gospel of Mark is not only the earliest of the Gospels, but it is also, from the point of view of straightforward historical narrative, the least confused. In a long and very suggestive analysis of its contents, Professor Burkitt shows how it is possible to reconstruct the outward career of Jesus of Nazareth "as it might have appeared to a rather unsympathetic observer." He lays special stress upon the motives of hostility which led to a considerable period of the very short ministry being spent beyond the reach of the Pharisees and the jurisdiction of Herod. As a result of this, the ministry itself assumes more and more a private and intensive quality; instruction of the chosen disciples takes the place of speech to the multitude. All this we see much more clearly in the pages of Mark than in

Matthew and Luke. In other words, Mark fits much more easily into a framework of secular history, and gives us adequate materials for a plain narrative. Professor Burkitt draws the interesting conclusion:—

"That it is possible to do this at all from the details furnished by the second Gospel is a very strong argument for regarding that Gospel to be a trustworthy historical record. A wholly unhistorical myth cannot be rationalised without becoming absurd."

But the chief concern of the primitive church was not historical reminiscence. It lived its life in the power of the Son of God, and it only attempted to interpret that life in obedience to strong practical needs. There is no evidence that the earliest preachers of the Gospel were particularly interested in repeating the words of Christ. "It was necessary that the disciples should reverence and love their Master; far more necessary than that they should remember his phrases." This is a point which Professor Burkitt reiterates, and, in face of our pedantic dependence upon literary sources, it is hardly possible to lay too much stress upon it, for it is of capital importance for any proper estimate of the motives of the evangelists and of the abiding religious value of their work for the Christian mind.

"The Gospel morality," he says, "is not the Gospel, any more than the Didache is the Gospel. Christianity stands or falls, lives or dies, with the personality of Jesus Christ; and the Gospel is our introduction to Jesus Christ. From the Gospel according to Mark we may learn who Jesus Christ was, and what part he played on earth in human history. From the Gospels according to Luke and Matthew we may learn something of what Jesus Christ taught. From the Gospel according to John we may learn what his followers declare to be the real significance of his life. It is the great charm of Christianity that its innermost doctrine is incarnate in the person of its Founder, rather than crystallised into a set of propositions or ordinances."

In regard to one passage in his last lecture, we should like to break a lance with Professor Burkitt. He tells us that "our belief or disbelief in most of the Articles in the Apostles' Creed does not ultimately rest on historical criticism of the Gospels, but upon the general view of the universe, of the order of things, which our training and environment, or our inner experience has led us severally to take. The birth of our Lord from a virgin and his resurrection from the dead—to name the most obvious Articles of the Creed—are not matters which historical criticism can establish." Now, the Apostles' Creed is, in the main, a summary of historical events which are supposed to have a dogmatic value. Professor Burkitt acknowledges that in its statements about the crucifixion, the death, and burial, it enters the arena of ordinary history. He has even reminded us at the beginning of his book that "the course of events is a fixed objective series; things happen once for all, and the determination of the course of past events is a wholly definite task, difficult, indeed, yet perfectly mechanical. . . . The story of Jesus Christ's life on earth, it cannot be too often repeated, happened in one way, and one way only." Now, on what plea can he exempt the birth and the resurrection from the operation of these principles? They cannot be taken out of the course of events. However high their dogmatic value may be, in one respect they belong to the domain of history as strictly as the trial before Pilate or the crucifixion. Either they happened or they did not happen as events or processes in the physical world, and therefore they must be submitted to the impartial scrutiny of the historian. However fitting it may appear to us that they should be true, however congruous they may seem with the character and mission of the Saviour of men—and we have heard them defended frequently on precisely these grounds—our feeling can make no difference to their reality. As events in time they are part of the story of Christ's life, and that life "happened in one way, and one way only." Our dogma must interpret the facts; we must not make the facts conform to our dogma. We regret this brief lapse into inconsistency and vagueness in a book which is marked elsewhere by a singular clearness of judgment in its application of critical and historical principles. But we could forgive much more than this in an author who has done so much to illustrate the Gospel history and to reaffirm this cardinal truth of its interpretation that it was Jesus Christ himself who inspired the Gospels, "made the evangelists write as they did, made the Gospels what they are."

NATURALISM AND RELIGION.*

THE translators of Dr. Otto's work on "Naturalism and Religion," have conferred a benefit on the English speaking and reading world. The book stands out in the very front rank of the body of literature to which it belongs. Dr. Rudolf Otto has won a place among the foremost thinkers on the Continent, and is one who, as Dr. Morrison states in the preface, "possesses the rare merit of combining a high philosophic discipline with an accurate and comprehensive knowledge of the science of organic nature." The reader feels at once that he is under the guidance of a master mind, competent as few are, even in this age, to lead in an inquiry into the fundamental principles of science and religion, to separate the proved from the unproved, and warrantable theory from vain imaginings.

The object of the book is, in the first place, to define the relation, or rather the antithesis between the naturalistic and the religious interpretation of the world; and, secondly, to endeavour to reconcile the contradictions, and to vindicate against the counter claims of naturalism, the validity and freedom of the religious outlook. Thus, in substance, the author sums up his object, but as a matter of fact, little attempt is made to reconcile the contradiction in the two modes of regarding the world. The book is almost wholly devoted to a searching criticism of naturalistic principles, and the results as regards fundamental truths to which they have led, and to a vindication of the validity of the religious outlook.

But what is naturalism? It is not easy to define, but Dr. Otto has in several pages summed up its essential meaning. It is that method of thought which proceeds on the assumption that all the phenomena of the world "may be traced back to simple, unequivocal, and easily understood processes, the actual why and how of all things perceived, so that, in short, everything may be seen to come about by natural means." Against this stands the method of the religious interpretation of the world. The source of this is not to be found in any consideration of external nature or history, but in the inner necessities of the human spirit. From the impulses of its own life, the spirit builds up ideas and conclusions, which a consideration of outward facts may be held to corroborate or not, but which are not drawn from such a consideration. Dr. Otto pushes the contrast even to this point: "No single one of them (i.e., these ideas and conclusions) can be really proved from a study of nature, because they are much too deep to be reached by ordinary reasoning, and much too peculiar in their character and content to be discovered by any scientific consideration of nature or interpretation of the world."

The first three chapters of the book are devoted to clearing the ground and showing that, though the utmost be conceded to naturalism, it inevitably does and always must stop short of an ultimate explanation of the world, and so finally leaves the religious spirit free to formulate its thought. This object is gained by a brilliant exposition of the contingency of all material within reach of the naturalistic method. Let natural explanation be carried to its furthest bound, the world, existence, remains a mystery and contingent. All naturalistic inquiry leads in the end to the problem to which it can give no answer: "Why does anything exist at all, and why do these characters exist, and not quite different ones?" The essential thing in the religious interpretation of the world is the perception that the phenomena of time and space do not constitute the abiding reality. To all these there is "another side"; and the world which we see and know is "only an image, only transiently real, in contrast with the real world of true being which is believed in; time and space, and this world of time and space do not comprise the whole of existence nor existence as it really is, but are only a manifestation of it to our finite and limited knowledge."

A religious interpretation of the world, as Professor Otto shows, is necessarily teleological. Its abiding characteristic is a recognition of purpose. To such a belief, Naturalism, it is often asserted or assumed, gives no colour.

This question leads us into the most interesting portion of the book, in which the author discusses the outcome (a) of the Darwinian theory, and (b) of the mechanical theory of life on the problem of purpose in the natural world.

The enormous developments that have taken place in the theory of organic evolution during recent years are largely unknown except to specialists. Dr. Otto has set these forth as clearly and comprehensively as can be done in a comparatively small space. He traces the development of Darwinism, details the points in which it began to fail in affording satisfaction, and shows up with startling emphasis the fact that expert theory is now largely in opposition to its fundamental theses. Much of the work that has produced this reversal of scientific opinion has been done during the last decade, and the world in general is ignorant of it. Whilst men are talking of "the struggle for existence" and the "survival of the fittest," as the controlling factors of organic evolution, science has thrown them over as inadequate, and is solving the problem of Darwin along other lines. This section of Dr. Otto's book is full of surprises for the ordinary scientific layman interested in the Darwinian Theory of Descent, and probably regarding it as certain as the law of gravitation.

A summary of the new views that have arisen in contrast to Darwinian theory cannot be attempted here. But one or two points may be noticed. The Darwinian theory rested on the hypothesis that everything organic is capable of variations. These variations are, to begin with, slight inconspicuous individual differences which have been produced by various causes, and which are combined, increased, and fixed through the struggle for existence, which eliminates whatever is useless, and builds up what is useful. All the characters of a finished species are the results of a long-continued process of selection on this method.

The modern prevailing view in contrast is that these chance individual variations play but a minor part in the production of new species. New species spring from old species through a disturbance of general vital equilibrium, from which a new state results immediately. It is at first insecure and fluctuating, and only gradually become stable. The struggle for existence is an unfavourable, not an advantageous factor, since it operates to prevent new developments, and the new arises not where the struggle is severe, but where it is weak. The theory of the building up of sporadic variations is thus giving place to the theory of the development of inherent organic tendencies and characters, which are neither produced by nor dependent upon environment, but often assert themselves against it. And now to quote Dr. Otto: "All this implies an admission of evolution and of descent, but a setting aside of Darwinism proper as an unsuccessful hypothesis, and a positive recognition of an endeavour after an aim, internal causes, and teleology in nature, as against fortuitous and superficial factors." The new views are in line with the postulate of the religious consciousness in a way the old were not, and show that "nature does not contradict, in fact, that it allows room and validity to, belief in the highest wisdom as the cause and guide of all things natural."

This section of the book leads into a consideration and criticism of the mechanical theory of life. The naturalistic aspiration here has been to find an ultimate explanation of life in terms of chemical and physical processes. It is not long ago that the assumption that this could be done, and, in fact, was a goal of scientific inquiry almost in sight, was enthusiastically made. Further investigation has shown it to be more and more remote. To-day we are further away than ever from a mechanical theory of life that will fit the facts. The problem has been pushed back and has been debated in connection with simpler structures, but remains in essence the same. Organisms have been reduced to simpler organisms—cells, protoplasm, nucleus, nucleolus, centrosomes, and so on—according to the power of the microscope. But these structures, instead of explaining the vital functions of growth, development, multiplication, by division and the rest, simply repeat them on a smaller scale. The mystery of life remains, and all the work that has been done in this connection leads towards “a deeper conception and interpretation of reality in general, and towards a religious conception in particular.”

* "Naturalism and Religion." By Dr. Rudolf Otto, Professor of Theology in the University of Göttingen; translated by J. Arthur Thomson and Margaret R. Thomson. (Williams & Norgate. Crown Library, 6s.)

Sufficient has now been said to indicate the lines along which Dr. Otto vindicates the right and the demand of the religious consciousness to interpret the world in its own way, to reach the eternal in the temporary, the infinite in the finite. A true estimate of what science has accomplished finds nothing to check, much to confirm and stimulate the religious spirit as it works towards its goals. Dr. Otto defends no particular theological thesis. In so far as one may formulate the results that at present have their guarantee in the religious consciousness, they would be, according to him, the existence of God, and of a divine purpose running through all things, the supremacy of spirit over matter, the immortality of the soul. To the latter question he devotes a short but powerful and inspiring section.

“It is in a faith in a Beyond, and in the immortality of our true being, that what lies finely distributed through all religion, sums itself up and comes to full blossoming; the certainty that world and existence are insufficient, and the strong desire to break through into the true being, of which at the best we have here only a foretaste and intuition. The doctrine of immortality stands by itself as a matter of great solemnity and deep rapture. It is the conviction which, of all religious convictions, can be least striven for consciously; it must well forth from devotional personal experience of the spirit and its dignity. . . . To educate and cultivate it in us requires a discipline of meditation, of concentration, and of spiritual self-culture from within outwards. If we understood better what it meant “to live in the spirit,” to develop the receptivity, fineness and depth of our inner life, to listen to and cultivate what belongs to the spirit, to inform it with the worth and content of religion and morality, and to integrate it in the unity and completeness of a true personality, we should attain to the certainty that personal spirit is the fundamental value and meaning of all the confused play of evolution, and is to be estimated on quite a different scale from all other being which is driven hither and thither in the stream of Becoming and Passing away, having no meaning or value because of which it must endure.”

J. WORSLEY AUSTIN.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

CLIMBING.

A FEW weeks ago I wrote to you about the pleasure of movement—the delight of going on, in walking, running, marching, travelling, and also in the journey of life.

Perhaps even more delightful than going on is going up; from the very first we like to get up high, and we like the climbing.

The small child likes to be put up on father's shoulder, to climb up on to anything that is above the level of the floor—a footstool, a box, a bench, a chair. Better still is it to crawl up the stairs. Do you remember how much better you liked to get up high anywhere by yourself than to be lifted; and how you objected to being lifted when you thought you could manage alone?

Of course, you always preferred the top of an omnibus or a tram to the inside; and, of course, even the youngest would prefer to climb up alone, even if the whole tramful of people had to be kept waiting! But we cannot keep trams waiting, and some of us have to be helped.

The little ones have often to be lifted, whether they like it or not, and that is one of the ways in which elder brothers and sisters are generally very kind. To be able to lift instead of being lifted is one of the privileges of growing up, and in climbing of all sorts there are plenty of chances of giving a lift or a helping hand to each other.

The youngest climber I ever knew was a girl. Even before she could walk she was eager to climb. As soon as she could crawl at all she learned to crawl upstairs, and she learned also to make stairs up to many a desired height that at first seemed beyond her reach. She would push along a box until it was close to a chair, and so climb up one step higher. Then, by pushing and turning a footstool and a chair to a table she would arrange them as steps in order to clamber up and get for herself what she could not reach from the floor. Thus, whilst still almost a baby she would build her own staircase and then clamber up it.

One of the most loving and lovable of heroines in English poetry, whose story was a sad one, enjoyed a happy childhood in the country, and was remembered afterwards for “her venturesome climbings, and tumbles and childish escapes.” We all know how many tumbles come from an early love of climbing.

They say that “a burnt child dreads the fire,” but falls and bruises do not seem to cure us of our love of climbing. As long as there are no bones broken we are eager to try again—to climb again—next time, we hope, without stumbling or tumbling.

Our tumbles make us more careful. Perhaps we learn not to be in such a hurry over the climbing, to take heed where we put each foot, and what we take hold of to pull ourselves up higher.

The sort of climbing we can do depends upon the sort of place we live in. An ideal place for learning to climb and for enjoying climbing is a farm in the country, especially if it happens to be just at the foot of a hill with an old ruined abbey or castle near. Gates and walls, trees, haystacks and carts carrying hay or corn, and best of all perhaps a barn with a ladder and a loft—a ladder to climb and soft hay to fall on—all this makes a paradise for adventurous folk who can learn.

Now what is it that makes us enjoy climbing more than just walking on and on along the level? Besides the desire to get higher there is the attraction of trying to do what is not quite easy. It is easy to go on, it is not so easy to go on and up at the same time.

Don't you all like to do what is difficult, especially if you are told it is too difficult for you yet? Some of us won't believe in difficulty until we have tried and failed. If we are true climbers we shall want to go on trying, in spite of the failures. We shall take a grim satisfaction in learning from our own stumbles and tumbles. Instead of bemoaning bruises a true climber considers them experience.

Sometimes a bruise is the result of an accident. But it is more often the mark of a mistake or blunder—a slip. And if we are wise enough to learn, a bruised shin will remind us of a blundering step. The bruise will be better soon, and we shall climb better next time.

Besides the pleasure of attempting the difficult, another advantage of getting higher is that we can then see further.

We were brought up to consider a hill something to walk up that we might see the view from the top. And we learned to find so much pleasure in seeing further, seeing beyond, that the view was worth the climb.

There is a poem about a little boy who climbed into a cherry tree and looked down into the neighbour's garden and beyond, as if it were “foreign lands”—over many pleasant places that he had never seen before. It is so pleasant that he wishes to climb higher and see farther.

“If I could find a higher tree Farther and farther I should see.”

In many ways we use picture language about going upwards, climbing up to what is higher. When we feel brighter and happier on a sunny spring day we say our spirits go up. To get on, to hold the most important position in any station of life in any trade or profession, is called getting to the top of the tree. At school you move up to the top of the class and on to a higher class till you reach the top class—the top of the school. Higher means also better. And in many ways, when going on and on means effort, doing what is difficult, overcoming difficulties, we think of it as climbing.

Many hundred years ago the famous Saint Augustine said that we might each overcome our faults and turn them into a ladder by which to rise higher, and Longfellow made a poem about this ladder of Saint Augustine.

You might learn by heart these two verses:—

“All common things, each day's events,
That with the hour begin and end;
Our pleasures and our discontents
Are rounds by which we may ascend.

“We have no wings, we cannot soar;
But we have feet to scale and climb
By slow degrees, by more and more,
The cloudy summits of our time.”

THE RELIGION OF UNITARIANS.

"PRESENT-DAY Unitarianism is preaching with fervour and clearness the foundation truth of the New Theology, the fundamental unity of God and man. But it does not belong to it exclusively, and I decline to be labelled Unitarian because I preach it too." So writes the Rev. R. J. CAMPBELL in the chapter of his "New Theology" book on "Jesus the Divine Man." We have not the least desire to label Mr. CAMPBELL Unitarian, but only to understand what he really means, and to take our own share, if it may be so, in establishing the truth. To this end we are grateful to Professor UPTON for his article this week. It is of the utmost importance for the practical progress of religion, that we should be clear as to the actual meaning of the "fundamental unity of God and man."

In that same chapter, again, Mr. CAMPBELL writes:—"The New Theology does not belong to any one Church, but to all. : : . Let every man stay in the Church whose spiritual atmosphere and modes of worship best accord with his temperament, but let him recognise the deeper unity that lies below the formal creeds. The old issue between Unitarianism and Trinitarianism vanishes in the New Theology—the bottom is knocked out of the controversy. Unitarianism used to declare that JESUS was man, not God; Trinitarianism maintained that He was God and man; the oldest Christian thought, as well as the youngest, regards Him as God in man—God manifest in the flesh. But here emerges a great point of difference between the New Theology on the one hand, and traditional orthodoxy on the other. The latter would restrict the description 'God manifest in the flesh' to JESUS alone; the New Theology would extend it in a lesser degree to all humanity, and would maintain that in the end it will be as true of every individual soul as ever it was of JESUS. Indeed, it is this belief that gives value and significance to the earthly mission of JESUS. He came to show us what we potentially are."

It appears, then, that in Mr. CAMPBELL'S view, he and modern Unitarians are at one in regarding JESUS as belonging essentially to the human race, and in his own nature bearing the same relation to God as we do ourselves; the difference being that JESUS was already from birth or had perfectly attained to be that which we are all destined to become; and that, if it is true to say that JESUS is God, it is true to say the same potentially of ourselves.

But when we come to Mr. CAMPBELL'S next chapter on "The Eternal CHRIST," we find that the God whom JESUS was and is, and which we are potentially and are destined actually to become, is "the archetypal eternal Divine Man, the source and sustenance of the universe, and yet transcending the universe"; for "God is essentially man, that is, He is the fount of humanity." "With what God have we to do except the God who is eternally man?" And again, in the next chapter, on "The Incarnation of the Son of God," we read, in a passage part of which we quoted a fortnight ago: "JESUS was God, but so are we. He was God because His life was the expression of Divine love; we, too, are one with God in so far as our lives express the same thing. JESUS was not God in the sense that he possessed an infinite consciousness; no more are we. JESUS expressed fully and completely, in so far as finite consciousness ever could, that aspect of the nature of God which we have called the eternal Son, or CHRIST, or ideal Man who is the Soul of the universe, and 'the light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world'; we are expressions of the same primordial being. Fundamentally, we are all one in this eternal CHRIST."

Now, it still appears to us simply and entirely true to say that "JESUS was man, not God," and that the Eternal, who is the source of our life, in whom we as living, spiritual beings must for ever rest, is to be described not as the eternal Son, or archetypal Man, but as the Father. To say that we "are one with God," and that "we are God," is not the same thing; nor is it the same to say "JESUS manifests God," and "JESUS is God." The essential unity of God and man, as Professor UPTON very clearly shows, as a spiritual fact, does not imply identity. To whatever height of spiritual being we attain, we must for ever remain children of the Eternal, finite beings, for there can be but the one Infinite and Eternal Source of all, the Father Everlasting. And we, even in the ultimate perfecting of our life must remain simply children, with JESUS, in communion with the Father. That appears to us to be the fundamental truth of religion.

The interest in this question is so great that we propose to illustrate it further, in a series of articles on "The Religion of Unitarians," as it may be studied in some of our chief teachers. The series will begin next week with an article on JOSEPH PRIESTLEY, to be followed by others on CHANNING, MARTINEAU, PARKER, JOHN HAMILTON THOM, and ARMSTRONG.

THE MARTINEAU MEMORIAL, NORWICH.

SIR,—We shall be grateful if you can give us space for an outline of the arrangements which we have so far been able to make for the laying of the foundation-stone of the Martineau Memorial Building here.

On Saturday, April 20, friends will meet in the Octagon Chapel, to which the new buildings are adjacent, at 3.30 o'clock in the afternoon. This day and time have been fixed largely in the hope of meeting the convenience of friends from London in particular, as it admits of their returning to town the same evening at 5 p.m. But we earnestly hope that many will stay over Sunday, and share in our quiet services of rejoicing; and we most cordially invite all who can possibly do so to be present with us on Saturday and Sunday.

The ceremony itself will come midway in the progress of a short service in the chapel, at which we trust that Miss Gertrude Martineau will be supported by many friends from far and near, and of various denominations, including representatives of Manchester College and the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. Immediately following this service, we shall proceed to the Octagon Institute (about two minutes' walk from the chapel), where tea will be served, and a social hour or so spent.

On Sunday, April 21, the Rev. V. D. Davis and Rev. Alfred Hall will conduct special services in the Octagon Chapel. A complete programme of the proceedings will be ready immediately, and will be gladly sent on application to me. Further particulars will be advertised in next week's issue.

We confess that deep anxiety mingles with our satisfaction at having reached this point in our great enterprise. Nearly £1,000 is still required to complete the fund. The prospect of having to borrow even a portion of that sum in the near future is one that we cannot contemplate with equanimity, however much courage and hope we may bring to the process. But we think that the fact of these buildings being a memorial to Dr. Martineau, and a provision for the carrying on of work inaugurated by him, must surely stir the generosity of all who can send us further help, so that the foundation-stone may be laid with no debt in view.

On behalf of the Octagon Chapel Committee,

F. A. MOTTRAM

(Hon. Sec. to the Fund).

THE RELIGIOUS CRISIS IN FRANCE AND ITALY.ITS INTENSITY—ITS ORIGIN—ITS MANI-FESTATIONS IN FRANCE—IN ITALY—
CONCLUSION.

By PAUL SABATIER.

*Translation of the Article in the

By E. L. H. THOMAS, B.A.

It is much to be desired that the incidents in the struggle between the Church and the State should not be allowed too much to monopolise public opinion. It is a duel, and, like all duels, possesses an element of simplicity that, involuntarily, captures the imagination. But important though it is, it must not be permitted so entirely to engross attention as to exclude from our observation a much profounder crisis. I refer to the religious crisis, of which the politico-ecclesiastical events are but consequences and episodes.

Clericalism and anti-clericalism, in this agreed—a no uncommon circumstance—are blind to this immense movement, which, as is the case with all great transformations, is, obscurely and mysteriously, in process of accomplishment. And hence, it is that they look for diametrically opposite, and equally erroneous results from the Law of Separation. Having no eyes for the religious crisis, they are under the impression that the conflict between Rome and France will be settled as other conflicts have been settled. And whilst one side is already conjuring up fancy pictures and caricatures, in which the Government of the Republic will be depicted at Canossa, barefooted, and with a rope about its neck, seeking pardon from a Papacy in its apotheosis, the other side already sees a France rid of her religious reveries, like one awaking in the morning, and glad to shake off the visions of a long and painful, but quickly forgotten nightmare.

They are equally mistaken, inasmuch as they only see the external and material aspect of religion, and take cognisance only of its institutions. For the former, religion is a revelation dropped from the skies; for the latter, it is little better than a sickly excrescence. It is the same error under two antithetic shapes.

If the sons of the "Fille aînée de l'Eglise" (the Church of France) feel some discomfort in the cramping institutions, within which, hitherto, their efforts towards advancing justice and love were confined, does that imply that they are about to discard those efforts, or does it not mean, on the contrary, that they are striving to impart to those efforts a greater vigour and somewhat more of truth and method? This, as it seems to me, is the truth of the situation. We are no more aiming at the overthrow of the State than at the overthrow of the Church. We are traversing one of the stages in the religious history of mankind.

Turning away then, from this exciting and impassioned conflict between Rome and the French Republic, I would rather attempt to expound the broad lines of the religious crisis which is stirring the élite of Catholicism to its depths.

That I shall make little reference here to Protestantism, arises from no lack of sympathy, but simply from the circumstance that I find nothing in this connection to say about it. The activity of Protestantism in France, in theology, in science, in literature, in politics, and in missionary enterprise, is altogether remarkable. A host of civic and moral causes that otherwise would have come to grief, find in Protestantism an ever persistent and efficient co-operation. But if I recognise in their case, an ecclesiastical crisis, I do not perceive any profound religious crisis amongst them. The French Protestants labour fervently, discuss under conditions of perfect freedom, but obviously they are at the end of their religious development.

They have built a house on the rock, and they vary its furniture with delightful frequency. But they seem nowise greatly concerned as to the solidity and duration of the structure itself. If profound crises are experienced within its borders, they are individual crises, which in no way affect the general aspect of Protestantism. Famous as it is for its variations, posterity will find it—if it does find it—deviating much less from itself than Catholicism.

French Protestantism suffers from the defects of its qualities. Essentially individualistic, it constitutes a great school of intellectual and moral energy. There is no scepticism amongst them, but only too much faith in themselves. There is no lack amongst them of love and devotion, but only a lack of the kind of love and devotion which pours itself out haphazard, and is not merely kept in reserve for the family circle or for the little group to which you belong. To this circumstance, doubtless, is owing the isolation of Protestantism. The contact between it and the rest of France has failed to be established, because, obviously, in its case the head dominates the heart, whereas in our country the heart dominates the head. And our country is right. If swarming sects indicate strength, when they are a sign of intellectual activity, they become symptoms of the sins, par excellence, of egotism and pride, when they become the parcelling out of endless divisions. Chapels are good things, so long as they are, as in our old cathedrals, wide open in the direction of the central nave. Our age is assuredly not anti-individualistic, but it has a feeling that individualism is only a method, only a preliminary to solidarity, only a preparation for converting all men everywhere, into intelligent and voluntary members of that human family, which of old was greeted by the prophets, and is daily becoming a more concrete reality.

It is then of Catholicism only that I shall venture to speak; and only, even then, of the crisis as it affects France and Italy. It exists, of course, in other countries, and is in process of development there, being part and parcel of the general movement elsewhere—suffice it to point to England, for example, and the deep impression made by Father Tyrrell*—but we must draw the line somewhere.

*Father Tyrrell's letter to a Professor of Anthropology was, towards the end of 1905, admirably translated into Italian. These brief pages overflowing with thought and spiritual experience, read in religious circles, have exerted a profound influence, by defining in particular, for many seminarists, the preoccupations by which they were assailed. It was this publication which led the society of Jesus to separate from Father Tyrrell. The original English text, with a preface, has just been published by Longmans under the title, "A Much Abused Letter." Through the same Publishers may be

That which first of all strikes us in studying the present Catholic crisis, is its intensity. It is of an entirely different nature from that of the sixteenth century: The Reformation did not change the conception of authority itself, but merely changed its seat. Instead of recognising it in the Church, the Reformation recognised it in the Bible. The name, and indeed the features of the master were changed, but the emotions of the Protestant in relation to the Bible were very similar to those of the Catholic in relation to the Church. No doubt, in declining to obey the mastership of the Church, and in submitting to the authority of the Bible, the reformers had created a charter of absolute independence: Luther, uttering his famous words, "Here I stand, I can no other," : : : like Calvin, in the admirable pages in which he studies the inward and individual testimony of the Holy Spirit, made an attempt to completely transform the problem of authority. But, whether it was that the time was not ripe, or that Protestantism still stood in need of a more external and one-sided point of view, it is clear that the Reformation in our country merited its purely negative appellation of Protestantism.

Doubtless, there have been here and there, and there still are amongst Protestants, thinkers, who have felt that the conception itself of authority—be it that of the Church, of the Bible, or of the State—stands in need of transformation and renewal, and who feel that it is not a question of passing from one authority to another, nor of overthrowing them all, but of passing on to a profounder, completer, and more spiritual obedience, before which the old antinomies will disappear. It is not a question of overthrowing such and such a dogma, and of superciliously passing by on the other side, exclaiming, "It is an error," but it is a question of doing with it what Christ did with the Law of Moses, it is a question of fulfilling it. A given dogma was like a little rill of water, at which many generations came to slake their thirst. Scarcely, nowadays, can we perceive, however closely we may look for it, the faintest oozings of this once trickling stream. Shall we exclaim, "there is no more water!" Yes, provided we speedily set to work to dig deeper for it.

But the men amongst the Protestants, who not only felt, but appreciated, these needs of modern times, were as voices crying in the wilderness. Ariste Viguié,* to go no further, had profoundly seized upon what was true, true at once in its deep nature as well as in its provisional aspect, in the theology of St. Paul, and in that of the Middle Ages. With a rare historical sense, a poetic gift, and a generosity that made him at home in all epochs, he had seized upon whatever was strong, kind, sweet and true in tradition. He was misunderstood. This all-embracing love was regarded as eclecticism and syncretism, whenever it was not regarded had all the works of this celebrated Father: "Nova et Vera," "Hard Sayings," "The Faith of the Millions," "Lex Orandi," "Lex Credendi," "External Religion," "The Soul's Orbit."

as a native incapacity for solving great problems, or as an evidence of theological impotence, or even as a pandering to popularity:

The present Catholic crisis is throughout an attempt to find one's bearings towards a new conception of the function of authority. Those whom I shall call the young Catholics, are in no sense revolvers. Nay, they are just the contrary. To spectators too far away to be able to judge, or too ill-informed, or it may be even to ecclesiastical authority itself, which like so many other authorities, is accustomed to receive immediate, docile, and unreasoning obedience, these young people, with their peremptory ways, and disregard for the formal hours of audience, and the ceremonies of the Roman Curia, may appear intractable. In reality, however, if they do not ask questions under their breath, but loudly, it is not to sell their obedience dearly, but, on the contrary, to substitute for the bondage of the letter, the joyful and intelligent obedience of the spirit.

In their case all is strength, pride and youthful vigour. They never cease plying their mother with questions, and perhaps wearying her with them. But there is no thought in the background of their mind of putting her in the wrong. They yearn to understand her better, and to be in a position to act, as they say in Italy, con intelletto d'amore. In other words, they are no longer children; they are sons, sons for whom the time has come to co-operate with their mother.

Such is the great novelty of the present Catholic crisis. It does not concern such and such detail; it probes, at the very outset, to the fundamental conception of authority; and it is going to transform it from within, for it is much the same with the Church as it is with a family: A father does not speak to his son of twenty, as to a little one of four, or to a youth of fifteen. To the jurist paternal authority is a massive conception, and regarded all of a piece, and such to the theologians is ecclesiastical authority.

Well, let us leave jurists and theologians and look at things in their concrete reality.

Its Origin.

Before proceeding further, perhaps, we ought to ask ourselves, whence did the crisis arise? It arose in the Church itself, and since it is a crisis of growth, it is immanent, natural, and profound. It makes for life and development, and not for decay and death. Doubtless there will be ruins scattered, here and there, along the way, but they will be not unlike the cast-off shells which the chick leaves behind it in its path.

Nevertheless, although this crisis has been inward and immanent, it has been favoured by circumstances, much as the chick, moving restlessly within its shell is discreetly helped by a few taps of the hen's beak.

Now the philosophy of evolution has altered everything around us. It has acted like the rays of the spring sun, which awake nature, simultaneously, everywhere. The soil of religion, being the furthest from the surface, was the last to feel the touch of these rays, but nothing can give an idea of the effect which their mighty influences will henceforth exert as they reach and affect it.

Whether we like it or not, people are finding it impossible to speak of dogmas as they did for centuries, almost, that is, in the precise language of mathematicians studying geometrical theorems. A dogma has become a living thing with a history, and which cannot be separated from its history. And this simple statement is sufficient to show how equally weak are the judgments of those who, on the one hand, see in a dogma a final truth, and of those, on the other hand, who see in it a pure and simple absurdity.

In the present crisis, the vanguard of Catholicism is gradually assimilating the evolutionary thought, as of old it had assimilated the philosophy of Alexandria, and as in the thirteenth century it assimilated with Thomas Aquinas the Philosophy of Aristotle.

It is this evolutionary thought which penetrates, at times unawares, the works of history, literature, exegesis, philosophy, politics, and sociology of the young Catholics. And M. Fogazzaro, one of the most authoritative representatives of the new tendencies in Italy, was able, a few years ago, to devote an entire volume, Le Ascensioni Umane—which was not placed on the Index—to the study of religious philosophy from the standpoint of the doctrine of evolution.

But I hasten to return to the Catholic crisis. Like all crises, it is difficult to describe. It is a mysterious battle between life and death, but one in which the pain of it is accompanied by an indefinable thrill of delight. Of all this spring-like labour, we can but catch a glimpse, we can but seize, here and there, a few indications of it—the grass turning green, the almond trees bursting into blossom, and the little child at the threshold of the house, merrily singing a song to Nature, a song of which, but yesterday, she knew nothing.

Erroneous Views about the Crisis.

If I have succeeded in making myself understood, there ought to be no difficulty now in comprehending the force of the crisis, and how, without in the least degree jeopardising the existence of the Church, it may be taken as the preliminary condition to fruitful transformations.

And it can be readily perceived what it is that differentiates this crisis from the efforts that have preceded it, such as the effort of the sixteenth century, and of the uninterrupted series, may we not say, of the attempts of liberalism, that under the most varied guises has striven ingeniously to unite faith and reason. God forbid that I should speak ill of the well-meaning ambassadors, who, with a strange patience, have again and again opened negotiations that were doomed to failure. Why should faith yield to reason, or reason yield to faith? The problem so stated is insoluble, and no one has ever succeeded in offering answers that were anything but make-shift expedients.

The young Catholics are the very opposite of the type of the easy-going curé, widespread enough in Italy, who enters on an ecclesiastical career, because his brothers are military men, Government officials, or landed proprietors, and because he thinks that the various social avocations should be allocated to different members of the family. If you were to ask this churchman to explain his personal views, or the grounds of his faith, he would answer—if he deigned to answer and did not turn his back on you as an ill-bred individual—with a few scraps from the handbooks which he was taught at the seminary. The young Catholics, on the other hand, are only too eager to meet your questions, to invite them, and to provoke them, not because they imagine themselves equal to supplying answers to everything, but because questions will lead them to reflection and constrain them to effort. Far from being scared by contradiction, it appears to them the natural means for attaining to a clearer vision of the truth, and for a more thorough training for the apostolate.

At this stage we may now likewise see how erroneous is the judgment of those who have regarded the present Catholic crisis as a Protestant infiltration. If those, who by this description, have sought to stir up Catholic opinion against the modernists,* were a little more attentive and not so blinded by fear, they would have seen that the young Catholic school, far from being a Protestant infiltration, has been the first since Bossuet completely to revive a Christian Apologetic. M. Fogazzaro and M. Loisy, Père Smeria and Père Laberthonnière, the Archbishop of Albi, and M. Klein are the most formidable adversaries that Protestantism has ever encountered. Others are persuaded that the crisis is due to the influence of Newman or of Americanism. Assuredly the prestige of Newman over the thought of the young is at present immense, and for some years they have stoutly turned their attention in the direction of America, reckoning on the Episcopate of the United States to urge on the Church to enter more rapidly into the trend of modern times. But suppose that Newman had never existed, and that North America had resembled South America, the crisis would none the less have broken out and exerted no less a force. As a matter of fact, the young Catholics look upon Newman as a combatant who has endured tests analogous to their own. It is not association with the American clergy that has created in them this irresistible need for a new type of obedience, less literal, less external, and less servile, yet more spiritual, more joyful, and more efficient, and for an activity more thorough-going and human. Nay, it was when they experienced this need, that they looked in all directions, far and near, to see whether others had experienced the same crisis.

(To be concluded.)

A MEMORIAL Volume of Sermons and Addresses by Herbert Rix, with portraits of him and his wife, and an appreciation written by the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed, is in preparation. Any surplus, after paying necessary expenses, it is proposed to devote to the formation of a Prize Fund for the children of the Limsfield village schools, in which both Herbert and Alice Rix took a deep interest. The book will be issued to subscribers at 3s. 6d. a volume, post free. Orders should be sent at once to Mr. H. Carter, 28, Addiscombe-grove, Croydon.

MANCHESTER DISTRICT SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

ANNUAL MEETING AT STALYBRIDGE.

GRANTED fine weather, the Good Friday meeting of the Manchester District Sunday School Association is the most popular of all our annual gatherings held in the North of England. And this year the weather was perfect; it was as if a July day had strayed from its place in the calendar. When the well-filled special train from Hindley and intermediate stations arrived at Stalybridge, the busy little manufacturing town was bathed in sunshine, and in place of the usual pall of smoke there was an unbroken stretch of blue sky overhead. Work seemed to be everywhere suspended for the time being, and the town was in a bustle of mild holiday excitement. Our arrival was not unexpected. At the station and all along our route nice little boys were posted, wearing white rosettes, so that the way-faring man, though a fool, might not err as to the road.

The day opened, as usual, with a religious service, and for this purpose the deacons and congregation had kindly given the use of the Congregational Church—a repetition of a similar courtesy extended to us on the occasion of the last visit of the Association to Stalybridge, thirteen years ago. The chapel is a very fine one, capable of seating some eight hundred or so people. All through the opening hymn people streamed in, and by the time all the late arrivals were seated it was not far from full. The preacher for the day was the Rev. A. W. Fox, of Todmorden, a northern hillside man, as he described himself, native to the soil, and aware of the native reticence of the northern character. The sermon was earnest and inspiring, a quaint mixture of good, sound, practical advice and homely counsel, and yet moving at times with a real eloquence. It was the direct talk of a teacher to teachers. It was anecdotal, reminiscent, and didactic by turns, but always optimistic and cheery. It contained many striking phrases. "Prepare your lessons, but, above all, prepare your hearts." Thus practical experience and imagination were blended again and again. Do not despair of the value of the work, the preacher urged, or of the want of appreciation. If their hearts were right they would find the children's hearts and their appreciation as well. "Complaints of ingratitude usually come from the selfish and niggardly; the truly generous know the response of grateful hearts." And so, with a scathing reference to some fathers who divide their time between the turf and the tap-room, who regard their children only as possible wage-earners, and leave the whole home burden on the mothers, the preacher closed his earnest and uplifting address with a plea for patience. "Work and wait in unshaken trust and invincible faith." All through it was the kindly sympathetic counsel of a teacher to his fellow-teachers; a serious and earnest address, but lit up with many flashes of quiet humour. Probably nothing better suited to the audience and the occasion could have been desired.

After the service the large company was piloted on its way, like so many Cook's tourists, to the Hob Hill Schools. Here a small army of over a hundred attendants had been mobilised—young men and maidens from our local school and congregation. Working with remarkable ease and smoothness, they quickly served dinner to about five hundred guests, including a fair company which assembled at the vegetarian table—now a recognised feature in all our big Northern gatherings.

It is the immemorial tradition of these gatherings that the younger people may go off for a ramble in the afternoon, while the sober elder folk stay and discuss the business of the Association. On such a day as we were favoured with this custom was like to be well honoured. Still, a large number assembled for the business meeting, and our pretty little chapel, where it was held, was moderately well filled. The President of the Association, Mr. J. Hall Brooks, took the chair, and was supported by a large number of his colleagues in office, as well as by delegates from many kindred Associations. In the audience there were representatives of Unitarian and Liberal Religious movements in Hungary, India, and Japan. The chairman conducted the proceedings with the briskness which has characterised his presidency of the Committee during the year. A member of his town council, chairman of the Education Authority, and head of a large business office, Mr. Brooks knows the value of time and method, and evidently appreciates the motto that "silence is golden." It was, he said, because he resisted the temptation to make long speeches that he was to be honoured with a second term of office. However, on this occasion he ventured a few observations. Commenting on the Annual Report, he testified to the high estimate he had formed during his year of office of the organisation and work of the Association. He had been struck both by its wide range and efficiency, and paid a high tribute to the different honorary officers of the Association, especially the senior secretary, Mr. D. A. Little. Passing on to more general matters, he emphasised the urgency of efficiency in Sunday-school work in view of the certain abolition, sooner or later, of religious teaching from the day-schools, at the same time pointing to signs of encouragement in the wide interest aroused by the "new theology" movement. He concluded by moving the adoption of the report.

ANNUAL REPORT.

This was a substantial document of about fifty pages. It gave full details of the many branches of the Association's work—Lectures, with and without the lantern; Sunday afternoon, temperance, and anti-gambling addresses; rambles, and microscopical work had been carried on with efficiency and success, although, curiously, the demand hardly seems to equal the supply. The fine microscope belonging to the Association had been used over sixty times in audiences aggregating over 2,000. The Sea-side Home had had between sixty and seventy guests during the year, some of whom had stayed considerable periods. The visitors to the Holiday Home had numbered over 1,100. The statistics showed that there were 80 schools on the roll of the Association, as compared with 78 in the previous year. There were in the 72 schools which had made returns, 1,480 teachers and 14,306 scholars, of whom 5,166 were over sixteen years of age. The finances of the Association are in an excellent condition, with substantial balances in hand on all the different accounts, and a large sum invested in Manchester Corporation stock for the enlargement of the Sea-side Home when the need arises. The commercial department had been equally successful, and in addition to the sale of 10,000 copies of the last number of "Hymns and Choral Songs," good business had been done in the other publications of the Association.

The Rev. A. COBDEN SMITH seconded the adoption of the Report. Its one unsatisfactory feature was the decline of the Sunday-morning school. He urged that renewed attention should be given to what he regarded as the best opportunity of the day. On the other hand, the temperance work of the Association was very flourishing, and most of the ministers were on the right side.

Mr. J. WIGLEY spoke in support of the motion, and it was adopted.

On the motion of Mr. J. Barrow (Hindley) and Rev. W. T. Bushrod (Chorley), the committee was appointed, and the appointment of officers followed on the motion of Mr. T. Holt (Manchester) and Rev. J. Morley Mills (Bootle).

The Rev. H. E. Dowson was called upon to give a welcome to the delegates of kindred Associations. Before he could do so, however, he had to receive a great ringing welcome himself. For Mr. Dowson had been invalidated away the greater part of the winter, and this was his first public appearance since his return. When he was allowed to do so, Mr. Dowson spoke with all his old fervour and enthusiasm, giving the delegates the most cordial of greetings, and particularly commending the work of their various societies in view of the new responsibility which would come upon the Sunday-schools in the future by the closing of the day-schools against religious instruction. Mr. Dowson's welcome having been seconded by the hearty cheers of the gathering, interesting replies were given by the various delegates, dealing mainly with the work of their various societies—viz., the Sunday School Association, Mr. Ion Pritchard; Yorkshire, Rev. W. R. Shanks; Liverpool, Rev. J. M. Mills; Midlands, Mr. J. Kimberly; London and South-Eastern Provincial Assembly, Rev. F. Allen; and North Midland, Mr. Limmin. This concluded the afternoon meeting, and the company adjourned to the schools for tea, where they were joined by those who had been exploring the beauty-spots which, happily, are not far from even our smokiest of Northern towns. There were nearly seven hundred persons for tea, including helpers, but bountiful provision had been made, and all the arrangements worked with great smoothness.

EVENING MEETING.

After tea a Public Meeting was held in the Congregational Church, and again the spacious building was well filled. The meeting was full of life, and responsive to the appeals from the platform, while the singing of the hymns was hearty in the extreme.
